Clinton's proposal marks a shift from her 2008 campaign, when she promised not to raise capital gains rates higher than the 20 percent bracket established during her husband's administration. At the time, the rate was 15 percent — a result of the tax cuts championed by then-President George W. Bush.

"I wouldn't raise it above the 20 percent, if I raised it at all," Clinton said in an April 2008 debate.

Over his time in the White House, Obama has raised the rate 8.8 percentage points — fulfilling a campaign promise to increase capital gains taxes.

Many Democrats would like to see the rate go even higher, as part of a larger push by the party to crack down on what they see as Wall Street excess and tackle income inequality.

Last month, Neera Tanden, the head of the liberal Center for American Progress and a prominent Clinton adviser, proposed a "sliding-scale" capital gains tax that would drop the rate charged the longer the security is held.

"Once an investor holds a share past the one-year mark, the tax code provides no incentives to maintain the position any longer," Tanden wrote, in a report co-authored by investment banker Blair Effron, co-founder of Centerview Partners. "A more flexible capital gains tax system could be a tool to incentivize more prudent behavior in equities markets."

Clinton's plan is part of a larger package aimed at tackling what she argues is too heavy an emphasis on quick corporate gains at the expense of workers and broader economic growth. In an economic address last week, Clinton decried what she termed the problem of "quarterly capitalism," saying businesses are paying too little attention to research and development, improving factories and cultivating talent.

"Now it's easy to try to cut costs by holding down or decreasing pay and other investments to inflate quarterly stock prices, but I would argue that's bad for business in the long run," she said. "Workers are assets. Investing in them pays off. Higher wages pay off. And training pays off."

Why China Wants a Jeb-vs.-Hillary Race // Politico // Aaron Mak – July 20, 2015

Perhaps no one in the world would relish a general election campaign between Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush—apart from the two candidates themselves—more than the mandarins in Beijing.

Already, official Chinese news coverage of the 2016 primary season is highlighting the back-and-forth baton exchange between the Clinton and Bush families. Other U.S. presidential candidates are often brushed off as long shots; many Chinese writers seem to have bypassed the primaries, already nominating the front-runners in order to fit the narrative.

Chinese journalists, often eager to take the party line, are framing the U.S. election—sometimes smugly, sometimes incredulously—as a battle between hereditary family clans.

The reason for this long-lens look at 2016 from Beijing seems clear. The ruling Chinese Communist Party is deeply sensitive to charges that it is non-democratic and the playground of “princelings”— a pejorative term for the class of Chinese business tycoons and political power players who trace their lineages to Communist veterans. Nothing helps to blunt that charge as much as the idea that American democracy is similarly corrupt. “The Chinese media, especially the Party media, has been using American elections as a way to discredit democracy," says Kecheng Fang, a former reporter for the Southern Weekly in Guangzhou who now researches Chinese media at the University of Pennsylvania. "I think much of Chinese media has been referring to this election as Clinton 2.0 versus Bush 3.0, so it's a very trendy topic." As Weihua Chen, chief Washington correspondent for the China Daily, the government's largest English-language newspaper, put it to me in an interview: "You guys always talk about being the greatest democracy, but now you have a democracy run by two families for more than a decade?"

A litany of articles from China's government-run print news outlets illustrates this trend. When Xinhua, China's official news agency, reported on Jeb's presidential announcement, the article focused entirely on the sorry state of familial politics in America. Xinhua also published a story tracing the history of political pedigrees in the United States, identifying the Kennedy, Roosevelt, Harrison and Adams families as examples of this nepotistic strain. Yet another article in the Global Times, a conservative CCP tabloid, opined that a second Bush-Clinton election "may lead to a compromised form of democracy that the U.S. has brandished."

Of course, Chinese newspaper writers are hardly the first or only journalists to point out the uncomfortably dynastic tenor of this election. The Washington Post, New York Times and many others have written disparagingly about the topic. RT, a Kremlin-funded TV network often accused of being a pro-Russia mouthpiece, published an op-ed on its website gibing that Chelsea Clinton should marry George P. Bush, thus establishing a "single line of monarchy."

The daily machinations of Chinese propaganda officials are murky, and the level of editorial control they exert can vary from paper to paper, so it's impossible to tell for sure whether this overall focus on the family dynamics of the 2016 race is a directive from the higher-ups or a narrative being pushed by the journalists themselves. Fang elaborated in a later email, "For the Clinton vs. Bush dynasty case, I don't have any evidence available to prove that it's coordinated by propaganda officials. But I think it's safe to say that the propaganda officials are guiding the direction in general."

Bill Bishop, who runs the popular website Sinocism China Newsletter, sees the dynasty coverage as part of an attempt to legitimize the CCP's authoritarian ideology. Official media is an effective instrument to that end, allowing the government to point out flaws in democracy while defending the Chinese political system. "It's very easy for the propaganda guys if it's a Bush-Clinton election," Bishop says.

Among those likely eager to make this anti-democratic narrative stick is China's President Xi Jinping, who would no doubt like to divert attention from the troubling fact that he, himself, is the product of a political dynasty. His father, Xi Zhongxun, was a vice premier and is regarded as one of the founders of the CCP; thus the younger Xi is often labeled a princeling. Still, charges of nepotism in American politics could only come back to haunt Xi. "It's a tricky question for the party media because Xi Jinping is also Xi 2.0," says Kecheng Fang, who said he has seen comments from netizens to this effect when such articles are posted on Weibo, China's social media giant.

At the same time, though, Xi has waged a massive anti-graft campaign against his own party, cleaning up the corruption and nepotism that runs rampant in the upper echelons of Chinese society. Although many see it as a cynical tactic to get rid of Xi's political foes, the CCP has been crowing about its results. One can't help but notice the potential juxtaposition that state media could be setting up: As U.S. leaders are becoming more nepotistic and sullied by money through campaign finance, Chinese leaders are making efforts to become less so. When asked about nepotism in China, Chen of the China Daily said, "China has always been in an evolutionary process. [...] You could still say there are many problems, but it's actually becoming better."

This isn't the first time that the Chinese media has taken issue with the U.S. electoral system.

In the past two elections, state media pounced on campaign finance and the candidates' moneyed patrons, especially the Koch brothers, and sniped about Barack Obama's skimpy managerial C.V. Many in China were puzzled that voters had selected the politically adolescent Obama and twice passed over Mitt Romney, who, given the Chinese concept of selecting leaders, appeared to be the obvious choice. He had a Harvard MBA and J.D., had run the Salt Lake City Olympics, founded the prestigious Bain Capital and was the former governor of Massachusetts. Meanwhile, Obama seemed to lack executive experience as a junior senator.

In some ways, says Evan Osnos, the former China correspondent for the New Yorker, the Chinese may have seen a bit of their own president in Romney. “In Chinese terms, Mitt Romney’s résumé wasn’t all that different from Xi Jinping’s résumé,” Osnos says. Xi served as the party chief in Shanghai, the governor of Fujian, the governor of Zhejiang, the vice president of China—and the list of managerial achievements goes on. But more than that, even though he’s considered a princeling, there is a sense that he still started at the bottom and climbed his way up. In his first CCP position, he served as the deputy party secretary of a county in Hebei—a modest posting—after the party rejected his application to join roughly nine times due to controversies that swirled around his father.

After Romney’s unsuccessful runs and the Supreme Court’s Citizens United decision, mainstream Chinese news media seemed to double down on the argument—using Xi’s career as evidence—that China’s anti-democratic system ends up selecting experienced leaders in a more meritocratic process than U.S. elections. The China Daily’s chief Washington correspondent, Weihua Chen, praised Xi’s determined trudge to the top. He claimed, “You have to have a proven track record. You don’t take a helicopter—you have to build step by step to be promoted.” This is why he and others from official media believe that Xi is a more qualified leader than Obama, lobbing the same accusations of lack of experience that Republicans have used since 2008. In fact, the way that Obama skyrocketed to political prominence, assisted in no small part by his charisma, seems to unsettle Chen. He recalled the 2008 Democratic convention and said: “You guys always complain about Mao’s personal cult. I feel the same way about President Obama. You have the Obama badge, the portrait radiating out—almost like you’re looking at the North Korean leader Kim Jong Un.”

Now China’s negative-tinted coverage of Western politics is extending into new areas. A viral video titled “How Leaders are Made” was uploaded in 2013 to China’s YouTube counterpart, Youku, and made a similar point of comparing the meritocratic selection of Xi to the baffling paths that Obama and British Prime Minister David Cameron took to the executive office. The animated short, which has garnered more than 3 million views, is an excoriating takedown of campaign finance and the election season circus—all in the jaunty, colorful style of a PBS Kids cartoon. The producers of the 5-minute video are unknown; there is only one enigmatic credit at the end: “A studio on Fuxing Road.” But Time magazine suggested that it’s likely Chinese media officials who are behind the curtain. Beijing’s Fuxing Road is widely known for being home to many government departments, such as the General Administration of Press, Publication, Radio, and Television. In addition, fuxing in Chinese means revival, a word that, at the time, was the centerpiece of the CCP’s propaganda campaign calling for the restoration of China’s glory.

Kecheng Fang believes this video will usher in a new era of CCP messaging. Apart from viral videos, official media has co-opted bloggers. Zhou Xiaoping, who privately ran a popular conservative blog slamming the United States, received plaudits from Xi and now gets his rants printed in official newspapers.

“I think patriotic bloggers, and new types of videos using multimedia technologies, and social media will be the new trend in the coverage of next year’s presidential election,” Fang says. For the CCP, the advantages of such a strategy are two-pronged. Anti-democratic sentiment that is ostensibly organic won’t smack of a government clutching onto its authoritarian rule, but rather of citizens who prefer the Chinese political system. Also, the producers of such media can play fast and loose with the facts without serious repercussions. On the other hand, the party would be lambasted if it made errors in the official newspapers.

If Clinton and Bush are nominated in 2016, you can bet that the floodgates will open for a series of vitriolic articles from CCP gazettes.

In addition, if the Youku video is any indication for what may be in store for the future, the tricky part about tracing official Chinese media narratives in 2016 is that their messaging is increasingly shrouded in subterfuge. We may soon see a cartoon of murky provenance featuring Jeb and Hillary perched atop royal thrones with bejeweled scepters in hand. Election cycles are a ripe time to point out flaws in the American brand of democracy, and China is becoming a pro at peddling oppo.

Hillary Clinton was a no-show at the Sunday wedding of the same-sex couple featured in her April launch video, but there appear to be no hard feelings.

Jared Milrad and Nathan Johnson, the couple that appeared in Clinton's campaign announcement, got married on Sunday at Montrose Harbor in Chicago, according to the local CBS affiliate.

"I'm getting married this summer to someone I really care about," Milrad said in Clinton's video.

In a tweet sent the same day, Clinton announced her presidential run in April, Milrad publicly invited her to their wedding.

"BTW @HillaryClinton, feel free to bring a +1. #wedding #LGBT," he added.

According to the same CBS report, they said Clinton's staff returned their invitation with a "we'll see."

"She rightfully pointed out that if she came to the wedding, it might distract from our special day so we understand she supports us," Milrad said, according to the report.

Clinton did sent the couple a note congratulating them on their nuptials, which Milrad posted on Twitter last week.

Judge slams State Department over Hillary Clinton-related records // Politico // Josh Gerstein – July 20, 2015

A federal judge is lashing out at the State Department for delaying for years in providing responses to Associated Press Freedom of Information Act requests seeking records about former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's schedules and her top staffers.

At a contentious hearing last week, U.S. District Court Judge Richard Leon demanded explanations for why some of the AP's requests received no reply for four years or more before the wire service filed suit in March.

Leon said he was determined to establish "what has been going on in the State Department for four years dragging their feet, not addressing these issues for four years."

"I want to find out what's been going on over there. I should say, what's not been going on over there," the judge added. "The State Department, for reasons known only to itself ... has been, to say the least, recalcitrant in responding."

Justice Department lawyers representing State said a surge in FOIA requests caused large backlogs at the agency. They also said State is struggling with a wave of lawsuits since the disclosure in March that Clinton exclusively used a private email server during her service as secretary. In December, she returned 55,000 pages of emails at her former agency's request.

DOJ lawyers Lisa Ann Olson and Marcia Berman said the agency was prioritizing the public release of the 55,000 pages of emails in response to another judge's order requiring monthly releases of those records.

However, Leon accused Olson of responding with "convoluted gobbledygook" when she insisted that the State Department's processing of those emails would satisfy the AP's request for records about Clinton Deputy Chief of Staff Huma Abedin's transition to a special part-time position at State.

"The State Department ... can't say it has done a thorough search until it reviews all 55,000 pages of documents," Olson said.

"What you just said, Ms. Olson, made no sense," the judge replied. "You're failing to distinguish between documents created by the State Department independently of Hillary Clinton's emails — with Hillary Clinton's emails. And you're giving me some kind of convoluted gobbledygook. about how the emails contain within them the independently created documents relating to Huma Abedin's appointment as a special government counsel. ...That is nonsensical."

Olson noted that the AP request about Abedin did seek Clinton's emails on that topic. However, the request also sought all other records or correspondence as well.

A transcript of the hearing suggests Leon grew angry when Olson said she had no estimate of how many State Department documents were responsive to the request about Abedin's employment.

"Have it by next week. Have it by next week when we have our hearing. Do you hear me?" the judge snapped. He also ordered the State official responsible for FOIA handling to appear at the planned hearing.

Olson said State hadn't produced such an estimate previously because it was tied up with the production of records in the suit filed by Vice News reporter Jason Leopold seeking all the Clinton emails.

"In order to come up with an estimate, the State Department will have to divert resources from the other Leopold search. It has limited resources, an amazingly limited number of people," Olson said.

Leon, an often-irascible George W. Bush appointee, said he saw no reason the AP should have to wait because of the more recent request from Leopold.

"The State Department's not going to have the luxury of saying, because we're focusing on Hillary's emails, we're doing so at the cost and expense of four-year-old requests. So, that's not going to be an excuse," the judge said. "In my judgment, a four-year-old request gets a priority over a recent request."

Both the State Department and the Justice Department declined to comment on the hearing or the pending lawsuit.

A lawyer for the AP, Jay Ward Brown, told Leon that the wire service was trying to find out what Abedin did during her time as a "special government employee." However, the judge was also curious about what Abedin does currently.

"Where is she now, this Huma person? ... Did you Google her? ... Have you done LinkedIn?" asked Leon. "You've got to check out on the social-media scene to see what she's doing."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brown said that the press reports "extensively on her personal life" and that she has "some involvement" in politics but said he wasn't clear exactly what.

Abedin is currently vice chairman of Clinton's presidential campaign.

Leon has been at odds with the Obama administration in several notable cases recently. He declared the National Security Agency's collection of U.S. phone records likely unconstitutional. He blocked the administration's issuance of a rule to expand overtime pay for household workers and health care aides. And he ordered Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to sit for a deposition in a libel lawsuit brought by fired Ag official Shirley Sherrod.

The order to Vilsack was overturned by a federal appeals court. The other two rulings remain on appeal.

Despite Leon's amazement at the four-year delay in the AP's FOIA requests to State, the wire service is not alone. A request POLITICO filed in November 2009 about State's approval process for former President Bill Clinton's paid speeches and business deals didn't produce any records until February 2014. The agency began to release records only after a conservative group, Judicial Watch, filed suit over a similar request.

Clinton taps digital firm led by ex-strategist for Obama, Eric Schmidt // Politico // Nancy Scola – July 20, 2015

Despite all the attention being paid to Hillary Clinton’s bid to emulate Barack Obama’s digital campaign juggernaut, one political tech shop high up on the Clinton payroll has managed to fly below the radar.

The Groundwork is headed by Michael Slaby — Obama’s 2008 chief technology officer and a former strategist for Google Executive Chairman Eric Schmidt’s private venture capital firm.

In an interview, Slaby said his year-old, Brooklyn-based firm is building tech infrastructure being used by Clinton, a set of tools that includes everything from online fundraising to volunteering to figuring out how supporters can communicate across social media.

“We learned a lot of lessons over two presidential election cycles about building a digital engagement platform for bringing about a deeper level of participation,” Slaby said. “We’re thinking about relationships instead of transactions.”

He declined to go much deeper in describing the technology, saying, “We’re still just building things and working with our early partners,” and he referred further questions to the Clinton campaign. A Clinton spokesperson called The Groundwork “one of five or six” firms it is using to provide technology services. (Slaby says The Groundwork has clients beyond Clinton, including nonprofits and NGOs that work on issues ranging from refugees to early childhood development, but he said he couldn’t name any before consulting with them.)

This week’s Federal Election Commission filings gave a hint of The Groundwork’s prominent role, showing the Clinton campaign has already paid out some $177,000 to the firm. But it’s keeping a low profile; its website is just a gray screen with a dark logo that consists of a triangle hovering over roots that look like a circuit board.

Slaby served as the Obama 2008 chief technology officer and, on the reelection bid, as chief integration and innovation officer. Between elections, he spent two years as the chief technology strategist for Schmidt's TomorrowVentures.

Schmidt has been an adviser and donor to Obama. While there has been chatter among campaign tech specialists that The Groundwork may be financially backed by Schmidt, it's not known whether he's involved. Schmidt's investment firm, TomorrowVentures, didn't respond to an inquiry, and Slaby said, "We're not talking about our investors."

The Groundwork had until recently been located in the same shared office space as the social commerce site cir.cl , which is led by Obama alum Carol Davidsen and names Schmidt as an investor. That office space is just a six-minute walk from the Clinton campaign's Brooklyn Heights headquarters. Slaby says his team is looking for a new home.

Slaby won't say how much The Groundwork has grown in its first year of life. Scouring LinkedIn, though, finds about a dozen engineers and others with experience at places like Netflix, Meetup and Google who note it as their current gig. One talent scout with a role at the company describes The Groundwork as "changing the political technology landscape." Adds a software engineer: "working on something special."

Hillary Clinton meets the press, on Facebook // Politico // Hadas Gold – July 20, 2015

It wasn't necessarily planned this way, but Hillary Clinton took questions from reporters on Monday.

During a Facebook chat the kind normally meant for questions from ordinary voters, four reporters managed to pose questions to -- and receive an answer from -- the Democratic front-runner. Clinton received thousands of questions and answered just 12, including questions about pant suits and karaoke.

The Washington Post's Wesley Lowery, CNN's Dan Merica and the Huffington Post's Laura Bassett and Alexander Howard were among those who had their questions answered. A Facebook employee who is working on something related to the news, the Instant Articles experiment, got a question answered as well.

Lowery asked a question about the "Black Lives Matter" movement, referencing the Netroots Nation event over the weekend that saw Clinton's challengers, Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, heckled by protesters. Clinton avoided the conference, and as a result got to answer the questions the protesters were asking Sanders and O'Malley from the safety and security of the Facebook chat.

"Black lives matter. Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that," Clinton wrote before mentioning specific actions like body cameras for police and early childhood education.

Merica, who follows Clinton on the trail, even got a shout-out from Clinton in response to his question about altering the capital gains tax. "Hi Dan, good to see you in Arkansas on Saturday," Clinton wrote, making it clear she knew exactly whose questions she was answering.

Facebook chats are an extremely safe venue for politicians, of course, as they lack the live aspect of a gaggle. Candidates choose the questions, and questioners, they want to answer. There's no back and forth. Follow-up questions can be ignored.

Still, Clinton's campaign is making an effort to improve on the candidate's prickly relationship with the media. In the last few weeks, Clinton has sat down to one major TV interview, let reporters (and a full show) into her campaign headquarters, and held a press gaggle after a recent town hall event in New Hampshire, where Clinton answered nine questions.

To be sure, that's a far cry from the access being provided by many of the other candidates who probably need the media more than Clinton does, but it's an improvement from the days of dodging all media inquiries and blocking off the press with a rope, as her campaign did to reporters at a July 4 parade.

“Hillary Clinton enjoys taking questions from reporters and voters alike and wants to answer them in any of number of venues – from local town halls and press gaggles to this Facebook Q&A that reaches people all over the country. She’s going to continue taking a blend of questions from different people to lay out her agenda in the weeks and months ahead," Clinton spokesperson Jesse Ferguson said in an email.

Clinton’s Capital Gains Tax Plan Focuses on Long-Term Growth // Reuters // Susan Heavey – July 20, 2015

Presidential contender Hillary Clinton’s proposed plan to overhaul capital gains taxes aims to foster long-term growth by taxing some short-term investments at higher rates, an aide for her campaign said on Monday.

Although details of the plan have yet to be finalized, it would create a sliding rate scale based on the length of an investment, an aide with the Democratic candidate’s campaign said.

Under her proposal, first reported by the Wall Street Journal, the maximum capital gains tax rate on investments held at least a year, currently 23.8%, would rise to at least the 28% proposed by President Barack Obama, the aide said.

The campaign has not ruled out raising it as high as the regular income tax rate, which can be as high as 39.6% for top earners, the Journal reported.

Details of the plan will be outlined in a speech later this week, the WSJ said.

Investments held for less than a year would still be taxed at regular income tax rates as they are now, the WSJ said. The proposal will also include other rate changes, with the lowest rates given for investments held the longest, it reported.

Clinton’s proposal comes as part of her plan to fight an excessive focus on quick profits in capital markets, including capital gains, which are the profits made on selling capital assets such as shares or real estate.

In a speech last week in New York, the Democratic front-runner blasted Wall Street and took aim at financial institutions, vowing tougher oversight in her first major economic speech of the 2016 election campaign.

Clinton’s plan to revamp such rates appears to be a shift from her position in 2008, when she last sought the party’s nomination and vowed not to raise capital gains tax rates above 20%, if at all.

In 1997, her husband, President Bill Clinton, lowered the maximum taxation rate on capital gains from 28% to 20%. In 2003, it fell to 15 percent under President George W. Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2012, the top capital gains taxation rate rose to 20% for the highest earners. In the 1970s, the maximum taxation rate for long-term capital gains reached nearly 40%.

Although Clinton, who along with her husband have deep ties to Wall Street, is the party's leading presidential candidate, she still faces some pressure from liberal Democrats, such as fellow candidate U.S. Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who want tougher regulations on the financial industry.

Hillary Clinton pledges bigger rewards for corporate whistleblowers // Reuters – July 20, 2015

U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton would increase the incentives for corporate whistleblowers to come forward to report financial misconduct, she said on Monday.

Answering questions from voters in an online chat, Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, said she would increase the maximum amount of money a whistleblower can be rewarded so such incentives "are actually effective."

Whistleblowers who expose wrongdoing under the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act cannot be rewarded more than $1.6 million, an amount Clinton should be "sharply increased," her campaign staff said soon after in an email to reporters.

"While this represents a large sum in real dollars, it pales in comparison to pay levels within the financial sector," the campaign's statement said, and so the cap was not a big enough incentive for finance workers to risk lucrative careers by reporting wrongdoing.

Whistleblowers in sectors governed by other laws can potentially receive much larger rewards, measured as a percentage of a settlement or an amount recovered, and Clinton said this disparity needs to be resolved.

Clinton also said fines for companies caught engaging in financial misconduct should "cut into" the bonuses of the executives responsible, but did not provide details as to how this would work.

Hillary Clinton Previews Plans to Get Tough on Wall Street, Raise Capital Gains Taxes // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton previewed her ideas Monday for punishing financial misconduct by Wall Street firms and other corporations, and for incentivizing long-term corporate decision-making over "quarterly capitalism," including an overhaul of capital gains taxation.

Following up on a broader economic- and financial-policy speech delivered last week in New York, the Democratic presidential front-runner has plans to unveil proposals later this week aimed at boosting corporate responsibility and accountability, and began the rollout of those ideas during a question-and-answer session on Facebook.

On the eve of Tuesday's fifth anniversary of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, Clinton again vowed to protect and expand upon the law to "enhance accountability," including by boosting the financial rewards for whistleblowers and by creating a mechanism to cut into executives' compensation when their companies are fined for running afoul of financial regulations.

Clinton said she wants to "make sure that good people have real incentives to come forward and report illegal activity by raising the whistleblower caps so they're actually effective." The Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act caps rewards at $1.6 million, which may not be a sufficient incentive for someone to risk a high-paying job on Wall Street, and Clinton—like former Attorney General Eric Holder—wants to see the amount increased.

Clinton will also propose policies aimed at making "sure that when corporations pay fines to the government for wrongdoing, those fines cut into the bonuses of the executives who should have been accountable or should have caught the problem. Give people a reason to improve the culture of their firms." A campaign official said Clinton is still formulating the details of this proposal and will put them forward in the weeks ahead.

This week, Clinton will unveil a proposal to tax capital gains using a sliding rate scale based on the length of an investment, something at which she hinted during last week's speech.

Her aim is "to promote long term investment that will strengthen companies, workers, and communities," she wrote on Facebook, responding to a reporter's question about the apparent shift from her position in 2008.

During her first presidential campaign, Clinton she said she would keep the capital gains rate below 20 percent, much lower than her new proposal. "Both business leaders and labor leaders have been speaking out about this in recent years," she said. "The increase in short-termism has grown in urgency since 2008, and the urgency of our solutions has to match it."

Hillary Clinton Makes Speech On Women's Issues Which Could Teach Mail On Sunday A Thing Or Two // HuffPo // Eve Hartley – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton is teaching the Mail On Sunday a thing or two about women's issues.

A long standing advocate for women's rights, she passionately declared her commitment at the Arkansas Democrats dinner and said: "I'm going to keep going... I'm going to keep fighting for equal pay for equal work."

The Sunday tabloid was branded sexist when Labour leadership candidate Liz Kendall was asked how much she weighed by journalist Simon Walters. She responded by telling him to "fk off".

Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Rodham Clinton speaks at the Democratic Party of Arkansas Jefferson Jackson dinner in North Little Rock, Ark., Saturday, July 18, 2015.

The presidential candidate's speech began: "I know that when I talk about this, some people are going to think 'there she goes again with the women's issues'... well I am going to keep going, I believe it's so important for all of us"

"When women get ahead families get ahead and then America gets ahead...

"You know, paid leave, earned sick days, child care, these aren't women's issues, they're family issues, they're economic issues, they're American issues."

Clinton, returning to Arkansas where she began her political ascent, also drew critique of Republican policies denouncing them as "the party of the past".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also hit out at the businessman and reality TV star, Donald Trump. Last week Clinton attacked the millionaire's stance on immigration.

The 67-year-old democratic candidate continues to hold a comfortable lead over rival Bernie Sanders. Among likely voters in the primary, CNN reports that 59% picked Clinton and 19% backed Sanders.

Clinton has also been vocal on women's rights on Twitter, supporting the 167th anniversary of the Seneca Falls Convention, a milestone for equality:

Hillary Clinton Responds To 'Gender Card' Dig: 'Mitch McConnell Really Doesn't Get It' // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton fired back at Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) on Monday after he accused her of playing the "gender card" during her presidential campaign.

"Wow," Clinton told HuffPost during a Facebook question-and-answer session. "If that's what he said, Mitch McConnell really doesn't get it. There is a gender card being played in this campaign. It's played every time Republicans vote against giving women equal pay, deny families access to affordable child care or family leave, refuse to let women make decisions about their health or have access to free contraception."

McConnell criticized Clinton at an event at the Bullitt County Chamber of Commerce in Shepherdsville, Kentucky, Monday morning, quipping that "the gender card alone isn't enough," according to Theo Keith, a Louisville-based political reporter. Keith said the remark was a blanket criticism of Clinton as well as of McConnell's recent Democratic Senate opponent, Alison Lundergan Grimes. HuffPost asked McConnell's office to elaborate on his remarks and has yet to hear back.

When HuffPost asked Clinton about the comment on Facebook, she responded that equal pay and family leave affect both genders.

"These aren't just women's issues, they are economic issues that drive growth and affect all Americans," Clinton said. "Anyone who doesn't get that doesn't understand what our lives are like."

Hillary Clinton Hints She'd Support Flexible Benefits For Gig Economy Workers // HuffPo // Alexander Howard – July 20, 2015

If America's economic future includes on-demand labor in a "gig economy," then American policymakers will need to build modern safety nets to protect and support tens of millions of people seeking income on mobile platforms like Uber.

In a Facebook question-and-answer forum on Monday, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton signaled support when The Huffington Post asked whether workers' compensation or unemployment insurance should be independent of any given employer:

I had a feeling this might come up! You are asking exactly the kinds of questions that we all need to be asking about the future of work in an age of accelerating technological change. I certainly don't have all the answers. But we have to resolve these questions while embracing the promise and potential of these new technologies and without stifling innovation or limiting the ability of working moms and veterans and young people to get ahead. On the issue of benefits, the experience of the Affordable Care act shows that we need to make sure people have access to benefits and that they are portable as they move from job to job. –H

The former secretary of state's comment is not binding, nor, frankly, does it specifically address the question. "I certainly don't have all the answers" would not be a satisfying or sufficient response to a direct question from a debate moderator.

At a time when Republican politicians are seeking credibility on tech issues by praising Uber, Clinton is stepping carefully around the labor issues raised by the emerging "sharing economy." She didn't answer a related question posed by journalist Kevin Roose at all.

Given the increasing politicization of Uber in New York City, Clinton's decision to include a caveat about "embracing the promise and potential of these new technologies without stifling innovation" certainly suggests that she and her strategists are wary of being portrayed as opposed to technological progress.

Elizabeth Warren Fires Warning Shot Over Clinton's Bow // HuffPo // Liam Miller – July 20, 2015

On Friday, Elizabeth Warren gave the morning keynote speech at Netroots Nation. Held in Phoenix, Arizona this year to highlight immigration reform, Warren also spoke at length about financial reform -- and what she feels any presidential candidate must be prepared to do about it. She said, "anyone"; but it seemed pretty clear she was talking to Hillary Clinton. Here's Warren:

We have a presidential election coming up. I think anyone running for that job - anyone who wants the power to make every key economic appointment and nomination across the federal government -- should say loud and clear that they agree: we don't run this country for Wall Street and mega corporations. We run it for people. Anyone who wants to be President should appoint only people who have already demonstrated they are independent, who have already demonstrated that they can hold giant banks accountable, who have already demonstrated that they embrace the kind of ambitious economic policies that we need to rebuild opportunity and a strong middle class in this country.

To put this in context: a few days earlier, Clinton gave a major speech, and talked about financial reform. It did not have the teeth of Warren's orations on that subject. For example, Clinton said "too big to fail is too big a problem", which is about as weaksauce a parroting of Bernie Sanders' "too big to fail is too big to exist" as you could imagine.

Really, though, what Clinton's toothless statements do is give her the ever-important out with her rich, banker donors. She didn't say anything that she couldn't pass off later as necessary campaign rhetoric. Sanders, of course, is all-in. He neither wants nor expects to get the banks' support. Clinton already has taken their money, and a lot of it -- which puts her in the awkward position of needing to seem like a reformer, without alienating the people she'd ostensibly be reforming.

Which brings us to the heart to of the issue.

Warren has yet to endorse a candidate. Financial reform is one of Warren's most important issues; and whoever she endorses will have to be seriously strong on Wall Street. Oh, and by the way, whoever she does endorse will quite probably seal up the nomination. For Clinton in particular, given progressives' skepticism about her ties to Wall Street, Warren's endorsement would be huge, and would also serve to deflate Sanders' campaign. For Sanders, it would hasten the tipping point moment he's likely already approaching.

There's still a lot that could happen, of course. But there's no mistaking how impactful Warren's support will be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With her remarks, Warren made it pretty clear that she's not buying Clinton's lukewarm financial-reform rhetoric, and that Clinton better shape up if she wants to have a hope of getting Warren's endorsement and the help of the powerful progressive movement Warren helped grow. Boom! The cannonball is, as it were, resoundingly in Clinton's court.

Of course, in reality it's hard to imagine Warren not endorsing Sanders. Their positions match up almost one for one. Just listen to Warren's list of progressive values at Netroots Nation '14; and compare that to Sanders' speech Friday at the Iowa Democratic party Hall of Fame Dinner, or in Madison, Wisconsin on July 1.

He and Warren are of one mind, and Warren has already spoken of Sanders in glowing terms: "I love what Bernie is talking about. I think all the presidential candidates should be out talking about the big issues." By contrast, progressives, and Warren chief among them, aren't sold on Clinton. Like a politician of the pre-internet age, Clinton knows how to say things that sound good. But she does not take the substantive positions she needs to, that modern information access requires. Sanders emphatically does. Here he is at length, from June 19 in Las Vegas:

Let me tell you, that when we use words like 'fraud', when we use words like 'irresponsibility', when we use terms like 'illegal activity', these are just other words for Wall Street. The greed, the insatiable greed on Wall Street, their recklessness, their irresponsible behavior, their illegal behavior, drove this country into the worst recession since the great depression. And let me tell you what very few other people will tell you. There are some candidates, and some folks who say, well, you know, we have to re-regulate Wall Street. The truth of the matter is that given the current politics of America, it is not Congress that regulates Wall Street, it is Wall Street that regulates Congress. If we are concerned about the power and destructive activities of Wall Street, the only solution is to break up these huge financial institutions. If a bank is too big to fail, that bank is too big to exist, we're gonna break 'em up.

If you watched the clip of Warren on Citigroup from the start of this article, that will all sound very familiar; and it makes it abundantly clear that she and Sanders are like two bank-busting peas in a financial reforming pod.

Clinton didn't show at this year's Netroots. Frankly, her campaign might not have survived the spectacle of her inevitable lukewarm reception. But her decision not to attend speaks volumes about what she knows about how progressives feel about her. She knows, and she is running scared.

Warren had said we needed to give Clinton a chance to prove herself, to demonstrate that she could be a progressive champion. Not so much, so far. And on Friday, Warren called Clinton out for falling short, and told her (and the rest of us) unequivocally that that chance is running out.

Clinton on Facebook: 'Black lives matter' and other takeaways // CNN // Eric Bradner & Dan Merica – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton declared Monday that "black lives matter," using the benefit of time to avoid the bitter responses her Democratic foes faced at a liberal conference over the weekend for their answers on racial justice.

In a Facebook chat, Clinton was asked what she would have said to the protesters had she attended Netroots Nation in Phoenix, Arizona.

"Black lives matter. Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that," she said.

With two days to gauge the reaction to former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley's on-stage declaration that "all lives matter" -- which protesters perceived as a slight to the issues they wanted candidates to address -- and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders' frustration with the protesters, Clinton took advantage of that hindsight and the more cautious medium.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality," Clinton wrote. "Black people across America still experience racism every day."

She said police officers everywhere should wear body cameras and called for alternatives to jail time for "low-level offenders," more money for early childhood education and automatic, universal voter registration.

In the question-and-answer session, Clinton revealed clues about her forthcoming Wall Street reform, student debt restructuring and capital gains tax policy proposals. She also offered glimpses of what it's like to get ready each morning and where she likes to go in Arkansas, and took shots at some of her Republican rivals on immigration.

1. "Short-termism has grown in urgency."

Clinton's campaign is evaluating a proposal to incentivize more long-term investing by raising the capital gains tax, an aide said Monday.

In particular, Clinton is expected to raise the tax rate for the shortest term investments -- currently 24% -- to above 28%, her aides said. During a 2008 debate, however, Clinton said that she would only raise the rate "above the 20% if I raised it at all. I would not raise it above what it was during the Clinton administration."

Clinton responded to a CNN question during the chat about the change, stating that "the increase in short-termism has grown in urgency since 2008, and the urgency of our solutions has to match it."

She pointed to an economic speech at The New School, a university in New York City, last week, during which she decried the short-term thinking of some corporations.

"Later this week, I will be outlining a number of proposals, including capital gains reform, to promote long term investment that will strengthen companies, workers, and communities," she wrote on Facebook Monday. "Both business leaders and labor leaders have been speaking out about this in recent years."

President Barack Obama proposed raising the investment tax rate for high-income households in his 2015 State of the Union speech to 28%. Clinton's aides said she would go higher.

2. "Give people a reason to improve the culture of their firms."

Asked about how she'd curtail Wall Street misconduct, Clinton offered a few specific policy proposals -- noting that Tuesday is the fifth anniversary of the Dodd-Frank financial regulatory reform law, and saying she wants to go further.

She said she would prosecute individuals responsible for fraud and other misdeeds, rather than just taking on their firms. She also called for an increase to whistleblower caps, which are currently limited to $1.6 million or less -- far less than the bonuses many Wall Street executives earn.

And she said that when firms are forced to pay fines for wrongdoing, those amounts should come out of the bonus checks that go to their executives.

3. "Amen, sister."

It wasn't all serious, as Clinton -- whose three decades in the limelight have hardened many Americans' views of her -- sought to show a more human side.

She said she loves Dickson Street in Fayetteville, Arkansas. She said she's "never met a pantsuit I didn't love." And she posted an image of Saturday Night Live's Kate McKinnon playing Clinton.

She also took a question about how she handles the daily task of getting ready in the morning -- which, the questioner said, generally takes women longer than men.

"Amen, sister -- you're preaching to the choir," Clinton wrote. "It's a daily challenge. I do the best I can -- and as you may have noticed, some days are better than others!"

4. "Good to see you in Arkansas on Saturday."

One of the biggest takeaways to the chat was the fact Clinton did it at all.

Since leaving the State Department in 2013, Clinton spent most of her time keeping the press -- and questions in general -- at arm's length. She did paid events where moderators asked her questions and she almost never spoke with reporters.

Since launching her campaign in April, though, Clinton has slowly grown more to the media. She held her first press conference in New Hampshire last month and conducted her first national interview with CNN earlier this month.

Monday's Facebook chat, her first as a candidate, is part of that evolution, particularly with the press. Clinton took four questions from reporters on Monday, including one from CNN. While the format is admittedly safe for politicians, the fact she answered questions from reporters is notable.

Hillary Clinton Criticizes 'Hair and Makeup Tax' on Women's Time // TIME // Ryan Beckwith – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton said that women have to work extra to get ready in the morning.

In an online question-and-answer session on Facebook, the former Secretary of State was asked about her morning routine by a female Facebook staffer who noted that she has to spend more than 30 minutes getting ready while her boyfriend "zips out the door."

"I wonder about how the 'hair and makeup tax' affects other women — especially ones I admire in high-pressure, public-facing jobs," asked Libby Brittain, who added that as a "young professional woman" she'd like to know how Clinton handles it while "staying focused on the 'real' work ahead."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton agreed that it's a problem.

"Amen, sister — you're preaching to the choir," she wrote. "It's a daily challenge. I do the best I can — and as you may have noticed, some days are better than others!"

Though lighthearted the exchange touched on a serious issue that has bothered Clinton for a while. During a town-hall meeting with students in Kyrgyzstan in 2010, Clinton was asked by a moderator if she had any favorite clothing designers. She responded by asking pointedly, "Would you ever ask a man that question?"

Though she makes lighthearted jokes about her love of pantsuits (later in the Q&A she noted she "never met a pantsuit I didn't love") , Clinton's decision to eschew major fashion choices puts her in line with President Obama, who told Vanity Fair in 2012 that he limits his clothing options to reduce the number of decisions he has to make in the morning.

"You'll see I wear only gray or blue suits," he said. "I'm trying to pare down decisions. I don't want to make decisions about what I'm eating or wearing. Because I have too many other decisions to make."

Clinton's response earned an enthusiastic response from Brittain.

Why Hillary's New Plan to Tax Investors Could Win Some Fans on Wall Street // Slate // Jordan Weissmann – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton is getting ready to unveil the next big plank of her economic platform this week, and it's all about taxing investors. Specifically, short-term investors—the sort who buy up stock in a company, push it to shower money on shareholders, then sell off their holdings. And believe it or not, some powerful figures in finance might actually support the idea.

While Clinton isn't spelling out her full plan until later this week, the Wall Street Journal revealed its broad strokes today. In short, the proposal would change how the government taxes capital gains by creating "a sliding scale" in which those who hold onto their assets the longest pay the lowest rates to the IRS.

Currently, when Americans sell investments such as stocks or bonds that they have owned for less than a year, the government taxes the profits like any other income, at a top rate of 39.6 percent. If they own their investments for more than a year before cashing in, however, they pay the long-term capital gains rate, which maxes out at 23.8 percent.

If you stop and think about this for a second, it's a little weird. According to our government, owning shares in a company for 364 days make you a short-term investor. But owning them for 366 days makes you a long-term investor. The divide is more or less arbitrary. Worse yet, a year isn't really a very lengthy time to hold stock. So while the tax code penalizes day traders and high-speed hedge funds, for instance, it treats everybody else pretty the same.

In some people's eyes, this has created a crisis of short-term thinking in corporate America, as CEOs focus on hitting their quarterly profit goals in order to appease equity owners who don't plan on hanging around for particularly long. Many single out activist investors who have prodded companies to spend lavishly returning cash to shareholders through stock buybacks and dividends, rather than devote money to new factories or product lines, which might be better for their future prospects, as well as the economy's. One especially prominent critic has been Larry Fink, the CEO of BlackRock, the world's largest money manager, with more than $4 trillion in assets. This spring, he wrote an open letter to the CEOs of the companies included in the S&P 500, urging them to resist demands from activists to simply hand back money at the expense of long-term growth.

In his missive, Fink suggested that the government should reform the tax code so that the long-term capital gains rate only kicks in after three years, "then to decrease the tax rate for each year of ownership beyond that, potentially dropping to zero after 10 years. This would create a profound incentive for more long-term holdings and could be designed to be revenue neutral."

Clinton's plan is apparently somewhat similar, though not as dramatic. She reportedly wants to add at least one extra capital gains rate, so that people who sell their Apple stock or Treasury bonds after just two or three years would pay somewhere north of 28 percent on their returns. That way, the tax code would have a short-term, mid-term, and long-term rate. The plan hasn't been finalized yet, however, and could include more than three tiers.

As for how much money this would bring in for Washington, well, it's not clear. Unless Clinton plans to lower the long-term rate below its current level, the proposal would almost certainly create some new revenue, largely from wealthy taxpayers, since they earn a disproportionate share of the nation's capital income. But “the campaign didn’t estimate how much in additional taxes the proposal would raise,” the Journal reports. “The official said the primary goal is to change behavior, not increase revenue.”

But even though the details are still pending, the plan is of a piece with an emerging theme in Clinton's economic philosophy, which I've been calling feel-good capitalism—the idea that the free market just needs a little nudge to work better for everybody. Last week, she unveiled her tax plan meant to encourage companies to share profits with their workers (underlying message: profits are good, but spread them around a bit, Mr. CEO). This week, it's giving us a plan to hike capital gains taxes that, theoretically, one of the world's most powerful investors might even like.

But if Larry Fink ends up feeling good about it, alas, progressives might be another matter.

5 key takeaways from Hillary Clinton’s Facebook Q&A // MSNBC // Nisha Chittal – July 20, 2015

On Monday afternoon, Hillary Clinton held her first Facebook Q&A of her campaign, answering questions from voters and journalists on a post on her official Facebook page. Clinton’s responses were signed with an “-H” at the end to signal that Clinton herself had personally written the message, rather than a staffer managing the page.

Clinton’s post received thousands of questions, of which she answered a handful, addressing racial inequality, responding to recent comments from Republican leaders, addressing student loan debt and more. Here are some of the key takeaways from the chat:

1. She addressed the Black Lives Matter questions raised at Netroots Nation. When asked how she would have responded to the Black Lives Matter protesters who interrupted her opponents Martin O’Malley and Bernie Sanders on Saturday, Clinton responded: “Black lives matter. Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that. We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality. Black people across America still experience racism every day.

Since this campaign started, I’ve been talking about the work we must do to address the systemic inequities that persist in education, in economic opportunity, in our justice system. But we have to do more than talk - we have to take action. For example - we should make sure every police department in the U.S. has body cameras. We should provide alternatives to incarceration for low-level offenders. We should invest in early childhood education for every child. We should fight for voting rights and universal voter registration. You will continue to hear me talking about these issues throughout this campaign and pushing for real solutions.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. She responded to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, who said of Clinton that "The gender card alone isn't enough." When asked what her response to McConnell's comments would be, Clinton said: "Wow. If that's what he said, Mitch McConnell really doesn't get it. There is a gender card being played in this campaign. It's played every time Republicans vote against giving women equal pay, deny families access to affordable child care or family leave, refuse to let women make decisions about their health or have access to free contraception. These aren't just women's issues, they are economic issues that drive growth and affect all Americans. Anyone who doesn't get that doesn't understand what our lives are like."

3. She took shots at Republican presidential candidates Donald Trump, Jeb Bush, and Marco Rubio on immigration. Commenter Jasmine Perez asked if Clinton would make it easier for undocumented immigrants to have a pathway to citizenship. Clinton responded: "Yes. This is a big difference I have with most of the Republican candidates. Donald Trump in particular is getting a lot of attention for some hateful rhetoric, but Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio actually agree with him on denying a pathway to citizenship and consigning hardworking immigrants to second class status. I will fight for comprehensive immigration reform that includes that pathway to citizenship."

4. She promised to make the student loan debt crisis a priority from "the first day I become president"." A commenter who is a student told of chipping away at his student loan debt and asked what Hillary Clinton would do as president to curb the burden that many students are facing. Clinton responded: "I'll be putting forward specific proposals to refinance debt so it becomes more affordable, encourage more people to use income contingency repayment program so you are paying back as a percentage of what you actually earn, to try to make college more affordable to start with so that students today and tomorrow don't end up with the amount of debt you and 40 million other Americans currently have. This is one of my biggest economic and educational priorities and I will be addressing it from the first day I become president."

5. And finally: she's still making pantsuit jokes a part of her carefully crafted communications strategy. When asked a question about her favorite pantsuit, she responded: "I never met a pantsuit I didn't like." Previously, she launched her Instagram account with a photo of red, white, and blue pantsuits and the caption "Hard choices." She also has "pantsuit aficionado" in her Twitter bio. (We get it, you like pantsuits!)

Sanders putting pressure on Clinton in Democratic contest // McClatchy // Anita Kumar – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton never utters his name.

But Bernie Sanders is always there. Garnering the largest crowds of the presidential race. Raising millions of dollars, more than nearly every other candidate of either party. And boasting a following that can only be described as intense.

Over the weekend, he received a raucous reception in the early nominating state of Iowa at the first joint appearance of the Democratic candidates, with supporters banging their fists on the table, clinking silverware against glasses and interrupting him with their enthusiasm. "Preach!" shouted one woman.

Clinton still boasts the highest poll numbers and a record amount of money raised. Now the surprising popularity of Sanders, the 73-year-old self-described socialist who relishes being a champion of the underpaid, overworked American worker, means Clinton will have to spend money and effort for a nomination many assumed was hers for the taking.

"Bernie is authentic," said Kurt Meyer, Democratic chairman of a trio of rural counties in north-central Iowa, who has not endorsed a candidate. "He has a fervor in his message that connects with people."

In late May, the senator from Vermont appeared at a community center in the tiny town of Kensett in Meyer's part of the state. The campaign had hoped to lure 100 people, more than a third of the town's population, but 300 showed up. Meyer said the supporters were so enthusiastic organizers decided to pass a bucket to raise money. They collected $1,200.

On Saturday, Sanders drew more than 11,000 people to a rally in downtown Phoenix, his largest crowd yet, to hear him blast this nation's income inequality, "billionaire class" and big, unaccountable money in politics.

Sanders' strengths – rallies attracting thousands, more money from small donors reflecting support from everyday Americans, an enthusiastic Twitter following that uses the hashtag #FeeltheBern – have taken some Clinton supporters by surprise even as they insist they always knew she'd have to work for the nomination.

"It concerns me," said Donald Fowler, a former Democratic National Committee chairman who is close to the Clintons. He does not think it will cause Clinton to lose the nomination. "She'll be fine," he said.

Still, Fowler said he hopes she learns some lessons from Sanders about the importance of holding larger events and speaking matter-of-factly about working Americans. "I think she needs to create an emotional link to average Democrats," he said.

Clinton delivered one of her most aggressive speeches at a party dinner Friday in Cedar Rapids, earning sustained applause and chants of "Hill-a-ree!" She did so by blasting the Republican candidates for president, not mentioning her closest Democratic rival.

Sanders gave his own passionate speech, which began with his voice raised right from the start, as he referred to a "political revolution" and said over and over "enough is enough!"

Nicholas Johnson, a former Federal Communications Commission commissioner who teaches at the University of Iowa, said he is more enthusiastic about Sanders than any other candidate he has supported since the 1940s.

Johnson, clad in a light blue "Bernie for President" T-shirt, described Clinton as the establishment candidate. "I think the establishment is the problem," he said.

Oftentimes, Sanders' supporters appeared to be more enthusiastic than Clinton's, though the cheers were only coming from parts of the room, a sign his progressive views do not appeal to all Democrats.

"I don't think he can unite the party," said Joni Gillispie, 58, of Burlington, who wore one Hillary Clinton button, one Bill Clinton button and one of the couple. "He's going to take the moderates and drive then over to the other side."

Several Democratic activists said they prefer Sanders, but are conflicted because they think Clinton is the one who could beat a Republican candidate.

"We want someone who can win," said Dallas Knapp, 20, a student at Loras College in Dubuque who grew up in Bloomington, Ill.

Clinton maintains a big lead in polls nationally. She leads in early primary states as well, though Sanders is gaining there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Andrew Smith, the director of the University of New Hampshire Survey Center, cautioned not to read too much into Sanders' numbers. He said historically that 35 to 45 percent of the Democrat electorate in New Hampshire usually favors a non-establishment candidate, such as Howard Dean, Bill Bradley or Gary Hart, but that doesn't mean they will win. "What you are seeing with Bernie Sanders is not unusual," he said.

And Sanders' enthusiasm does not necessarily translate into having the infrastructure to run a nationwide campaign.

Clinton has dispatched more than 100 paid staffers across the nation to recruit volunteers. Sanders is still ramping up in early states and non-existent in other states.

In North Carolina, state party chairwoman Patsy Keever said many liberals are excited about Sanders though he does not have a presence there.

In Florida, another key swing state, the party's executive director, Scott Arceneaux, said he has seen a lot of activity from Clinton's campaign, including the arrival of a paid organizer, a visit by campaign manager Robby Mook and an appearance by Clinton herself. Other candidates have been there for fundraising, but not much else.

Arceneaux said Sanders' campaign just contacted him last week to tell him the campaign had hired a Southern regional staffer and are starting to build up. But Arceneaux said it will be hard to compete with Clinton.

"The Clintons are very popular in Florida," he said.

Given 2 days to think, Hillary Clinton outdoes her opponents in responding to #BlackLivesMatter // VOX //
Dara Lind – July 20, 2015

Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders went to the progressive conference Netroots Nation over the weekend to try to establish themselves as the progressive alternative to Hillary Clinton. They ended up performing poorly in their confrontations with #BlackLivesMatter activists. Monday, in a Facebook Q&A, Clinton seized the opportunity to come off as more progressive than her would-be progressive challengers:

The two Democratic presidential candidates who appeared at the conference, Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, got confronted by progressive activists affiliated with the #BlackLivesMatter movement. And neither of them responded terribly well: O'Malley accidentally echoed the opponents of #BlackLivesMatter, while Sanders's crankiness didn't exactly ease frustrations with him or his supporters.

RelatedWhy O'Malley had to apologize after his confrontation with protesters……and why Sanders's reaction led to his supporters getting mocked on Twitter

Hillary Clinton got to skip out on all of that drama. And when she finally got asked how she would have responded, during a Facebook Q&A on Monday afternoon, she didn't just have the benefit of the extra 48 hours and a polite questioner — she (and her campaign) had the advantage of being able to think through the response as it was typed. So it's hardly surprising that Hillary's typed response was more respectful to the #BlackLivesMatter movement than O'Malley or Sanders's attempts to respond to the protesters:

Of course, it's impossible to know whether Clinton would have been as calm and respectful if she'd been on stage instead of O'Malley when protesters took the microphone Saturday for an impromptu presentation on the deaths of black women in police custody. But her response is consistent with her campaign so far: Clinton has a "tough on crime" history, but her 2016 campaign has made a visible effort to embrace reforms in criminal justice and policing, and to talk about racial disparities in doing so.

This doesn't mean that #BlackLivesMatter protesters will never come after Hillary Clinton at some future event. But what happened over the weekend doesn't appear to have been a wake-up call for her campaign; rather, it was the culmination of something they appear to have been preparing for.

Hillary Clinton's capital gains tax reform, explained // VOX // Matthew Yglesias – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton's next big policy idea is going to be a revamp of how investment income is taxed in the United States — aimed at creating a new system that raises more revenue while maintaining and even enhancing the tax incentive for patient investors who care about the long-term future of the companies they are invested in. According to Laura Meckler and John McKinnon, a more detailed proposal along these lines will come out in a speech this week, though the exact nuances either haven't been finalized or aren't yet ready to be leaked.

The basic shape of the proposal, however, is looking pretty clear. It will raise tax revenue, mostly from rich people, and maybe undercut some of the emphasis on short-term financial results on Wall Street and in corporate America.

What's a capital gain? How is it taxed?

A capital gain is income that a person makes from investment. If you buy a house for $200,000 and sell it 10 years later for $250,000, you have scored a $50,000 capital gain. The current tax code largely exempts capital gains earned buying and selling owner-occupied houses, so the debate over capital gains taxation generally focuses on capital gains secured by buying and selling stocks, bonds, and other financial assets.

Right now the tax code distinguishes between short-term capital gains and long-term capital gains. A short-term capital gain is defined as a gain on an asset that you owned for less than a year, while a long-term capital gain is defined as a gain on an asset that you owned for longer than a year. Short-term capital gains are taxed at the same rate as wage or salary income, but long-term capital gains are taxed at a lower rate.

In other words, the current tax code already features lower tax rates for income derived from long-term capital gains than for income derived from other sources. Clinton is proposing, essentially, to extend the logic of the current system, not to replace it with a whole new logic.

Why is capital gains income taxed at a lower rate?

There are three big explanations for the current system — a cynical one, one grounded in political rhetoric, and an economics-y one:

The cynical take is that capital gains income receives a tax preference because the vast majority of capital gains income is earned by rich people. And not just any old kind of rich person. A movie star or LeBron James is still mostly working for a living. It takes a classy kind of rich person to have big stock market earnings.

The rhetorical reason typically offered is that, as the American Enterprise Institute's James Pethokoukis says, capital gains taxes are a "double tax." The idea is that first Mr. Richpants gets paid a salary and pays taxes on it. Then he takes some of his after-tax dollars and invests them in the stock market. Then when he sells his stock, he is "taxed again" on his earnings in a way that would not have happened had he spent the money on a boat rather than invested it in the stock market.

The economics-y reason is a result in theoretical macroeconomics stemming from work by Christophe Chamley and Kenneth Judd that shows that under appropriate assumptions, the socially optimal level of investment taxation is zero. The result involves a lot of math, but the intuitive idea is that the less you tax investments in capital goods, the more capital goods you get. And the more capital goods you have, the higher your wages will be. Consequently, even people who derive all their income from wages benefit in the long run from not taxing capital income. Garrett Jones has a slightly longer explanation featuring light math if you are interested.

What is Hillary Clinton proposing to do?

We don't yet know exactly what her campaign will do. But the basic idea is to make it harder to qualify for "long-term" capital gains status. The simplest way to do this would be to push the threshold out and say that instead of holding an investment for at least one year, you need to hold it for three years or five years. After all, 18 months is not especially "long-term" in the scheme of things.

But based on the Wall Street Journal's reporting, it seems as if Clinton's team is leaning toward a more complicated solution in which there will be three or many levels of long-termness, each with its own rate.

Is the case for low capital taxation correct?

Needless to say, people disagree. In practice, there appears to be very strong political consensus around preferential treatment for investment income. Even very liberal members of Congress, for example, do not propose ending the exemption of capital gains income from the payroll tax that finances Social Security. Nor do liberal members of Congress propose to end the exemption of profits made by selling owner-occupied homes from capital gains taxation. Countries all around the world feature some form of preferential treatment of investment income, and despite the partisan controversies around the capital gains tax rate nobody in American politics is actually proposing to do away entirely with our own preferential treatment.

That said, as is typical with highly theoretical results in macroeconomics, there are massive challenges in saying whether the Chamley-Judd construct applies in a meaningful way to the actual policy choice at hand. As economist Matthew Martin writes, "Any graduate macro text will show you some of the ways in which Chamley-Judd assumptions are violated in reality, producing a non-zero optimal tax rate."

Empirical studies also struggle to confirm the idea that tax rates on investment income are an important driver of real investment activity. A recent, statistically sophisticated study of the 2003 dividend tax cut by Danny Yagan, for example, finds that "the tax cut caused zero change in corporate investment."

Note, however, that even if the optimal tax rate for capital gains isn't zero it might still be optimal to have a lower rate on investment income than on wage income.

Why is Hillary Clinton proposing this?

Rather typically for Clinton as a political actor, what she seems to be zeroing in on is a clever way to build consensus between competing factions of wonks.

By raising tax rates on medium-term capital gains, Clinton will raise a bunch of tax revenue, and she will raise it overwhelmingly from high-income individuals. These are key demands of liberals, who are hungry for social spending and redistribution.

At the same time, by maintaining the low rate on longer-term capital gains, Clinton avoids a root-and-branch challenge to the principle of a tax preference for investment.

Clinton has been critical lately of what she calls "quarterly capitalism" and the idea that real world investment activity is being excessively influenced by short-term stock market fluctuations and earnings targets. Her altered tax system would make it more lucrative to be a patient investor than an impatient one, which might help generate an overall more patient climate on Wall Street — boosting corporate investment and fostering more long-term thinking.

A serious venture capitalist, for example, would almost certainly find himself still qualifying for the preferential rate. But a corporate raider looking to buy a company, strip assets, improve quarterly results, and then exit as quickly as possible would not.

Expect the campaign to front-load this short-term versus long-term issue, since it's emerging as a key theme for Clinton overall. But also note that in theory one could accomplish the same thing with a tax cut. Take today's rate for investments held over one year and apply it to investments held for one to three years. Take longer-term investments and apply a new lower rate to them. This would address the short-termism concern, while also addressing the GOP's opposition to higher taxes.

Clinton won't offer a proposal along those lines because for her, tax revenue and tax system progressivity are at least as important as the short-term versus long-term issue.

Hillary Clinton: Take away executives' bonuses when their companies break the rules // VOX // Jonathan Allen – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton wants executives to forfeit bonus money when their companies are fined for misconduct.

The frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination unveiled the proposal in a Facebook Q&A session Monday.

"Too often it seems like the people responsible get off with limited consequences (or none at all). Even when they've already pocketed the gains," Clinton said. "That's wrong and it has to change."

She laid out a three-part plan to do that.

1) Appoint and empower tough, independent-minded regulators and give them the resources they need to do their jobs.

2) Make sure that good people have real incentives to come forward and report illegal activity by raising the whistleblower caps so they're actually effective.

3) Make sure that when corporations pay fines to the government for wrongdoing, those fines cut into the bonuses of the executives who should have been accountable or should have caught the problem.

The proposals are part of Clinton's larger economic platform, which she has been constructing in piecemeal fashion in recent days. The Wall Street Journal reported Monday that she wants to raise certain capital gains taxes in part to encourage long-term investment over short-term profits.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Under current law, whistleblower awards are capped at $1.6 million. Former Attorney General Eric Holder, who settled a slew of cases against banks, suggested increasing awards late last year.

Clinton did not get into the specific mechanisms she would use to empower regulators, boost compensation for whistleblowers, and penalize executives for corporate misbehavior. Congress would have to act in all three areas, as the Senate confirms regulators and both chambers write laws governing the finance industry.

Hillary Clinton gives support for racial justice by saying 'black lives matter' // NY Daily News // Dan Friedman – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton said Monday that "black lives matter," in a nod to activists pressing Democrats to adopt tough rhetoric on racial justice.

The former secretary of state was responding to a reporter's question during a Facebook chat. He asked what she would have told progressive activists at Netroots Nation, a progressive conference that Clinton declined to attend.

"Black lives matter. Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that," Clinton wrote. "We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality. Black people across America still experience racism every day."

Clinton called for body cameras on all police officers, prison reform, universal early childhood education and expansion of voting rights as steps for countering the effects of racism.

Clinton is among the Democrats who have taken flak in recent weeks for saying "all lives matter" — a response that some activists say is inadequate.

Former Gov. Martin O'Malley (R) had to apologize when he told demonstrators: 'Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter.'

Former Maryland governor and presidential candidate Martin O'Malley drew boos recently for telling demonstrators: "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter."

O'Malley later apologized.

Clinton used the Facebook chat to rip Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) after he was quoted saying that "the gender card isn't alone enough" for her to become President.

"Wow," Clinton wrote. "If that's what he said, Mitch McConnell really doesn't get it. There is a gender card being played in this campaign. It's played every time Republicans vote against giving women equal pay, deny families access to affordable child care or family leave, refuse to let women make decisions about their health or have access to free contraception."

Hillary Clinton zeroes in on capital gains: About-face? // Christian Science Monitor // Jessica Mendoza –

July 20, 2015

The Democratic presidential contender will propose an overhaul to capital gains taxes that would tax some short-term investments at a higher rate in a bid to emphasize long-term growth, a campaign official said Monday.

The proposal, which Mrs. Clinton is set to lay out in a speech later this week, is part of the former secretary of State's effort to distinguish herself when it comes to economic policy from her rivals in both the Republican and Democratic parties. Her approach, she said in a recent address, will be focused on "growth and fairness" in order to get the economy moving again full-speed.

Recommended: How much do you know about Hillary Rodham Clinton? Take our quiz.

The new proposal, first reported by the Wall Street Journal, is one of a number of measures designed to address what some experts see as corporate strategy's excessive focus on quick profits, including capital gains – the profits made on selling capital assets such as shares or real estate.

Though still being finalized, the plan would create a sliding rate scale that would depend on the length of time an investment is held, according to the Journal.

Investments held for two to three years would be taxed higher than the 28 percent President Obama proposed earlier this year for top earners, who at present have a 23.8 percent capital-gains tax rate. Rates for investments held less than a year, which currently top out at 39.6 percent for the highest earners, would remain the same, the Journal reported.

The plan would also include other rate changes, with the lowest rates provided for investments held the longest.

The proposal appears to be a shift from Clinton's stance when she last sought the party's nomination in 2008. Then, she vowed not to raise capital gains tax rates above 20 percent, if at all.

The plan, however, is in line with Clinton's attempt at setting herself and her policies apart from her rivals. During last week's speech in New York, Clinton talked about the need to support workers, particularly women in the workforce, and reform financial institutions.

Her speech met a lukewarm response from both Wall Street and its reformers, and some see her upcoming address on capital gains to be more of the same.

"My gut instinct is this is going to sound good but it's not going to change very much," Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a Republican economist, told the Journal. "It's just not that powerful." He noted that the tax code already requires investments to be held for a year and is skeptical about how much difference increasing the time period would make.

But some say there's potential in Clinton's approach.

Heather Boushey, executive director and chief economist at the Washington Center for Equitable Growth, told CNN that Clinton is "laying out an agenda that looks at what inequality means for families up and down the income distribution, what we can do to fix it, and it's really exciting to see a politician take up a very serious set of research ideas and bring them into the public debate."

Bush and Clinton highlight sharp contrast in dueling policy speeches // LA Times // David Lauter – July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush pledged to cut government spending by reforming the "culture in our nation's capital" in a speech Monday that hit themes long popular with conservative voters, including a balanced-budget amendment to the Constitution and a freeze in pay for many government workers.

The speech drew a sharp contrast in tone and content with Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, who has begun rolling out a series of policy proposals, many of which would involve expanding government's role.

Clinton, in a speech a week ago outlining her economic ideas, called for what she termed a "growth and fairness economy," one in which she would harness the power of the federal government in an effort to "raise incomes for hardworking Americans so they can afford a middle-class life." She criticized "arbitrary growth targets untethered to people's lives and livelihoods," an implicit censure of Bush's pledge that the economy would grow at a rate of 4% under his presidency.

Bush, by contrast, made clear that he sees government as the problem and economic growth as the measure of success.

"We've learned by now that you can have a fast-expanding economy or you can have a fast-expanding government, but you can't have both," he said in his speech in Tallahassee, where he served as Florida's governor for eight years. "You have to choose.

"For anyone who wants to see a federal government even bigger, even farther removed from those it is supposed to serve, the other party will be offering that option," Bush said. "It will not be my intention to preside over the establishment, but in every way I know to disrupt that establishment and make it accountable to the people."

Bush's call to change the nature of Washington seemed designed to reassert his conservative credentials in a GOP primary race in which he faces several candidates to his right. But it also struck a potentially discordant note, given that the government he criticized for its "habitual practice of deficit spending" was headed by his brother President George W. Bush for eight years during which deficits sharply worsened.

Jeb Bush's pledge to "turn off the automatic switch on discretionary spending increases" also struck an odd note. That category of spending, which covers federal spending governed by annual appropriations bills, has been shrinking as a share of the budget. Bush said that he would propose ideas later for the entitlement programs, such as Social Security and Medicare, that account for most of the long-term growth in federal spending.

Many of Bush's ideas were longtime conservative staples, including the balanced-budget amendment, a line-item veto that would allow a president to strike specific items from spending bills, a 10% reduction in the size of the federal workforce over the first five years of his presidency, and moves to freeze the pay of many government workers and make them easier to fire.

But he included a new idea likely to meet strong resistance from many Republicans and Democrats in Congress: He would push for a six-year ban on any member of Congress becoming a lobbyist.

Under Bush's plan, the definition of "lobbying" would be expanded to cover "the ambiguous class of consultants who lobby but call it something else." His plan, if Congress were to adopt it, would cut off a lucrative path that many senior members from both parties have followed into the private sector.

Bush also proposed cutting off the pay of members of Congress who don't show up for votes. The idea came with an unspoken, but unmistakable, subtext: His rivals for the nomination include four sitting senators who, as a group, have missed dozens of roll calls while out campaigning.

In Facebook Chat, Hillary Clinton Says 'Black Lives Matter' // NBC News // Carrie Dann – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton said Monday that "everyone in this country should stand firmly behind" the idea that "black lives matter," just days after two of her Democratic rivals faced protests about racial justice at a liberal conference in Phoenix, Arizona.

In a Facebook chat, Clinton was asked by a Washington Post reporter what she would have said to the activists at Netroots Nation, which the former Secretary of State declined to attend.

"Black lives matter. Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that," she replied. "We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality. Black people across America still experience racism every day."

In her response, Clinton also cited body cameras for police, reforms to the nation's prison system, a push for expanded voting rights and universal early childhood education as issues that she will tackle in order to address structural racism.

The comments by Clinton Monday represent something a do-over for the 2016 presidential contender. Last month, she was criticized for saying the phrase "all lives matter" at a historic black church in Missouri.

Her remarks in the Facebook chat appeared to be a contrast to responses from Democratic presidential candidates Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, who both faced jeers from the protesters at the conference on Saturday.

O'Malley was booed for telling demonstrators "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter."

Activists in the protest movement say that statements like "all lives matter" take away from a specific focus on the violence that African Americans have faced at the hands of police.

O'Malley later apologized for his statement, saying "I did not understand the tremendous passion, commitment and feeling and depth of feeling that all of us should be attaching to this issue."

Sanders, who is generally viewed as a favorite of the Netroots Nation community, also faced complaints and shouting from protesters as he tried to deliver a speech largely focused on economic inequality.

"Black lives, of course, matter. I spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights and for dignity," he said.

Does Hillary Clinton have a small donor problem? // The Week // Paul Waldman – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The presidential candidates this week released their fundraising numbers for the second quarter, and while this kind of thing is usually only of interest to the most strung-out political junkie, there are some revealing tidbits within the tidal wave of cash.

A lot of people like to focus on the number of small donors a candidates gets, the presumption being that small donors are better indicators of grassroots support than big donors. For instance, The New York Times on Thursday noted that Hillary Clinton got a smaller portion of her funds from small donors than the likes of Ted Cruz and Bernie Sanders, and presented it as evidence of a troubling weakness. The relative dearth of such donors "could represent a financial and strategic liability for Mrs. Clinton if she were to win the nomination," the paper wrote.

But here's a question: Is there a serious political analyst out there who thinks that Hillary Clinton's problem is that her campaign won't have enough money?

If you ask a campaign why small donors are important, you quickly notice that the answers all emphasize not the donation itself, but what it represents or what it might lead to in the future. The first thing campaign operatives always say is, "It shows the incredible enthusiasm thousand of Americans have for this candidacy." Then they'll tell you how donors will turn into volunteers who can turn out other people to vote. Then they'll talk about the potential of a small donor who hasn't "maxed out" by giving the $2,700 limit, meaning the campaign can keep coming back to ask the donor for more money.

In other words, you might be able to turn the small donor into a big donor (the kind of donor you're supposed to pretend you don't like in the first place). But other than the symbolism of getting more donations from reg'lar folks, there's no reason the campaign wouldn't rather just have all the money up front.

And symbolism is what it is. Barack Obama's 2008 campaign is thought of as the most people-powered in recent history, with an unprecedented amount of citizen engagement. Which in many ways it was. But more people actually gave to Obama in 2012, when he was an incumbent running a somewhat less inspirational campaign. The Obama campaign reported that it received donations from 4.4 million people in 2012, up from 3.95 million in 2008.

That's a lot of people, without question. But if we divide that into the number of votes Obama got, we see that in 2008, one out of every 17.6 people who voted for Obama gave him a donation, which rose to one out of every 15 in 2012. Every candidate has many more supporters than donors, and it's the votes that count in the end.

The truth is that Obama raised huge amounts of money from everywhere — small donors, big donors, ordinary people, Wall Street, and every other source you could imagine. But the candidate powered by small donors is a certain type, and it isn't the type that usually wins. The candidates getting the highest proportion of their funds from small donors so far in this election are Bernie Sanders, Ben Carson, and Rand Paul. They all have a committed yet finite group of supporters, and a limited appeal to the big-money donors because of their less than overwhelming chances of winning.

So if you were a Republican running for president, which candidate would you rather be: Rand Paul, who got 65 percent of his funds from small donors, or Jeb Bush, who got a paltry 3 percent? Well, when you learn that Paul raised $6.9 million, while Bush raised $114 million, mostly through his super PAC, the answer seems pretty clear.

As for Hillary Clinton, I wouldn't worry too much about her. I have a feeling that she's going to have no trouble finding lots of donors, big and small. Consider that we really haven't yet seen much of a discussion about the possibility of electing the first woman president in American history. But presuming she's the nominee, as Election Day approaches and that possibility becomes real and urgent, don't be surprised if millions of women decide to write her a check for $50 or $100 — especially when eruptions of misogynistic bile come spewing from all manner of conservatives, which they most certainly will.

Hillary Clinton is going to have many challenges in her quest for the White House, but having enough money is probably not going to be one of them.

Hillary Clinton's Capital Gains Changes Won't Make A Blind Bit Of Difference To Short-Termism // Forbes // Tim Worstall – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton is to suggest higher taxes on short term capital gains it seems. The aim being to make people invest for the longer term, and counter what is seen as the dreadfully short term nature of most decision making in the marketplace. It's not going to make a blind bit of difference of course for the suggestion itself ignores a very basic economic fact about investment markets: they are forward looking. That is, the value of whatever is going to happen into the future is already priced in, with some appropriate risk taking, to the price today. Thus absolutely no shareholder can be investing on a short term basis: the value of that investment reflects the effects of whatever is being done out into the far future. Thus there's no actual problem with short termism: it's simply not logically possible.

Not that that's going to stop our Hillary of course:

Hillary Clinton will propose a revamp of capital-gains taxes that would hit some short-term investors with higher rates, part of a package of measures designed to prod companies to put more emphasis on long-term growth, a campaign official said.

The proposal, to be laid out in a speech later this week, is one of a number of ideas designed to tackle what Mrs. Clinton, some economists and some on Wall Street consider the overly short-term focus of corporate strategy. Other topics will include the risks and benefits of shareholder activism and the role of executive compensation.

Whether the corporation is investing short or long term is an interesting and important question. But the proposal isn't to change the amount that corporations are taxed. Rather, the proposal is to change the rates at which investors are taxed, based not on how long the company invests for, but how long the investor holds the stock for. And there's simply no connection between those two things. For the value of a stock reflects the general opinion of what is the net present value of all future income from holding that stock. Whether stockholders hold it for one month or 5 years doesn't change that basic determinant of the price. Thus changing how they're taxed based on the length of their holding makes no difference.

There's a quick test that can be done on this too. Capital gains tax rates in my native UK have always been different from those in the US. Currently in the US you must hold for a year to get that capital rate: profits from holdings held for less than that pay normal income tax rates (so this is nothing at all to do with HFT). In the UK there have always been lower rates for capital gains and there's been no minimum holding period for them either. What's happened?

Based on the NYSE index data, the mean duration of holding period by US investors was around 7 years in 1940. This stayed the same for the next 35 years.Â The average holding period had fallen to under 2 years by the time of the 1987 crash. By the turn of the century it had fallen to below one year. It was around 7 months by 2007.

Similar pattern exists in the UK also as shown in the chart above. There the average duration has fallen from around 5 years in the mid-1960s to less than 7.5 months in 2007.

If very different tax laws produce the same outcome then it's probably not the tax law influencing the outcome, is it?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What we've really got here is something that has become the conventional wisdom among Very Serious People (as Paul Krugman calls them), that people holding stocks for short periods of time is a bad idea and something must be done. Here is something, let's do it: without anyone actually thinking through the details of either the supposed problem or the proposed solution.

It is the companies that we're interested in investing for the long term. How long their investors hold a stock for makes no difference to that. And no, the hunger for more dividends or stock buybacks now also makes no difference to the level of the stock price if they don't arrive. For those markets are indeed forward looking. A company that (credibly) promises $1 billion in profits in 5 years' time is worth more than one which is paying out $100 million a year for the next five years. Because we discount those two different profit streams down to the net present value and that's what determines what the stock price is. That is, appropriately adjusted for the risk that the world won't turn out like we think it will, the value of those long term decisions at the company level is already incorporated into the current prices at which the short term holders of the stock are trading.

Changing how things are taxed at the investor level will make no difference at all to that: nor will they make any difference at all to the time horizons over which the corporations invest.

This is a non-solution based on an ignorance how the markets work. How unusual that Hillary should fall for it...

Jeb Bush And Hillary Clinton Love The Rich Without Knowing It // Forbes // John Tamny – July 20, 2015

An urban myth that survives to this day is the one about Henry Ford and the high wages he paid his employees. We learn in history class and out in the wider world that Ford compensated his employees well so that they would buy his cars. Who cares that Ford sold exponentially more cars than he had employees, the myth lives on.

In truth, and as Mark Spitznagel writes about Ford Motor Company in his spectacular 2013 book The Dao of Capital, "When profits swelled, he paid well for labor, creating an uproar when he doubled the basic wage to $5.00 a day, which triggered a virtual stampede of job seekers." Was Ford simply feeling generous, or better yet, "altruistic"? No, he was actually feeling profit motivated. Thanks to annual employee turnover of 370% in 1913, it was too expensive for Ford to do anything but overpay his employees. As Spitznagel put it, Ford "effectively lowered his costs because higher wages reduced turnover and the need for constant training of new hires."

A century-old story of a great American businessman rises in importance thanks to the presidential candidacies of Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton. While they're not terribly similar in terms of policies, each has chosen to pander to an apparently easy to gull middle class. Bush has talked about "growth that lifts up the middle class" as opposed to just the rich, while Clinton has called for tax increases on the rich given her view that boosting incomes for all Americans is "the defining economic challenge of our time." Just last week, and in the rollout of her economic plan, Clinton said to boisterous applause that "Hard working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they help produce."

Were both Clinton and Bush more economically literate, and perhaps a bit more honest, they would correctly say that the best and only way to achieve their goals would be to substantially reduce the tax burden foisted on the rich and big corporations alike. Nothing could be simpler, yet each candidate seems rather eager to not be seen as too cozy with the successful. That's odd, and not just when we consider the net worth of Clinton and Bush, along with those donating to Clinton and Bush.

To see why, we need only return to Ford. Lest we forget, it was rising profits that made it possible for him to initially offer raises to his employees. It's expensive for companies to lose workers, it's also expensive for them to pay taxes, so why not substantially reduce the tax burden levied on corporations so that they have more in the way of funds to actively bid up the wages of workers?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Clinton remains skeptical, she need only ask her many very well-to-do supporters in Hollywood about how they respond to taxes. They'll tell her that they actively shop their movies to all 50 state film offices with an eye on securing the best tax deal ahead of uncapping the camera lens. This matters to middle class workers because as the increasingly libertarian actor Rob Lowe recalled in his 2011 book Stories I Only Tell My Friends:

"It takes an army to make a movie. Camera crews, lighting crews, wardrobe crews, makeup crews, hair crews, painters, builders (called grips), a crew to provide the props, a crew to provide the furnishings (the art department), electricians, special-effects people, stunt performers…."

Readers surely get the picture, as should Clinton and Bush. As Lowe's quote makes quite clear, there are a lot of well-paid middle class jobs created when movie moguls and studios get to keep more of their money. And as the Ford example yet again makes plain, this is true for all industries.

Back to Bush, and judging by some of his stop staffers, it's apparent that his middle class rhetoric is rooted in the naïve notion promoted by self-styled "Reform Conservatives" that tax cuts for the rich are yesterday's news. The "Reformicons," ever eager to buy middle class votes, think Bush should focus on lifting the middle class boat. With the failed presidency of Bush's brother George oddly in mind, the political idea seems to be to "put money in their [middle class] pockets." Its failings are quickly obvious.

What Bush and Clinton must understand, and this is an ironclad tautology, is that there are quite simply no companies and no jobs without investment first. There's no debating the latter. Those who think they can should move on. It's a debate they'll lose.

Applied to middle class pandering, precisely because their pockets aren't as deep as those of rich individuals and corporations, tax cuts for middle earners have nowhere near the positive impact of tax reductions geared toward individuals and businesses in possession of wealth that is exponentially more abundant. With the pockets of the truly rich so deep that they generally can't get anywhere close to the bottom of same, tax reductions meant to allow them to hold onto their wealth boosts the economic chances of those not rich rather quickly.

Why is this? Since they almost by definition can't spend it all, the wealth of the superrich doesn't lay untouched; rather it's deposited in banks, invested in the stock market, or placed in private equity or venture capital funds. In short, the wealth of the rich, when left in the hands of the rich, is quickly redistributed through loans and investment to those who aren't rich.

When we wisely decide to not tax away the wealth of the rich, it doesn't sit idle as much as its abundance is geared toward bidding up the wages of the non-rich in concert with investments that boost their productivity. Put as plainly as possible, Bush and Clinton's shared goal of "growth that lifts up the middle class" is only possible insofar as the tax burden on corporations and the superrich is lifted first.

Clinton eyes flexible benefits for 'on-demand economy' workers // The Hill // David McCabe – July 20, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton suggested on Monday that she favors making benefits more portable for workers in the "on-demand economy" — such as those with Uber or Airbnb.

Workers for many of the companies are contractors, not employees. Their status means they do not get benefits like Social Security contributions or unemployment.

"I certainly don't have all the answers," Clinton said on a Facebook thread set up by her campaign in response to a question from a Huffington Post reporter. “But we have to resolve these questions while embracing the promise and potential of these new technologies and without stifling innovation or limiting the ability of working moms and veterans and young people to get ahead."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“On the issue of benefits, the experience of the Affordable Care act shows that we need to make sure people have access to benefits and that they are portable as they move from job to job.”

Sen. Mark Warner (D-Va.) suggested separating benefits from on-demand economy employers during a speech earlier this year. Among other proposals, he floated the idea of a third-party organization that would administer benefits for workers who were earning money from different on-demand economy companies at the same time.

Warner is expected to introduce legislation on the topic.

On-demand economy companies have implied that portable benefits can be good for their businesses. Uber founder Travis Kalanick, known for generally harboring libertarian political tendencies, said last fall the ObamaCare was “huge” for the company.

Clinton did not weigh in on whether workers in the sharing economy are currently misclassified as contractors or present a more detailed model for how portable benefits might work. Her campaign did not immediately respond to a question about when a more detailed policy proposal might be offered by the candidate.

In her answer, Clinton exhibited the cautiousness that marked her first remarks on the topic, when she said only that the “on-demand, or so-called 'gig economy,' is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future."

The former secretary of state and other Democrats have said they believe the misclassification is a problem, but have not tied it explicitly to the on-demand economy.

Clinton may be trying to avoid alienating the companies and those who believe they represent the innovative spirit of America’s tech sector.

The on-demand economy is also currently one of the most closely watched areas in tech. Uber and Airbnb are currently the two most valuable U.S.-based startups, and both have significant global presences.

Republicans have endorsed the companies has they look to gain credibility with the tech sector and young people, with some attacking Clinton for her initial remarks.

Hillary jokes about 'daily challenge' of hair, makeup // The Hill // Judy Kurtz – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton says her hair and makeup routine is “a daily challenge.”

The Democratic presidential frontrunner and former secretary of State participated in a Facebook Q&A on Monday, answering a handful of wide-ranging questions from users.

“Every morning, as my boyfriend zips out the door and I spent 30+ minutes getting ready, I wonder about how the ‘hair and makeup’ tax affects other women,” one Facebook user, Libby Britain, said in a message to Clinton. Britain added, “as a young professional woman, I’d genuinely love to hear about how you manage getting ready each morning."

Clinton replied, "Amen sister — you're preaching to the choir. It's a daily challenge. I do the best I can — and as you may have noticed, some days are better than others!"

The former first lady has made a habit in recent months of using self-deprecating humor when mentioning her appearance. She told a crowd in May, "I've been coloring my hair for years."

"So you're not going to see me turn white in the White House," Clinton said to applause.

The 2016 hopeful — who dubs herself a "pantsuit aficionado" in her Twitter profile — also weighed in on her signature style.

Asked if she had a favorite pantsuit, Clinton, 67, responded, "I never met a pantsuit I didn't love." She then plugged her campaign website's store, which is selling a $30 Clinton-inspired "Everyday Pantsuit Tee."

Jeb and Hillary: Flawed front-runners generating little excitement // Fox News // Howard Kurtz – July 20, 2015

America may well get another Bush-Clinton race once this whole presidential thing shakes out, with predictable groans about royal families and political retreads.

But in looking at the coverage this past week, I was struck by this thought: This is one weak pair of front-runners.

Jeb is losing to a guy who's never run for public office and is in hot water over comments about Mexican immigrants. In short, he's been Trumped. (Though maybe The Donald has trumped himself by making light of John McCain's Vietnam captivity, not that the media were in love with him before.)

Hillary is way ahead in her race, but a socialist senator is generating most of the excitement. A majority of voters have doubts about her honesty. And she's long been at odds with the press.

As the New York Times has noted, Hillary may have raised $47.5 million, but less than one-fifth has come in contributions of $200 or less. That means big-money donors, many of whom have maxed out at $2,700, are powering her campaign. Bernie Sanders, by contrast, has gotten four-fifths of his $15 million in small donations. (Hillary has also spent a chunk of her haul, stirring concerns about another bloated, consultant-heavy campaign.)

Equally worrisome, the latest Fox News poll confirms the findings of several other surveys that Hillary has a trust problem. Some 58 percent of respondents say Clinton's natural instincts lean more toward "hiding the truth" than "telling the truth."

It's hardly shocking that Hillary isn't firing up the grass roots. She's been in public life for a quarter century, as first lady, senator, presidential candidate, secretary of State and global celebrity. She's a Democrat running to succeed another Democrat. And the lack of a major opponent is draining much of the drama from her race. That's why Elizabeth Warren, not HRC, is on the cover of Time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the same time, even Hillary's team is said to be concerned that Sanders, a 73-year-old who isn't even a Democrat and who's been a bit player in the Senate, could knock her off in Iowa. Or worse.

Yet in a New York Times Magazine piece that's in part about the press staff micromanaging Mark Leibovich (no tweeting from her headquarters!), campaign manager Robby Mook said: "I take issue with the excitement question."'

Jeb has problems that go beyond Donald Trump. He's at odds with conservative Republican voters over illegal immigration and Common Core education standards. He's raised $114 million, but he's had to talk repeatedly about his brother and why his last name isn't a liability.

And while Bush has been solid and substantive in his campaign, aside from his initial Iraq stumble, he has not been a dominating presence. He regularly talks to the press, in stark contrast to Hillary, but makes little news.

And Trump is looming as an obstacle for Bush, particularly with the Fox debate coming up next month.

"During one recent phone call with a political ally," Politico says, "Bush pointedly asked about the surging real estate mogul. What, the friend recalled the former governor wondering out loud, was behind Trump's antics, and what was he trying to accomplish?"

Jeb is trying to be the grownup in the room. He told the Los Angeles Times: "I think candidates ought to lay out proposals to solve problems rather than basically prey on legitimate fears and concerns."

The Donald, meanwhile, speaks of Jeb with open disdain. "He raises 100 million, so what does 100 million mean?" Trump asked. "100 million means he's doing favors for so many people, it means lobbyists, it means special interests, it means donors," said Trump. "Who knows it better than me?"

The eventual nominees often seem lackluster during the preseason. I remember lots of political and media grumbling over Mitt Romney, John McCain, John Kerry and Al Gore, whereas the likes of Howard Dean and Newt Gingrich generated more excitement. Those who win their party's nod have to be acceptable to a broad coalition, which usually means they can't be fire-breathing insurgents.

Maybe even Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush aren't immune from premature boredom.

Here's the Amy Schumer joke that Hillary Clinton 'really liked' // Business Insider // Aly Weisman – July 20, 2015

Amy Schumer is known for joking about her sex life, but the comedian says that with the upcoming election she will soon tackle politics as well — whether people like it or not.

"I think people only want women to speak for so long. They build you up, and then they're just ready to tear you down. Like Hillary — when it's really go time for her, I'll definitely be active, and that'll make people hate me," Schumer tells GQ in a new cover interview. "I know inevitably I'll get more political, just as an adult with changing interests, which is good — no one wants to hear me talk about who I f----d or whatever for another twenty years. And I hope I'm wrong, but I just think there's this 'Don't disappoint me in any way.' If you say one joke that offends, it feels like, 'Oh, wait, I thought you were my everything, and now you're dead to me.'"

But Schumer doesn't care what people think about her outspoken political views, telling GQ she's "always been a fan" of Hillary Clinton.

In November, the comedian met Clinton for the first time at the Glamour Women of the Year awards.

"It was very cool. She was a good audience member," Schumer said of the meeting. "She commented on a couple of the jokes I told."

One joke in particular that Clinton told Schumer she resonated with: "I said that in L.A. my arms register as legs, and she really liked that. She was like, 'I can relate.'"

But not everyone was as kind to Clinton during the Women of the Year awards.

"One of the acts that had gone up before me did some stuff that was very disrespectful to her, and I definitely didn't think it was funny," said Schumer. "I said to her, like, 'What the f--- was that?' She just goes, 'Par for the course.... I'm so used to it.'"

New RNC Video Hits Hillary Clinton's 'Failed Leadership' // IJ Review // Joe Perticone – July 20, 2015

The Republican National Committee released a new video taking aim at Hillary Clinton's foreign policy record on Monday.

In the video, titled "Failed Leadership," Clinton's tenure as Secretary of State is heavily scrutinized, noting several scandals while she helmed the State Department.

One of the policy failures highlighted in the video is the 2014 Inspector General report, which revealed nearly $6 billion lost by Clinton's State Department. The original report read:

"The failure to maintain contract files adequately creates significant financial risk and demonstrates a lack of internal control over the Department's contract actions."

In addition, the video also focuses on Clinton's connections to no-bid contracts, as well as the security failures that led to the terrorist attacks that left four Americans dead in Benghazi, Libya.

Hillary Clinton's Nigeria record once again in the spotlight // The Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – July 20, 2015

Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari's visit to Washington, D.C., Monday to discuss the fight against Boko Haram has prompted critics to again question why Hillary Clinton refused to label the West African insurgents as terrorists during her State Department tenure.

Buhari and President Obama discussed U.S. support of Nigerian counterterrorism efforts, which was made possible by Secretary of State John Kerry's decision to place Boko Haram on the terrorist watch list in late 2013, just months after Clinton left office.

The State Department under Clinton resisted congressional calls to designate Boko Haram as a terrorist organization.

Robert Jackson, acting assistant secretary of state for African affairs, testified before Congress in May of last year that the agency could have acted sooner on Boko Haram.

Clinton's ties to Gilbert Chagoury, a prominent Nigerian businessman and Clinton Foundation supporter, have prompted at least one member of Congress to question the motives behind her decision not to slap Boko Haram with a Foreign Terrorist Organization classification.

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., wrote a letter to Kerry in March asking the State Department to turn over emails in which Clinton discussed Boko Haram.

"[G]iven the drastic foothold Boko Haram was allowed to gain prior to being designated an FTO, the nexus between the Department's decision against designating Boko Haram as an FTO and connections to outside groups should be brought forward," Vitter wrote.

Vitter questioned whether the Clinton's relationship with Chagoury influenced her decision against labeling Boko Haram a terrorist group.

He noted Bill Clinton had participated in events with Chagoury while his wife was secretary of state, and that the Nigerian land developer had "previously agreed to a $66 million plea deal during international investigation into corruption charges against him."

The Clinton Foundation's acceptance of donations from Nigerian companies has raised red flags in the past.

For example, the First Bank of Nigeria, one of the country's largest financial institutions, gave as much as $25,000 to the Clinton Foundation.

The son of the former chairman of the First Bank of Nigeria was sentenced to life in prison after attempting to blow up a Detroit-bound passenger flight on Christmas Day 2009.

Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, Alhaji Mutallab's son, was dubbed the "underwear bomber" after authorities discovered explosives hidden in his underwear.

Bill Clinton accepted between $500,000 and $1 million from a Nigerian newspaper publisher in 2012 to speak at an event in Lagos.

The money went straight into the Clinton Foundation, donor records show.

Procter & Gamble's Nigeria operation won a prestigious State Department award in 2011. The company donated between $1 million and $5 million to the Clinton Foundation.

Hillary Clinton personally presented the company with the award at a ceremony in Washington, D.C.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nestle Nigeria, a food manufacturing company, also donated to the Clinton Foundation.

Hillary Clinton reportedly invited Buhari to meet with her in 2009, years before the Nigerian president assumed office.

Powerful oil corporations have played a role in shaping Nigeria's policy. Many of the energy conglomerates have also enjoyed close ties to the Clintons.

Royal Dutch Shell, a major oil company and Clinton Foundation donor, reportedly infiltrated the Nigerian government in its efforts to dominate the energy sector there.

Leaked diplomatic cables suggest State Department officials received intelligence updates from Shell executives in Nigeria and were concerned about the effects of the deteriorating security situation on the country's oil industry.

The Nigerian ambassador under Hillary Clinton met with executives from Shell and other corporations — including fellow foundation donors Chevron, Schlumberger and ExxonMobil — in 2009 and advised them on ways to lobby the Nigerian government in their favor.

One of the reasons Hillary Clinton's officials cited for refusing to label the group as terrorists was "the possibility that doing so might heighten threats against U.S. and Western interests," according to CNN.

In One Quote, Hillary Clinton Just Outpaced All of Her Opponents on #BlackLivesMatter // Mic // Zak Rice – July 20, 2015

Ever since they announced their candidacies, the 2016 presidential hopefuls have been either wildly off-base or deafeningly silent on issues pertaining to #BlackLivesMatter.

Hillary Clinton changed that on Monday. In a Q&A conducted via her Facebook page, Clinton responded to a question from Washington Post reporter Wesley Lowery about what she, as president, would do to "begin to dismantle structural racism in the United States."

Here's how she answered:

"Black lives matter. Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that. We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality. Black people across America still experience racism every day. Since this campaign started, I've been talking about the work we must do to address the systemic inequities that persist in education, in economic opportunity, in our justice system. But we have to do more than talk - we have to take action. For example - we should make sure every police department in the US has body cameras. We should provide alternatives to incarceration for low-level offenders. We should invest in early childhood education for every child. We should fight for voting rights and universal voter registration. You will continue to hear me talking about these issues throughout this campaign and pushing for real solutions. -H"

Clinton's response demonstrates at least a basic understanding of the role structural racism plays in daily American life. She acknowledges that access to quality education, economic opportunity, voting resources and an equitable criminal justice system all have a distinctly racial tinge, with black people disproportionately affected. And she implies that she's committed to concrete, if far from encompassing, solutions: measurable goals to which her administration can be held long-term, if elected.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also suggests these are issues we can expect her to address "throughout this campaign," which is encouraging for those hoping racial inequality will be a centerpiece of this election.

The question was designed partly as a follow-up to the events of this past weekend. Democratic presidential hopefuls Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley both attended the Netroots Nation organizing conference in Phoenix, Arizona, where protesters disrupted their onstage Q&A with calls to "say her name" — a nod to Sandra Bland, whom authorities say was found dead by suicide in a Texas jail cell on July 13, even as advocates and family members suggest she died by foul play.

To be fair, Clinton was able to provide her answer through a written post instead of an in-person confrontation. Nonetheless, Sanders threatened to walk offstage in response to the interruption. O'Malley responded with the tepid and widely criticized concession "All lives matter." Both have faced backlash on social media as a result, even as they've tried to make up ground for these missteps.

This came at a time when anti-black violence at the hands of both police and private citizens alike has prompted protests and political action from Ferguson, Missouri, to Baltimore to Texas and back.

Clinton's answer seems thus far to be the only unequivocal endorsement of the phrase "black lives matter" in the Democratic field, free of the implicit dismissal of "all lives matter," and Sanders' suspiciously "I have plenty of black friends"-reminiscent retort, "I've spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights."

Whether she follows through on this initial commitment is yet to be seen. But one thing is clear: The #BlackLivesMatter movement officially has the ear of the presidential candidates field.

Hillary Clinton shuts down Mitch McConnell on women's rights: He "doesn't understand what our lives are like" // Salon // Sophia Tesfaye – July 20, 2015

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell reportedly suggested that Hillary Clinton's presidential candidacy lacked a sufficient rationale, warning that "the gender card alone isn't enough."

According to local reporters, McConnell made the remarks today while he was speaking before the Bullitt County Chamber of Commerce where he claimed there's not "a dime's worth of difference" between Clinton and President Barack Obama:

During a Facebook Q&A today, Huffington Post political reporter Laura Bassett asked Clinton about McConnell's comments. Clinton, apparently unaware of McConnell's remarks, took the opportunity to castigate the entire Republican party as she has grown fond of doing in recent weeks:

Wow. If that's what he said, Mitch McConnell really doesn't get it. There is a gender card being played in this campaign. It's played every time Republicans vote against giving women equal pay, deny families access to affordable child care or family leave, refuse to let women make decisions about their health or have access to free contraception. These aren't just women's issues, they are economic issues that drive growth and affect all Americans. Anyone who doesn't get that doesn't understand what our lives are like.

The only other woman running for president, former Hewlett-Packard executive Carly Fiorna, has also brought up the tired "gender card" phrase to dismiss Clinton's candidacy as rooted in the appeal of a first woman president while holding herself out as uniquely qualified to challenge Clinton as a woman:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I think that if Hillary Clinton were to face a female nominee, there are a whole set of things that she won't be able to talk about. She won't be able to talk about being the first woman president. She won't be able to talk about a war on women without being challenged. She won't be able to play the gender card.

Hillary Clinton Takes To Facebook To Let The Gop Know: Women's Issues Are Economic Issues // Elle // Mattie Kahn – July 20, 2015

Like you, Hillary Clinton logged on to Facebook this afternoon in the middle of her workday.

The presidential candidate hosted her first virtual Q&A of this election season on the platform, answering questions from supporters all over the country and trumpeting her devotion to at least these two forms of expression: pantsuits and karaoke.

When a supporter invited her to join him on Dickson Street in Fayetteville, Arkansas, for an evening of performance, she offered: "I love Dickson Street." Asked to recall her favorite two-piece ensemble, Clinton claimed she could not choose between them. "I have never met a pantsuit I didn't love," she said.

She had less affection, however, for Republican values, which she denounced over and over again throughout the live session. Clinton restated her positions on immigration and student debt and promised to continue to address "hard truths about race and justice in this country." When a user wanted to know whether Clinton had a retort for Mitch McConnell, who suggested this morning that the "gender card" would not secure the election for her, Clinton was vehement:

"There is a gender card being played in this campaign," she wrote. "It's played every time Republicans vote against giving women equal pay, deny families access to affordable child care or family leave, refuse to let women make decisions about their health or have access to free contraception. These aren't just women's issues, they are economic issues that drive growth and affect all Americans. Anyone who doesn't get that doesn't understand what our lives are like."

Indeed, Clinton offered her woman-to-woman support to a comrade—a "young professional" who told the former secretary of state that her "boyfriend zips out the door and I spent 30+ minutes getting ready."

"I wonder about how the 'hair and makeup tax' affects other women," she wrote, "especially ones I admire in high-pressure, public-facing jobs."

Clinton gets it.

"Amen, sister," she declared. "[Y]ou're preaching to the choir. It's a daily challenge. I do the best I can—and as you may have noticed, some days are better than others!"

Hillary Clinton Admits Her Morning Beauty Routine Is a 'Daily Challenge' // People // Tierney Mcaffe – July 20, 2015

Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton is one of the most powerful women in politics, but her appearance – from her haircuts to her affinity for pantsuits – has always been a hot topic. So much so that at this year's White House Correspondents' dinner, comedian Cecily Strong asked the media to promise "not to talk about Hillary's appearance" this election season.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But when the inevitable question crept up during a Facebook Q&A session on Monday, Clinton made a surprising confession about the "hair and makeup tax" that even women like herself in "high-pressure" positions often have to pay.

"I know these questions can seem fluffy," Facebook user Libby Brittain wrote, "but as a young professional woman, I'd genuinely love to hear about how you manage getting ready each morning (especially during your time traveling as Secretary of State and now on the campaign trail) while staying focused on the 'real' work ahead of you that day."

"Amen, sister – you're preaching to the choir," Clinton responded. "It's a daily challenge. I do the best I can – and as you may have noticed, some days are better than others!"

During the Facebook Q&A session, the first of her 2016 campaign, Clinton also vowed to make the student loan debt crisis a priority from "the first day I become president," and addressed how she would have responded to Black Lives Matter protestors who confronted her opponents Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders at a Netroots Nation convention on Saturday.

"Black lives matter," she said. "Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that. We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality."

Clinton also fired back at Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, who reportedly accused her of playing "the gender card" in her campaign.

"Wow," she replied. "If that's what he said, Mitch McConnell really doesn't get it."

"There is a gender card being played in this campaign," she continued. "It's played every time Republicans vote against giving women equal pay, deny families access to affordable child care or family leave, refuse to let women make decisions about their health or have access to free contraception. These aren't just women's issues, they are economic issues that drive growth and affect all Americans. Anyone who doesn't get that doesn't understand what our lives are like."

For her part, Clinton seems to be using humor to take charge of the narrative about her appearance.

When asked whether she has a favorite pantsuit, she quipped: "I never met a pantsuit I didn't love."

O'MALLEY

Why Martin O'Malley had to apologize for saying "all lives matter" // VOX // Dara Lind – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When on earth did saying that "all lives matter" become something you need to apologize for?

That's a question a lot of people have after a confrontation this past weekend between Democratic presidential candidates Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders and black activists at the major progressive conference Netroots Nation. The activists were affiliated with the #BlackLivesMatter movement, which has sprung up in the past year to protest and respond to the deaths of young black men and women at the hands of police and while in police custody. During his attempt to respond, O'Malley said, "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter." The protesters, as well as other attendees and progressives watching the events unfold, were deeply offended — and O'Malley was forced to apologize the next day.

RelatedWhy #BlackLivesMatter activists are fighting with Bernie Sanders supporters

Do activists really believe that only black lives matter? No, of course they don't. But as the phrase "black lives matter" has moved into the mainstream of progressive politics over the last year, the response that "all lives matter" has been used to try to shut it down — or to obscure the real racial disparities in police/community relations. So while O'Malley almost certainly wasn't trying to diminish the movement, he touched a nerve — and set off another round of argument about what the slogan really means.

Activists feel police often act like black lives don't matter

The hashtag #BlackLivesMatter, and the campaign that's organized around it for the past year, isn't about the general improvement of the well-being of African Americans. It's a protest against police killings of young black men and women and the deaths of young black men and women in police custody. To the activists in the #BlackLivesMatter movement, the frequency with which black Americans die at the hands of police — and the circumstances of those deaths — are powerful evidence that law enforcement doesn't care as much about black lives as white lives. And they point to the media reaction to those deaths, which often focuses on the criminal records of the victims, as evidence that American society doesn't care as much about black lives either.

police shooting by race

Joe Posner/Vox

In April, after the shooting of Walter Scott by a police officer in South Carolina, Tavis Smiley put it this way:

Now how do you know [the officer who killed Scott] didn't care about his humanity? Because he shot him, like a coward, 8 times in the back as he's running away. How do you know he doesn't care about his life? Because as he's dead on the ground, you're so afraid of a black man that as you shoot him 8 times in the back and he's face down he's dead and you still handcuff him. What does that say about how you regard or disregard the humanity of that particular human being?

All lives matter, but not all lives are equally under threat

#BlackLivesMatter is a specific cause. And it's pretty well accepted that if someone supports one cause, it doesn't mean they don't care about other ones.

And because "black lives matter" does refer to the specific threats that activists feel law enforcement poses to black Americans, countering with "all lives matter" can sound like an attempt to deny that those racial disparities exist. No one disagrees that all lives ought to matter — but one of the difficulties with talking about race in America is that even when race ought not to matter, for many people, it does.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's an analogy from Reddit user GeekAesthete, in a thread in which another user asked redditors to explain why #AllLivesMatter was offensive, that gets at this:

Imagine that you're sitting down to dinner with your family, and while everyone else gets a serving of the meal, you don't get any. So you say "I should get my fair share." And as a direct response to this, your dad corrects you, saying, "everyone should get their fair share." Now, that's a wonderful sentiment -- indeed, everyone should, and that was kinda your point in the first place: that you should be a part of everyone, and you should get your fair share also. However, dad's smart-ass comment just dismissed you and didn't solve the problem that you still haven't gotten any!

#AllLivesMatter has often been used to attack #BlackLivesMatter

After O'Malley said "All lives matter" on Saturday, he told MSNBC that he hadn't been aware of the connotations of the phrase. To activists, though, that's hardly an excuse — in fact, it almost makes the problem worse. Because for nearly as long as "black lives matter" has been a slogan of activism against police violence, the phrase "all lives matter" has been used by its opponents.

The Facebook page ALL Lives Matter features complaints about how there's no such thing as "police brutality" and photos of white people allegedly killed by African Americans. And the hashtag #AllLivesMatter on Twitter is a decent mix of earnest entreaties to stop being divided by race, blaming Obama for racial divisions, and articles about black-on-black or black-on-white crime.

Just as he told MSNBC, O'Malley probably wasn't aware before this weekend that "all lives matter" is often used to attack "black lives matter." He may have reflexively answered thinking he was accepting their point and reiterating it. But the honest mistake itself illustrated that he hasn't been paying very close attention to how the #BlackLivesMatter movement has developed over the past year, and how it's been attacked — both by people simply trying to deny the continued relevance of race, and by people trying to paint African Americans as the real thugs.

And it means O'Malley hasn't been paying attention to the conversation some #BlackLivesMatter activists have been trying to start within the progressive movement — to ensure that their issues are seen as progressive issues. O'Malley was at Netroots Nation to appeal to progressives looking for an alternative to Hillary Clinton. The protesters who challenged him took the stance that for a candidate to label himself progressive in the year 2015, he should have a well-considered position on the biggest progressive movement of the past year.

Maybe not everyone would be forced to apologize for saying that "all lives matter" — although, like many other things, the real question is whether you keep saying it after it's explained why people could take offense. But Martin O'Malley isn't all people. And the broader lesson of what happened over the weekend is that black progressives don't feel they're currently part of the progressive agenda — and they're fighting to change that.

O'Malley apologizes after saying 'all lives matter' at liberal conference // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – July 20, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley apologized after he was interrupted by protesters when the 2016 Democratic presidential candidate said "all lives matter" at the Netroots Nation conference in Phoenix over the weekend.

"That was a mistake on my part, and I meant no disrespect," Mr. O'Malley said in an interview on "This Week in Blackness," a digital show. "I did not mean to be insensitive in any way or to communicate that I did not understand the tremendous passion, commitment and feeling and depth of feeling that all of us should be attaching to this issue."

Several dozen demonstrators interrupted Mr. O'Malley by shouting “Black lives matter!” — which has become a rallying cry in the wake of recent shootings of black men by police officers — and Mr. O'Malley responded: “Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter,” according to CNN.

Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, one of Mr. O'Malley’s rivals on the Democratic side, was shouted down as well when he tried to speak, according to Yahoo! News.

“Black lives, of course, matter. I spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights and for dignity,” Mr. Sanders said. “But if you don’t want me to be here, that’s OK. I don’t want to outscream people.”

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, the 2016 Democratic front-runner, was not at the conference, but received some pushback for using the phrase when she recently spoke at a church near Ferguson, Missouri, the site of rioting and protests last summer in the wake of the shooting death of Michael Brown.

In response to a question about the protesters at the event, Mrs. Clinton said during a Facebook question and answer session Monday that “black lives matter.”

“Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that,” she said. “We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality. Black people across America still experience racism every day.”

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders hazed on Twitter for civil rights comment // Politico // Daniel Strauss – July 20, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders is getting some blowback for saying he spent five decades fighting for civil rights when protesters confronted him at a presidential candidate forum over the weekend.

At the forum on Saturday, at the annual conference of the left-leaning Netroots Nation, protesters affiliated with the Black Lives Matter movement stormed the stage. A defensive Sanders said, “Black lives matter. But I’ve spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights. If you don’t want me to be here, that’s OK.”

In the 1960s, Sanders was a civil rights activist who helped organize anti-segregation sit-ins. In 1988, he helped Democratic presidential candidate Jesse Jackson win in Vermont.

But Saturday’s comments sparked a minor backlash nonetheless. On Twitter, the hashtag #berniesoblack was born and directed, with mockery, at the independent Vermont senator and liberal presidential candidate. There were multiple kinds of trolling, including from prominent black Twitter users.

And from political Twitter users as well:

Maryland governor Martin O’Malley, who awkwardly said at one point during the same forum, “black lives matter, white lives matter, all lives matter,” faced some criticism of his own. O’Malley later apologized for the remark.

On Sunday, Sanders offered an olive branch of sorts:

Trumka: I'm not trying to slow the Sanders surge // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – July 20, 2015

Labor chief Richard Trumka on Monday defended the memo he sent last month to AFL-CIO leaders telling them to stop trying to endorse Bernie Sanders, saying it was more a helpful reminder than an effort to slow the Sanders surge.

“They’re not going rogue, it’s really exciting,” said Trumka, the country’s most influential organized union chief, in an interview with POLITICO.

“The memo just said, before they got out of hand, you know, debate back and forth, talk up a storm. But remember: There’s only one endorsement in a presidential election, and it comes from the national.”

Trumka’s attempt to calm the waters comes as Sanders has picked up significant momentum among local and state labor groups with his fiery rhetoric and unabashed support of progressive initiatives such as a 15 minimum wage, equal health care for all and steeper taxes on the wealthy.

He’s drawn a contrast with Hillary Clinton, the dominant front-runner and a longtime labor stalwart who has met with some skepticism because of her unwillingness to condemn President Barack Obama’s trans-Pacific trade negotiations.

Sanders, however, has been feeling the labor love.

The South Carolina AFL-CIO put out a statement supporting Sanders’ candidacy, for example, before Trumka’s national group forced it to walk back the pseudo-endorsement.

Still, it’s early in the race, Clinton is widely regarded as the leading contender for the eventual backing of major elements of organized labor and the endorsement process is ongoing.

She, Sanders, Martin O’Malley and Republican Mike Huckabee will all meet AFL-CIO leaders on July 29 as part of the procedure, after filling out the group’s questionnaire.

Trumka said on Monday he isn’t sure whether the group would offer a primary endorsement anytime soon (or at all) — a declaration that comes just days after the American Federation of Teachers stirred up some grumbling in the organized labor community by endorsing Clinton.

“No one was surprised that they would endorse Hillary,” said Trumka. Randi Weingarten, AFT’s leader, is a longtime Clinton ally who sits on the board of her supportive super PAC, Priorities USA Action.

Nonetheless, Trumka reiterated the same line his union has promoted from the start: that all potential candidates would be judged by their plans to support a minimum wage increase, protect and bolster overtime laws, lessen mass incarceration, push comprehensive immigration reform and promote equal pay for women.

He also said the trade debate that divided labor and the White House would, naturally, be factored into the process — but that Clinton’s reluctance to weigh in strongly early on was hardly disqualifying: Still, “it was duly noted, by voters.” He similarly noted union leaders had taken note of Sanders’ and O’Malley’s strong stances against the deal early on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Answering questions from a panel of POLITICO reporters and editors, Trumka also used the opportunity to rail against Republican presidential hopeful Scott Walker, whom Trumka called a “national disgrace” when the Wisconsin governor declared his intention to run for president last week.

“He is the most openly and notoriously anti-worker, anti-union candidate that we have seen in my lifetime,” Trumka said, still insisting that the AFL-CIO has no specific plan to take on Walker, despite leaving its options open to attack his record using “all the venues, from paper, to air, to electronic.”

“Why would any sane human being, knowing his background and who pulls the strings, vote for Scott Walker?” he added. “If you cut the two strings behind him that go to the Koch brothers, he’s like putty. He falls down.”

Bernie Sanders Spent $0 On Polling, Because Really, Would It Change His Mind Anyway? // HuffPo // Sam Stein – July 20, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) has raised $15 million since April 30, when he announced his candidacy for president on the Democratic ticket. From that impressive haul, he devoted exactly $0 to polling.

This is not exactly normal operating procedure for a serious presidential candidate, which Sanders has become in his short time on the trail. Even real estate mogul Donald Trump spent $28,000 on polling services, though he says he doesn’t “want a pollster” (since if the pollster were “so good,” he'd be running for office himself). Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) spent $69,000 on polling out of the $2.1 million he raised, and has nary a bump in the polls to show for it.

But why is Sanders flying blind when it comes to testing public attitudes?

His top aide, Tad Devine, said it’s not because the campaign doesn’t see the utility in those numbers. In fact, the decision could end up being reversed -- for example, when or if they decide it’s in their interest to better target a media purchase.

So far, though, the notoriously frugal Sanders isn’t convinced.

“Bernie doesn’t spend a lot of money on the campaign, OK,” said Devine. “And research can be expensive.”

“If left to his own devices, he would not like to spend a dime on polling. I don’t think, as of this moment, we have convinced him of the merits of doing that,” Devine added. “I personally would like to, but I haven’t convinced him yet that we should. I’m hopeful I will.”

This actually isn’t the way Sanders has always operated. During his House and Senate campaigns, which Devine also worked for, he did pay for polling. But by the time the 2016 campaign started, a few factors persuaded him to forgo the cost. His extensive travel through New Hampshire and Iowa even prior to announcing a run provided Sanders and aides with a kind of on-the-ground focus group operation for their message. And when he started running, there was no indication he’d be working with the amount of money he has since raised. Polling was considered an outlandish expense for a campaign designed to be bare bones. They were planning a reverse "Moneyball" -- a small-market operation that forgoes the use of data instead of seeing it as an equalizer.

Devine's life, by his own admission, is more difficult because of that. If he had his druthers, he would pay for more research -- well, any research really.

"I think we will probably have another discussion," he told The Huffington Post. "Thus far the discussion has been no."

Till then, he's relying on public data. It isn't as detailed or micro-targeted as polling, but it also doesn't cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. As a point of comparison, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's campaign spent more than $900,000 on polling in the second quarter of this year.

"I don't think we've lost any ground because we didn't spend money on research," said Devine. "We'll see if that remains the same in the time ahead."

Bernie Sanders Is Against Keystone XL. Hillary Clinton Was 'Inclined' to Approve It. Why the Difference? // HuffPo // H.A. Goodman – July 20, 2015

The Sierra Club calls Keystone XL a "climate disaster." Therefore, when a presidential candidate once "inclined" to green-light the pipeline hires someone who was also a "major Keystone lobbyist," Democrats should inquire as to the reasoning of such a curious decision. In addition, while Republicans focus solely on jobs and energy independence, questions should be asked regarding the long-term economic cost of spills. An article earlier this year titled Yellowstone Pipeline Spills Fuel Arguments Over Keystone XL Line highlights the long term economic consequences of ignoring oil spills:

The Montana pipeline breach temporarily fouled a city's water supply and emerged as the latest in a string of spills to highlight ongoing problems with maintenance of the nation's 61,000 miles of crude oil pipelines.

An Associated Press review of government records shows accident numbers growing steadily since 2009, reversing a decade-long decline...

Keystone would move up to 830,000 barrels of oil a day. A break in the line could dwarf the recent Montana accident, on a line with a capacity of just 42,000 barrels daily.

Therefore, if a Keystone oil spill "could dwarf the recent Montana incident" and ruin water supplies, then why are Republicans and some Democrats supporting Keystone?

It's important to note as well that the Keystone pipeline will go from Alberta, Canada, and then through Montana, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas, all the way to refineries along the Gulf Coast. The Wall Street Journal states that for the Deepwater Horizon oil spill, "Settlement of all federal and state claims brings total costs to nearly $54 billion." Because of its size, there's a real possible that a spill from Keystone could easily exceed such costs; communities from Montana to Texas would be affected for decades, both economically and environmentally from a devastating oil spill.

While the debate rages, some people have taken a firm and bold stance on the environmental disaster in the making. Perhaps the biggest opponent of Keystone XL in Congress is Senator Bernie Sanders, who says, "The idea that we would give a green light for the transportation of 800,000 barrels of some of the dirtiest oils all over the world makes no sense to me." In addition, Bernie Sanders has openly questioned the sanity of Congress, declaring that "it is totally crazy" to think Keystone won't adversely affect the planet and states the following:

With the scientific community telling us loudly and clearly that we must transform our energy system away from fossil fuels if we are to combat climate change, it is totally crazy for the Congress to support the production and transportation of some of the dirtiest oil on the planet.

Clear and direct, Sanders isn't ambiguous on his stance pertaining to Keystone.

Others, however, are more nuanced in their views.

One big question for Democrats in 2016 will be Hillary Clinton's 'inclination' to support Keystone. In an article by The Christian Science Monitor titled Hillary Clinton has a Keystone XL problem, Clinton's ambiguous position on the biggest environmental controversy of recent years is analyzed:

As Secretary of State, Clinton said she was 'inclined' to sign-off on the pipeline, which would carry emissions-heavy oil sands from Alberta to US Gulf Coast refineries. Since then, Clinton has remained silent on Keystone XL...

'We all remember when Clinton said she was 'inclined' to approve Keystone XL. If the pipeline goes through, she'll shoulder part of the blame, and this protest today will be just a small taste of actions to come,' Jamie Henn, spokesperson for 350 Action, told the Monitor in an email Monday. 'Clinton is saying many of the right things on climate - Keystone XL is an easy way to start doing the right thing.'

'That unwillingness to take a position on something, it's significantly more indefensible when you're a declared presidential candidate,' 350.org spokesperson Karthik Ganapathy told Business Insider last week. 'It's even more indefensible when Ted Cruz and Rand Paul have taken a position on it when you, as the Democratic front-runner, have not.'

Therefore, a statement like, "If the pipeline goes through, she'll shoulder part of the blame," doesn't bode well for a Democrat who is supposed to counter Republicans on this emotional debate. Being "inclined" to support Keystone at one point only strengthens the GOP's hand in the Congressional battle.

In February, President Obama sided with progressives like Bernie Sanders and took a direct and unwavering stand on the Keystone XL pipeline, vetoing the Keystone XL bill and blocking what 350.org describes as a "pipeline that would connect Alberta, Canada with Gulf Coast refineries that would carry 800,000 barrels per day of tar sands oil across the United States to be refined, exported and burned." Like Bernie Sanders, who vehemently opposes the pipeline and believes it will lead to a "significantly less inhabitable" planet, Obama listened to the concerns of Greenpeace and others regarding "how disastrous the tar sands oil industry is to the climate."

However, the debate will still continue with the next president, and a POLITICO piece titled Greens divided over Hillary Clinton and Keystone explains one presidential candidate's silence and the impact of this communication style:

Hillary Clinton is maintaining her years of silence on the Keystone XL pipeline -- and environmental groups are increasingly divided on how hard they should push her to take a stand.

It's a further sign that the never-ending pipeline drama will remain one of the biggest policy minefields facing Clinton's White House campaign...

'Activists who are the ones that will turn out for her events and donate money are the ones who will also see the gap of her talking about climate change and yet (if she does) supporting tar sands and fracking,' said Jane Kleeb, founder of the anti-Keystone group Bold Nebraska. She added that Clinton 'needs to visit with us and hopefully not listen to some of the DC lobbyists who I just know are saying 'they will vote for you anyway, what other option do they have?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Similar to Clinton's silence on the Trans Pacific Partnership and other controversial topics, where ambiguity is favored over a clear-cut stance that could lead to political backlash, Clinton's viewpoint on Keystone seems to still be mired in "years of silence." One telling observation from the POLITOCO piece is the quote referencing the mentality of many voters: "They will vote for you anyway, what other option do they have?"

From Keystone, to Iraq and gay marriage (up until 2013), it seems that many progressives are resigned to simply accept silence, or overt flip flopping on controversial topics. In lieu of principled and straightforward dialogue, some people favor a reverence for the $2.5 billion campaign machine that's expected to win the White House simply because it's received the most donor money. Like Eric Zuesse writes in Hillary Clinton's Bought-And-Paid-For Favors for Keystone XL Deal, "But of course, this isn't to say that she's any worse than other Republicans; it's merely to note that, like with Obama, her calling herself a 'Democrat' doesn't make any difference, other than to fool a different group of suckers."

However, there is a person in 2016 who embodies the Democratic and progressive principles (like gay rights, when he voted against President Clinton's Defense of Marriage Act) that Democrats were supposed to always uphold; even when polls went in a different direction. His name is Bernie Sanders and he is vehemently against Keystone XL, while others have been "inclined" to support it. In 2016, Democrats can accept silence on the future of a "climate disaster" in the making, or vote for Bernie Sanders, a candidate who clearly states "it is totally crazy for the Congress to support the production and transportation of some of the dirtiest oil on the planet."

Finally, the word "why" will be an important issue of its own in the upcoming election. If the GOP supports Keystone, and Clinton was "inclined" to support it, then why does there exist a difference on Keystone between Sanders and Clinton? Why is one person overtly against it while the other is silent? The answer to this question, and to several others, could dictate who wins the 2016 Democratic nomination. It's also an answer that might enable Bernie Sanders to win the presidency.

#BernieSoBlack: why progressives are fighting about Bernie Sanders and race // VOX // Dara Lind – July 20, 2015

You might expect that Netroots Nation, the progressive conference whose 2015 edition was held in Phoenix last weekend, would be natural Sen. Bernie Sanders territory. And you could point to his speech on Saturday night, which turned out 11,000 people, as proof that you were right. But there's more than one kind of progressive.

Sanders' Netroots Nation appearance at a town hall Saturday afternoon turned into a confrontation with #BlackLivesMatter activists — and brought a conflict between Sanders-loving economic progressives on one side, and organizers for racial justice on the other, out into the open. But while Sanders is the catalyst, the conflict — at least as Sanders' critics see it — isn't really about whether to support Sanders or Hillary Clinton for the 2016 nomination. It's about who gets to call themselves a progressive champion, and when politicians should heed activists' demands to pay more explicit attention to certain issues.

What happened at Netroots Nation

Two Democratic candidates appeared at Netroots Nation on Saturday: Sanders and Martin O'Malley. (Hillary Clinton was invited, but declined the invitation.) O'Malley and Sanders made back-to-back appearances in a town hall-style session, moderated by journalist and immigration activist Jose Antonio Vargas.

Both Sanders and O'Malley are trying to win progressive support in the Democratic primary to become the alternative to Hillary Clinton. But only one of them has really succeeded: Sanders' candidacy has gained a lot of momentum, with huge events and the second-most money raised directly of any candidate (driven largely by small donations). O'Malley, on the other hand, hasn't been able to capture as much attention. In fact, he's faced something of an uphill battle with many progressives: O'Malley's political career started in Baltimore, where he was closely associated with the aggressive police tactics that were under protest after the death of Freddie Gray in police custody this spring.

Shortly after O'Malley took the stage, a group of protesters affiliated with the #BlackLivesMatter movement (which has been organizing for the last year or so to call attention to deaths of black men and women at the hands of police) marched into the room chanting "Which Side Are You On?" (a reference to an old-school labor song). Two women (Tia Oso and Patrice Cullors) took the stage and the microphone and spoke about deaths of black men and women in police custody — specifically the recent suspicious death of Sandra Bland in Texas.

Ending the presentation, Cullors asked O'Malley to offer "concrete actions": "What will you do to stop police unions from battering our names after law enforcement kills us?" "And," she added, "we want to hear it from Bernie Sanders, too."

The activists stayed in the room for the rest of the town hall, chanting the names of people killed in police custody (the hashtag #SayHerName has become a locus for activism and grief after women have been killed in police custody). Neither candidate was exactly graceful in responding to the interruption.

O'Malley, attempting to respond to the protesters, said "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter" — a phrase that's been used by critics of the #BlackLivesMatter movement, and which activists see as an attempt to dismiss racial disparities in police shootings. O'Malley later told MSNBC that he wasn't aware of the connotations of "all lives matter," which is itself pretty illustrative of the disconnect between O'Malley and the #BlackLivesMatter movement.

But because O'Malley doesn't have a strong support base among progressives at the moment, he hasn't had supporters step up in his defense. Instead, most people have focused on the response that Sanders — the ostensible progressive champion — gave the protesters.

Why Sanders and his supporters frustrate some racial-justice activists

Sanders was defensive and cranky toward the protesters, saying "Black lives of course matter. But I've spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights. If you don't want me to be here, that's okay." At other times, he didn't acknowledge the protesters at all and raised his voice to be heard over them (which some attendees saw as Sanders "shouting down" the protesters).

Sanders didn't ignore the issue entirely. But to some observers, it felt like Sanders "stuck to his script" about economic injustice without giving racial injustice its due.

There is a legitimate disconnect between the way Sanders (and many of the economic progressives who support him) see the world, and the way many racial-justice progressives see the world. To Bernie Sanders, as I've written, racial inequality is a symptom — but economic inequality is the disease. That's why his responses to unrest in Ferguson and Baltimore have included specific calls for police accountability, but have focused on improving economic opportunity for young African Americans. Sanders presents fixing unemployment as the systemic solution to the problem.

Many racial-justice advocates don't see it that way. They see racism as its own systemic problem that has to be addressed on its own terms. They feel that it's important to acknowledge the effects of economic inequality on people of color, but that racial inequality isn't merely a symptom of economic inequality. And most importantly, they feel that "pivoting" to economic issues can be a way for white progressives to present their agenda as the progressive agenda and shove black progressives, and the issues that matter most to them, to the sidelines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So Sanders' performance at Netroots confirmed the frustrations that his critics felt. And Sanders' supporters' reaction to the criticism was just as predictable.

Yes, Sanders marched with MLK. But his critics know that already.

Whether you agree with Sanders' claim that he's been "fighting for civil rights for 50 years" depends on whether you think he's doing enough in his Senate career to put civil rights on the agenda. But the "50 years" part is true: he has admirable civil-rights-movement cred. Sanders was a member of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, which helped coordinate much of the nonviolent action of the early 1960s, and he participated in the famous March for Jobs and Freedom in 1964, where Martin Luther King, Jr., delivered the famous "I Have A Dream" speech.

Today, Sanders' supporters bring up his record in the civil-rights movement in response to basically any criticism of Sanders' actions on racial equality. And when Sanders started catching criticism for his Netroots performance, the supporters were ready with their history. As comedy podcaster Roderick Morrow — who started the satirical #BernieSoBlack Twitter hashtag on Sunday — told Vox: "It seems like any time black people bring this up on Twitter, there's just all these people who, I don't know if they're just sitting around searching his name on Twitter or something, they just come and get in your mentions and start harassing you, saying the same things over and over to you."

But the civil rights movement references aren't actually an answer to his critics. No one is arguing that Sanders literally doesn't see race, they're saying that Sanders sees racial inequality as less important than economic inequality and shouldn't. And as Vox's Andrew Prokop has written, even in the 1960s, Sanders didn't view race as the fundamental problem many of his fellow student-activists did:

Even as a student at the University of Chicago in the 1960s, influenced by the hours he spent in the library stacks reading famous philosophers, he became frustrated with his fellow student activists, who were more interested in race or imperialism than the class struggle. They couldn't see that everything they protested, he later said, was rooted in "an economic system in which the rich controls, to a large degree, the political and economic life of the country."

To Sanders' critics, the "but the civil rights movement!" response isn't just irrelevant, it's insulting. "It's like they're almost trying to outblack us," says Morrow. "'Oh, you're a black person, what could you possibly understand about our candidate? He was marching before you were even born!' That's cool, but you gotta stay on top of it."

So Morrow made a joke:

Morrow wrote a few more tweets and then went off to record his podcast. When he returned, he saw the hashtag was trending nationwide. "I thought this [harassment from Sanders supporters] was only happening to a few people," he says. "Apparently it was happening to a lot of us."

This isn't about the presidential campaign, it's about the progressive movement

Of course, as always happens on Twitter, some progressive defenders of Sanders — both white and black — used the hashtag to point out that Sanders marched with MLK (thus making critics' point for them); to argue that Sanders' economic agenda would help black Americans; or to contrast Sanders with Clinton. (Others endorsed the #BernieSoBlack jokes but urged people to go after Clinton next.) The latter is a reflection of one of the two main reasons Sanders' supporters are so frustrated by the criticism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To their minds, Sanders is clearly a more progressive candidate for president than Clinton — so they don't understand why anyone would direct their criticism at the better candidate. After all, Clinton didn't even show up to Netroots.

That isn't how Sanders' critics see it, though. It's worth noting that #BlackLivesMatter organizers haven't been primarily focused on the presidential primary, even as other progressives have turned in that direction. To them, this is about the progressive movement. Bernie Sanders — and more importantly, the pressure they feel to embrace Bernie Sanders as a progressive champion — is just the latest illustration that some white progressives aren't listening to black progressives when deciding what the "progressive agenda" really is, and who its champions are. If Sanders were polling at 0 percent (like O'Malley) instead of polling in the mid- to high teens, it's unlikely that #BernieSoBlack would have become a popular hashtag.. It's exactly because Sanders is being treated as a progressive champion that the activists who challenged him Saturday, and made jokes about his blackness Sunday, feel that, yet again, they're being asked to put their own concerns aside and fall in line with what white progressives want.

And this is why it's not clear whether Sanders can appease his critics. He has spoken about mass incarceration and police violence already. And he does, in fact, have specific policies he's suggested to improve police accountability.

His campaign has even tried to respond to the demands protesters were making Saturday — though there's still something of a learning curve. Morrow told Vox that the campaign had used the #SayHerName hashtag, but named one woman and two men who died in police custody — when the point of the hashtag is to focus on women. (The campaign deleted the tweet.) In a speech in Dallas Sunday, he mentioned Sandra Bland by name. "Thank you for saying her name!" shouted one attendee.

"Maybe I'm being foolish, but, hey, they're hearing. They're receptive," Morrow said of the Sanders campaign. On the other hand, he said, "I'm more hopeful for the campaign than I am for his defenders."

This is a demand on white progressives that goes far beyond Bernie: that they treat racial inequality with the same seriousness that they treat economic inequality. That's not a demand that Bernie Sanders, himself, could fulfill even if he tried. It's a demand on his supporters. And as Morrow points out, it's up against "hundreds of years of history" of people ignoring "a lot of voices, if they don't like what folks are saying. There will always be a struggle, even in progressive spaces. How can you support each other without turning on each other?"

What does Bernie Sanders need to do to beat Hillary? // CNBC // Mark Macias – July 20, 2015

Bernie Sanders is close to a statistical tie with Hillary Clinton in the latest New Hampshire poll, but as Al Gore learned in 2000, one state doesn't make you president.

For Sanders to seriously challenge Clinton, he needs money and a national network to motivate voters and volunteers. He must persuade minorities to leave Clinton — a challenge since she had 72 percent of the nonwhite Democratic vote, according to a June Washington Post/ABC News poll. Sanders had only 5 percent in that poll. But his biggest obstacle of all: Clinton's expected $2.5 billion war chest.

Unfortunately for Sanders, money drives campaigns.

The national media is starting to show video of his campaign rallies. More impressive, reporters are describing these crowds as larger than Clinton rallies — and with more passionate followers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He's connecting in a way that Hillary Clinton is not," a New Hampshire state Senator told the Washington Post recently. "He's talking about things people want to hear. People are used to candidates who are calculated, produced and measured, and they see through that. Bernie's different."

Read MoreMacias: Why Chris Christie may have an edge in the GOP race

During my time as a producer with NBC in Miami, I learned you can't predict hurricanes in February, and that goes for calling election results, as well. I won't predict whether Sanders can beat Clinton six months from now. But I will tell you how Sanders can move his message beyond New Hampshire and into a national campaign by leveraging the media.

The Sanders media strategy begins with three words: visuals, perception and commonality.

Visuals

If an alien lands in Times Square but no one takes video of it, did it really visit earth? If I didn't see that video, I would assume the radio station was exaggerating or the photo was doctored. This is why the Sanders campaign needs to harness the power of video and start creating social media videos with the purpose of going viral. It doesn't take a $2.5 billion war chest to accomplish this. It takes a few passionate college interns with an eye for video. The Sanders campaign should be creating multiple videos, targeting the different key demos and documenting the crowds so the rest of America can become intrigued.

In New York, tourists flock to Broadway shows even though they frequently know nothing about the plot. You know why? Because they are seduced by the intrigue of seeing something that everyone else is experiencing. Sanders needs to create that same intrigue, so future states will want to see his "Broadway show" when it comes to town.

I volunteered for my first Congressional campaign for a little known challenger when I was in college. I didn't realize it then, but I volunteered because of my perception that he could beat the incumbent. I was also lured in by a message that spoke to me. Perception drives reality in politics — and fortunately for Sanders, the public knows little about him. He's not a national candidate with a long history, like Clinton, so he is in the enviable position of building a perception from scratch. Sprinkle a little perception that the public is catching onto his message and everyone will start to believe it on the news.

Commonality

The 99 percent relates to the Sanders message. He wants to provide free college, guarantee sick and family leave, and raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour. In the few speeches I heard, Sanders went after large corporations in a way that felt authentic. Have you heard Clinton criticize corporations? She sounds like she is reading a script. Sanders sounds like that uncle at Thanksgiving who speaks passionately about how he can make a better turkey. When you combine authenticity, passion and commonality, it's like turkey, mashed potatoes and gravy on Thanksgiving.

Read MoreCongressman screams at Yellen: 'You did nothing!'

Listen to Sanders speak and you get the feeling that he wants to help the middle class so much that he just might have a heart attack in the process. That's a passion that moves people. The Clinton campaign is trying to own the "champion of everyday Americans" theme. If Sanders can stick with his common message that he is the authentic "champion of every day Americans," he can go beyond New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But I saved the worst for last.

There is one more word that should be added to the Bernie Sanders media strategy. This word will become his biggest weakness in this campaign. It hasn't gained too much traction with the media, but if the rest of America starts taking interest in Sanders, mark my word that you will start to hear more about "socialist Bernie."

That will be a hard label to overcome because the majority of Americans associate socialism with communism. We defeated communism. Capitalism won. Does anyone really believe that America will now elect a socialist? And there is really no way Sanders can distance himself from this label because he openly embraces it.

I'd not only predict that happens six months out, I'd put money on it.

Sanders to push $15 minimum wage bill // The Hill // Tim Devaney – July 20, 2105

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is pushing new legislation to raise the minimum wage for all workers to $15 an hour.

The Democratic presidential candidate, who has made addressing income inequality a centerpiece of his campaign, will introduce the minimum wage bill Wednesday. Sanders has long called for a $15 minimum wage, but this is the first bill he is introducing to do so.

Reps. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.) and Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) will join Sanders at the press conference Wednesday, and are also expected to introduce identical legislation in the House.

It’s believed to be the highest minimum wage that has ever been proposed by legislation in Congress.

“The simple truth is that working people cannot survive on the federal minimum wage of $7.25 an hour, or $8 an hour or $9 an hour,” Sanders said recently. "If people work 40 hours a week, they deserve not to live in dire poverty.”

Sanders' bill comes as low-wage food service workers and janitors at the U.S. Capitol plan to strike on Wednesday.

The legislation would raise the minimum wage in increments until it reaches $15 an hour by 2020.

Democratic 2016 frontrunner Hillary Clinton backs raising the minimum wage and spoke at a rally with groups who back $15-an-hour, but has yet to officially endorse that figure. Former Gov. Martin O'Malley (D-Md.), another contender, backs a $15 minimum wage.

Sanders' minimum wage bill would go a step further than one proposed earlier this year by fellow Democrat Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.), who suggested raising it to $12 an hour.

Murray’s Raise the Wage Act quickly garnered support from the Obama administration and top Democrats, including Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's unclear whether they will back the even higher $15 minimum wage proposed by Sanders.

Sanders' bill is unlikely to get a vote in the GOP-controlled Senate.

Bernie Sanders: structural racism needs to end for economic justice to succeed // The Guardian // Sabrina Issa – July 20, 2015

It is time for the progressive movement to reckon with structural racism: its role in enabling it and its moral responsibility to actively dismantle it. It's not a request: it's a requirement for all presidential candidates that seek progressive votes, and for a political movement that seeks any hope for relevance in a diverse America.

It's long past time for Democratic candidates to stop taking black voters for granted, as was made clear this weekend at Netroots Nation, the largest annual gathering of progressive activists in America. At the Presidential Town Hall on Saturday morning, two Democratic Presidential candidates – former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders – publicly floundered when faced with activists from #BlackLivesMatter.

Sanders' and O'Malley's public interviews with journalist, documentarian and activist Jose Antonio Vargas was essentially taken over by racial justice activists who drastically changed the conversation of what was designed to be a typical, stale campaign appearance by shouting "Black lives matter!" in unison from the audience. Then Tia Oso of the Black Alliance for Just Immigration took to the stage to demand that the candidates answer one question: "As leader of this country will you advance an agenda that will dismantle structural racism in this country?"

Governor O'Malley's tone-deaf response – "Black lives matter, white lives matter, all lives matter" – earned him boos from the crowd; he left the stage shortly after and later clarified his remarks with the news site This Week in Blackness. Bernie Sanders, with the presidential gravitas of a toddler, first attempted to shout his usual stump speech over the protestors, and then scolded them for interrupting him and held what one could only describe as a mini public tantrum.

Netroots Nation is no stranger to public protest: demonstrators have interrupted politicians from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to former President Bill Clinton. And shutting things down is business as usual in progressive politics writ large: progressive activists regularly heckle political leaders and organize demonstrations to protest going to war in Iraq, the war in Afghanistan, government surveillance, climate change, Keystone pipeline, reproductive rights, marriage equality and many other issues.

Yet when #BlackLivesMatters demonstrators demanded that candidates explain what they will do for racial justice, Netroots organizers surreptitiously flashed an apology for Governor O'Malley on the teleprompter for the disruption. Sanders supporters, meanwhile, flooded Twitter to dismiss critiques, criticize demonstrators for interrupting the economic stump speech and to attempt to civil-rights-splain to racial justice organizers about the Senator's actions during the civil rights movement.

If Netroots is, as Sam Drizell wrote in TIME, "a Shangri-La for progressive idealism", then why is there such discomfort within the movement when some attempt to demand specifics from politicians on how to dismantle structural racism? Or more alarmingly, why is there such discomfort among candidates seeking public office with discussing America's racial reality? The civil rights blind spot in the progressive movement cannot be fixed without addressing the truth that there cannot be economic progress for all without racial justice.

In previous races, Sanders has not had to build a diverse coalition of support to win elections; his past campaigns have made little or no reference to issues of deep importance in black communities, such as voting rights protection, housing discrimination and mass incarceration. He speaks almost exclusively among issues which thrill white liberals: campaign finance reform and economic justice.

There is a political cost to creating silos within movements: politicians and citizens end up speaking of the same issues with different languages, with a lack of empathy and connection. Though Sanders's policy proposals likely align with number of black voters, his ability to address race is limited to the scope of wealth and the economy. But black voters and organizers need to know why they should fight for Bernie Sanders' vision of our economic future when our humanity is in constant peril.

True political inclusion of black voters in the progressive movement will reveal racial justice and economic progress as inextricably linked, and that there is no need to forsake one for the other (or to solve one first and fix the other later).

But, as #BlackLivesMatter supporters continue to drive change in the political conversation, it becomes more obvious that racial justice is a siloed issue operating within a largely-white progressive movement. The clash between what progressives declare their values to be and the issues on which they're willing to take action will continue as the progressive movement and candidates alike seek to engage an increasingly diverse rising electorate.

We do not need talking points. We need government to help save our lives, and we need to elect leaders who will champion our humanity.

Berniemania spreads to Texas as Sanders' speech draws crowd of 5,000 // The Guardian // Tom Dart – July 20, 2015

Ninety minutes before the scheduled start of Bernie Sanders' speech on Sunday night, a 500-person-long line snaked around the arena, in 100F heat – and in Texas.

The Democratic presidential hopeful's fans showed up long before the doors opened and bellowed their approval once inside, as he spoke for more than an hour in front of 5,000 people, concluding a weekend in which he addressed about 25,000 in Arizona and Texas and showed that Republican-dominated states are not immune to Berniemania.

The independent Vermont senator and self-described democratic socialist attracted more than 8,000 people to a rally in Dallas earlier in the day and 11,000 in Phoenix on Saturday, the highest turnout of his campaign.

Like his speech at the Phoenix Convention Center, the Houston rally was moved to a larger venue: an 8,000-capacity basketball arena at the University of Houston. A speech by Hillary Clinton last month at Texas Southern University, less than a mile away, drew an attendance of around 1,000 on a weekday afternoon.

Other important numbers – the polls – are less favourable to Sanders. A Real Clear Politics poll average shows him in second with 16.3%, and Clinton the frontrunner with 56.8%. Still, his support is growing as he is biting into Clinton's commanding lead, and his campaign said earlier this month that it has raised $15m.

Some in the audience on Sunday waved posters with slogans such as "Bernie Sanders 2016, Not For Sale", "Feel The Bern". While it was a young crowd overall – especially the two hundred or so in the mosh pit in front of the stage – there was a wide range of ages.

"I came to hear what he has to say in person. I like a lot of his issues," said Ken Dietrich, a 77-year-old businessman.

“I didn’t figure he would spend much time here in Texas, this bastion of of right-wing insanity,” said Eugene Hayman, 61. “I don’t know if Bernie has a chance of winning or not but he’s pulling the debate back from the extreme right, so I would love to see him win.”

Hayman said his “dream match-up” would be Donald Trump versus Sanders – but “I like Hillary OK”.

Texas’ largest urban areas are bluer than the state’s reputation suggests. Houston’s mayor, Annise Parker, is a Democrat. While Mitt Romney won 57% of the vote statewide in 2012, and Barack Obama 41%, the president carried Harris County, which includes Houston, by 0.1%. He also beat Romney in Dallas, San Antonio and Austin.

Kenny Jones, of Houstonians for Bernie Sanders 2016, said the group started with 10 people and now has a hundred.

“Something is happening out here. This is blowing me away, quite frankly. Houston is such a conservative town,” the 58-year-old schoolteacher said as he handed out fliers urging voters to “Join the Revolution”. Jones said he has “done left-progressive organising in Houston before, it’s very difficult. This is not difficult”.

He believed Sanders was resonating because he is addressing core but often overshadowed issues such as jobs, healthcare, education and climate change.

“There’s something about him. He doesn’t seem to be doing a political dance,” Jones said, arguing that Sanders is backed by unions while Clinton is compromised because her campaign is funded by big corporations and so is in thrall to their interests.

“I like Secretary Clinton, I respect her a great deal, but she’s dancing the wrong dance. There’s an old Texas saying: you dance with the one that brung ya.”

Initially sounding hoarse, the 73-year-old started his speech saying that he has often been asked “Why in God’s name would you come to Texas?”

He added: “I do know that this is a conservative Republican state and that is exactly why I am here today. Today it is a conservative Republican state, but that doesn’t mean it will be conservative Republican tomorrow.

“The reason I am here and the reason next month I’m going to be going to Alabama, Mississippi, to some very conservative states, is for a couple of reasons. First of all it is wrong for the Democratic party in my view to surrender half of the states in America. The national Democratic party must establish a 50-state strategy including the state of Texas and start running the Republicans on the defensive.”

He said that given the endemic poverty and other social problems in the south, it would be wrong for the Democratic party to “turn your back on some of the poorest states in America … We are not going to abandon those people.”

Another Sanders appearance in Phoenix on Saturday, at the Netroots Nation conference with fellow Democratic candidate Martin O’Malley, was interrupted by Black Lives Matter protesters, placing his response to the disruption under scrutiny.

In Houston, Sanders named African Americans who have died during encounters with police – “Sandra Bland, Eric Garner, Tamir Rice, Freddie Gray and many others” – and said, to a deafening cheer, that officers should be held accountable if they break the law.

He also addressed many of his key themes: wealth and income inequality, incarceration rates, infrastructure, campaign finance reform, a route to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, free tuition in public colleges, the environment and the evils of Wall Street.

“This campaign is sending a message to the billionaire class, and that message is – you can’t have it all,” he said.

“The only way we bring about real change is to create a political revolution where millions of people stand together and say loudly and clearly that this country belongs to all of us.”

If that remains a longshot, on Sunday night the chant from thousands in the stands was certainly loud, clear and heartfelt: “Bernie, Bernie, Bernie!”

Does Bernie Sanders surge threaten Hillary? // BBC // Anthony Zurcher – July 20, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton may be the prohibitive favourite to win the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, but that doesn't mean the political ground beneath her feet is solid.

In 2008 and again in 2012 a liberal coalition of minorities, college-educated whites and single women gave Barack Obama more than enough votes to comfortably win the presidency. Can it hold fast after he exits the stage next year?

A two-term presidency can paper over a host of fissures within a political movement. The longer a party stays in power, the more competing interests are liable to grow dissatisfied with their share of the governing pie.

Sometimes the centre holds. In 1988, for instance, George HW Bush rode to power on the strength of the Ronald Reagan governing coalition. By 1992, however, the foundation had given way, as fiscal and social conservatives revolted, ushering in eight years of Democratic rule and pushing the Republican Party farther to the right.

At the Netroots Nation conference of left-wing activists in Phoenix, Arizona, last week, the fault lines within today's Democratic Party were on full display. And while Mrs Clinton was more than a thousand miles away, honouring "prior commitments" in Iowa and Arkansas, the events that transpired in the desert this weekend should give her pause.

There's no question, for instance, that the enthusiasm and support for Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders' insurgent presidential campaign is real. He's climbed in polls over the past few weeks, and on Saturday night 11,000 turned out to hear the firebrand socialist give one of his 60-minute stem-winders.

On the menu was a heavy dose of liberal red meat - including condemnation of the "billionaire class" and calls for higher taxes on the wealthy, expanding government-run healthcare programmes, raising the minimum wage and tuition-free college education.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Bernie Sanders stands up for what's just and right," says conference attendee Jean Devine of Phoenix. "He's for the Democratic ideals of equality for all people and for the rich not being able to buy elections."

While in Arizona, campaign supporters hoisted banners and toasted their man at a local nightclub with cleverly named cocktails like "Weekend at Bernie's" and "Vermont Treehugger" (with maple syrup-infused whiskey).

There was a point in time when Mrs Clinton was the cool Democrat. She had her own internet meme. She was near universally beloved by party faithful. Now, however - at least among the rank and file at Netroots Nation - Mr Sanders is the candidate of the hour.

The Vermont senator has given voice to the frustration and anger that some on the left feel over the current state of US politics. They helped elect Barack Obama in 2008 and 2012, but their goal of enacting a full progressive agenda seems to them far from realised.

"Bernie's looking pretty good," says Hanna Roditi of Connecticut. "He's the only one who doesn't cater to corporations. The policies that he supports have more to do with people's needs."

The most common adjectives used to describe Mrs Clinton in Phoenix, on the other hand, were "calculating," "cautious" and "corporate".

"I won't vote for her," Roditi says, adding that if Mr Sanders doesn't win the Democratic nomination she'll write in his name on the general election ballot.

The establishment - whether in the government or the Democratic Party - was a source of anger time and again at the conference. During a Thursday afternoon panel discussion, EJ Juarez, director of Progress Majority Washington - singled out Democratic campaign managers in particular for betraying their party's progressive ideals.

"We ceded a lot of the soul of our values off to contractors who don't often adopt the equity principles we talk about," he said. "They aren't talking the same language."

On Friday morning Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren, a champion of the left, used her keynote address to rail against an "insider Washington" that ignores the liberal priorities of the nation at large - on issues like gun control, income inequality and tighter Wall Street controls.

"The American people are progressive, and our day is coming," she said.

After calling out the financial behemoth Citigroup by name, she said the US government - even during the Obama administration - has been dominated by Wall Street insiders. She then offered some advice for candidates seeking the presidency.

"I think that anyone running for that job - anyone who wants the power to make every key economic appointment and every key nomination - should say loud and clear we don't run this country for Wall Street and mega-corporations, we run it for people," she said to cheers.

It was likely a barb aimed at Mrs Clinton - who has been criticised by some on the left for being in the thrall of big-money donors - and set the stage for the Saturday's presidential town hall forum featuring Mr Sanders and fellow candidate Martin O'Malley.

A funny thing happened on the way to the forum, however - evidence of yet another frayed fibre in the Democratic electoral quilt.

Mr O'Malley took the stage first, and about 20 minutes into his question-and-answer session a group of several dozen protesters from the group Black Lives Matter interrupted the proceedings with chants, songs and shouts.

Tia Oso, leader of the Black Alliance for Just Immigration, commandeered a microphone and asked the former Baltimore mayor what he would do to "begin to dismantle structural racism in the United States".

Mr O'Malley was met by boos when he said: "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter." (He would later apologise, saying he did not want to "disrespect" the passion and commitment of the protesters.)

The demonstrations continued for Mr Sanders. At one point the senator snapped: "If you don't want me to be here, that's OK. I don't want to outscream people". He would later cancel previously scheduled afternoon meetings with conference attendees, including one with the Black Lives Matter group.

By evening, however, the Bernie show was back. The Phoenix conference centre was packed with the campaign loyalists in a display of grass-roots support outpacing even the 10,000 who turned out just weeks earlier in Madison, Wisconsin.

Bernie Sanders supporters rally last week at a Phoenix nightclub

Unlike that Mid-west liberal bastion, however, Arizona is decidedly conservative - an indication that the senator is drawing power across the country.

The true-believing left does have a history of rallying behind unvarnished candidates like Mr Sanders, however, and they have met with limited success. Paul Tsongas in 1992, Bill Bradley in 2000 and Howard Dean in 2004 are but a few of the men who failed to translate big crowds and energetic support into primary victories.

Mrs Clinton must hope that the Sanders campaign meets with a similar fate - and when it does, that progressive loyalists like conference attendee Pam Miles of Huntsville, Alabama return to the fold.

"Bernie Sanders says everything that I feel," Miles says. "He's a dynamo, he is a truth-teller, he speaks truth to power. I love Bernie."

She adds, however, that she'll be happy to back Mrs Clinton if she gets the nomination. She says she's keen to avoid the kind of intra-party discord that marred the Clinton-Obama battles of 2008.

"In '08 it was absolutely horrible," she says. "It broke friendships, it hurt feelings. I'm not going to do that this time."

As for the Black Lives Matters activists who became the surprise story of Phoenix, Wesley Lowery of the Washington Post asked Mrs Clinton how she would have responded to the protesters during a Facebook question-and-answer session on Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Black lives matter. Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that," she replied. "We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality. Black people across America still experience racism every day."

She went on to recommend body cameras for US police officers, sentencing reform, voting rights and early childhood education.

Unlike her Democratic competitors, Mrs Clinton had the luxury of time to respond to this latest challenge. Whether it will be enough to weather what could be a coming storm, however, remains to be seen.

Why are Arizona liberals, Twitter protesting Bernie Sanders? // Christian Science Monitor // Sarah Caspari – July 20, 2015

Progressive Democratic candidates Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley faced unrest in Phoenix, Ariz., Saturday from "Black Lives Matter" protesters.

The Vermont senator and the former Maryland governor were in Phoenix for what was supposed to be a forum led by interviewer and immigrants rights activist Jose Antonio Vargas at the Netroots Nation progressive convention. Instead, the crowd did most of the talking, demanding as a group that the candidates address police brutality and racism, The Associated Press reported.

For Sen. Sanders, the harsh reception was at odds with his reputation among progressives as a champion of advocacy for the marginalized. CNN reported that "excited supporters" began lining up to secure good seats for the event hours early, but by the end, protesters were walking out on him.

"I've been fighting civil rights for 50 years," Sanders said during the protest, reminding the audience that he had participated in the 1964 march where Martin Luther King, Jr. gave his famous "I Have a Dream" speech.

But in the eyes of many of the protesters and much of black America, that oft-cited fact is seen less as evidence of dedication to racial justice and more as an attempt at a catch-all shut-down for criticism, comedy podcaster and creator of the hashtag #BernieSoBlack Roderick Morrow told Vox.

"Bernie Sanders, while he does have a good track record on race in the past, he's kind of been avoiding talking about certain racial issues now," Mr. Morrow said. "Whenever he's asked a question, he goes into a spiel on economics – which is fine, obviously, people do want wage and class equality. But certain issues are race issues, and they do need to be talked about, at least from a candidate that I would like to vote for."

Morrow said he started the hashtag #BernieSoBlack because he felt supporters used Sanders' previous civil rights activism to "outblack" black critics.

"I made a joke that's like, 'Bernie's blacker than us! Bernie's SO BLACK!'" he said. "That's how it feels when they come into our mentions [on Twitter] and tell us that we don't know what we're talking about, and even though [Sanders] doesn't talk about #BlackLivesMatter right now, we should just kind of shut up."

At the Netroots Nation convention Saturday, Sanders tried giving prepared remarks on economic inequality, but the protesters continued shouting over him. After agreeing that “black lives matter” and referencing his past contributions to civil rights, Sanders threatened to leave, according to CNN.

"If you don't want me to be here, that's okay. I don't want to outscream people,” he said.

Later that night, Sanders addressed police brutality at an 11,000-person rally. "When a police officer breaks the law, that officer must be held accountable," Sanders said, according to AP.

He also quoted Civil War-era abolitionist and former slave Frederick Douglass, who said, "Freedom doesn't come without struggle."

Bernie Sanders And Allies In Congress To Propose $15 Federal Minimum Wage // IB Times // Cole Stangler – July 20, 2015

The Fight For 15 is heading to Washington. On Wednesday, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and Reps. Raul Grijalva (D-Ariz.) and Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), co-chairs of the 70-member Congressional Progressive Caucus, will unveil legislation that would set the federal minimum wage at $15 an hour--a figure that’s more than double the current rate of $7.25.

The proposal is unlikely to pass, but marks an ongoing leftward shift in the goalposts of minimum wage politics. By raising the pay floor to $15 by 2020, it outshines another Democratic proposal, backed by the White House, that sets a $12 rate by 2020. (That legislation, in turn, was a step up from another, previous Democratic proposal to raise the floor to $10.10 an hour.) In so doing, the bill ramps up pressure on liberal politicians looking to establish their low-wage worker bonafides. That development is especially relevant as Sanders and frontrunner Hillary Clinton, who recently declined to endorse the $15 figure, vye for the Democratic nomination for 2016.

The forthcoming legislation is, in part, a response to the so-called Fight for 15, a series of labor-backed protests calling for “$15 and a union,” says a Democratic staffer close to the Progressive Caucus. The high-visibility string of demonstrations and walk-outs, first organized by groups tied to the Service Employees International Union in late 2012, has driven the demand for $15 an hour into the political mainstream.

The staffer also pointed to growing momentum for a $15 minimum on the state level. On the same day that members of Congress will publicly announce their legislation, a New York wage panel is expected to formally endorse a $15 hourly minimum for fast food workers statewide. Gov. Andrew Cuomo impaneled the board earlier this year in response to ongoing protests. Meanwhile, activists in Oregon are moving closer to putting a $15 minimum wage initiative on the ballot in 2016.

According to the staffer, economists will also endorse the legislation on Wednesday. It is unlikely to gather much support, if any, from Republicans, but a majority of the Progressive Caucus is expected to support the bill.

Presidential politics play a role in the bill’s formation too. Sanders has already endorsed a $15 federal minimum, though not in legislative form. Last week, Clinton declined to back a national minimum of $15.

Bernie Sanders Gains Support In Republican States As Arizona & Texas Begin To Feel The Bern // Bustle // Greta Jochem – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders has long been regarded as an underdog to long-time favorite Hillary Clinton in the race for Democratic presidential nominee. But is that changing? Maybe.

According to The Hill, Monmouth University released a poll last Wednesday finding that since April, Clinton has dropped 10 points, while Sanders has gained nine. His jump is greatest in Iowa and New Hampshire — the first states to hold primaries in the 2016 election. Sanders has been on the road campaigning, and all poll numbers aside, over the weekend his support in historically Republican voting states was strong.

The socialist Democrat has some relativity radical stances on education, raising the minimum wage, and the environment. At the center of his campaign is the increasing economic inequality that plagues the United States. "What I'm doing in this campaign is trying to tell the people the truth," he said at a recent event in Iowa. "So let me lay it out on the table for you. You're living in a country today which has more wealth and income inequality than any major industrialized nation on earth."

His supporters have truly been feelin' the Bern. Over the weekend, Sanders headed to two major red states, Arizona and Texas, for a successful weekend.

Rihanna found love in a hopeless place, and Sanders is finding support in an unlikely place. In the past 10 elections, Arizona has voted for the Republican candidate. But on Saturday night, according to his campaign, Sanders greeted the largest crowd of the 2016 presidential race in Phoenix, Arizona. Sanders addressed the cheering crowd saying, "Somebody told me people are giving up on the political process… Not what I see here tonight." He touched on income inequality, climate change, and raising the minimum wage. Sanders also talked about jobs saying:

My Republican friends think that the CEOs of large corporations are the job-creators. You know who the job creators are? You are the job creators. When working people have money in their pocket, they go out and they buy goods and they buy services, and when they do that, they create jobs. But when millions of people have nothing to spend, we're not creating the jobs that we need.

Hitting the environment, he urged action, and said, "We have the moral obligation to lead the world in transforming our energy system." Sanders announced his single payer health care plans, saying, "health care must be seen as a right, not a privilege," and was greeted by overwhelming cheers.

On Sunday night, Sanders spoke in Texas — also a largely Republican state — to an excited crowd of 5,200 at the University of Houston. Mirroring his speech in Phoenix, he discussed topics like income inequality, unemployment, and education. He also took a strong stance on the United States' mass incarceration. Sanders said:

When we have so many of our young people in jail, to me it makes sense that we invest more in jobs and education rather than jails and incarceration.

He also spoke out against police brutality, citing Eric Gardner and Freddie Gray.

These are the cases that you have heard about recently but anyone who thinks this has not been going on decade after decade would be very wrong. It is unacceptable that police officers beat up people or kill people. If they do that, they have got to be held accountable.

rnie Sanders, the septuagenarian senator who's exciting crowds with his outspoken liberal agenda, has been added to the list of presidential candidates appearing at the National Urban League's convention in Fort Lauderdale.

Like the big names, Democrat Hillary Clinton and Republican Jeb Bush, Sanders is slated to appear July 31 at a session at which the candidates "will share their visions for saving our cities."

BIDEN

Waiting on Biden // Roll Call // Matt Fleming – July 20, 2015

While most Senate Democrats are #ReadyForHillary, a few are waiting on Joe.

After both buzzed through the Capitol last week — Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. made the trip as the White House's emissary on an Iran nuclear disarmament deal and former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton was there to shore up support for her White House bid — Clinton has already locked up the bulk of the Democrats and time seems to be running short for anyone else.

The reasons vary, but some holdouts are waiting to support a candidate out of deference to Biden — who represented Delaware in the Senate for 36 years and hasn't ruled out a third run for the Oval Office.

A couple of members sound ready to endorse him, but no one told CQ Roll Call they're urging him to get in the ring.

"I'm waiting to see about what the vice president is going to decide," Sen. Thomas R. Carper, D-Del., said. "He's been my friend for a long time."

Carper has held elected office in Delaware since 1976, as state treasurer, congressman, governor and finally senator. He spoke highly of Clinton, but his ties with Biden are understandably strong.

Carper did not call for Biden to enter the race, instead saying Biden should decide in his own time. "I don't think there's a need for a rush to judgement on this, people throughout this country have huge admiration and affection for him," he said.

Following a closed-door meeting in the Capitol between Biden and Foreign Relations Committee Democrats, Delaware's junior senator, Chris Coons, said Biden "showed today the remarkable, the impressive depth he has in foreign policy and national security; his thorough grasp of the underlying issues, his energy and his engagement."

"It was an impressive and compelling conversation, so I have no doubts that he would be a very strong candidate if that's what he chooses," Coons said, though he also declined to call on Biden to run. "But I really hope folks will let him reach a decision on a timeline that is appropriate for him and his family."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. John Carney, the state's lone representative in the House, is another longtime Delaware politician, having served as lieutenant governor, secretary of Finance, chief of staff under then-Gov. Carper, and even as a Senate staffer for Biden.

In a statement, Carney spokeswoman Francesca Amodeo noted her boss hasn't made any statements on the race, but said, "If the Vice President throws his hat in the ring, Rep. Carney will absolutely be supporting him."

Biden's support is slimmer outside of the First State's delegation. Last week, Minority Leader Harry Reid reiterated he had not endorsed Clinton. The Nevada Democrat is waiting to make a decision, possibly out of deference to Biden.

Others are holding off on endorsing for other reasons. Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, stayed neutral through the 2008 Democratic primary and remains neutral this time around. But Brown was complimentary of Clinton following her trip to the Capitol last week.

Oregon's delegation — Democratic Sens. Ron Wyden and Jeff Merkley — is also declining to endorse at the moment, with both addressing their concerns recently to The Oregonian.

Wyden said he supports Clinton, but didn't think it was "time for a formal endorsement," while Merkley said Clinton wasn't strong enough yet on campaign finance, income inequality and trade.

Sen. Jon Tester of Montana chairs the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and is choosing to stay neutral. Sen. Bernard Sanders, I-Vt., is running for the nomination. Sen. Edward J. Markey, D-Mass., declined to say why he hasn't endorsed.

And Sen. Angus King, the Maine independent who caucuses with Democrats, told MSNBC in April he'll let the parties decide who the candidates will be.

"I'm the only guy in Washington who can get away with not answering that question," King said.

It's not that Biden doesn't have supporters in the Senate — he is generally well-liked and highly regarded in the body where he spent so many years. It's more because of personal preference mixed with a too-little-too-late vibe.

Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin, D-Md., said he is a "huge Joe Biden fan" — but he ultimately endorsed Clinton. Cardin predicted Clinton would be the nominee with a "relatively" easy time.

Sen. Tim Kaine, D-Va., who endorsed Clinton before she even announced her candidacy, said she shouldn't "take anything for granted" because "people love [Biden]," but Kaine didn't believe Biden would run with Clinton in the race.

Sen. Christopher S. Murphy, D-Conn., another Clinton endorser, said Biden would be a "fantastic candidate," but pointed out he is running out of time to get into the race.

Clinton's campaign has been running both officially and unofficially for some time now, spending time messaging and on the ground with supporters. While Biden is a sitting vice president, she has global name ID. As of June 30,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary for America had raised more than $47 million during its first quarter.

So, endorsements aren't the only thing Biden is behind on. Perhaps that's why no senators are saying they think Biden could beat Clinton, while others are convinced of the inevitability of a Clinton nomination.

Sen. Gary Peters, D-Mich., said he thought Clinton would win both the primary and general elections, while Sen. Richard Blumenthal was blunt on whether Biden could beat her.

"No," said the Connecticut Democrat.

Joe Biden to talk college during upcoming Denver visit // Denver Post // Mark Matthews – July 20, 2015

During Joe Biden's planned trip to Denver on Tuesday, the vice president plans to highlight the importance of community colleges and their impact on the broader U.S. economy.

Here's the full rundown from the administration, released Monday afternoon.

"On Tuesday, July 21st, the Vice President will travel to Denver, Colorado to deliver remarks on the Administration's economic policies, and participate in a roundtable discussion at the Community College of Denver's New Manufacturing Center.

"This roundtable will focus on the importance of helping more Americans go to college and the critical role that partnerships between community colleges and employers can play in helping Americans obtain the skills they need to succeed in the workforce."

What that Netroots Nation disaster can tell us about Democrats in 2016 // WaPo // Janell Ross – July 20, 2015

The chaos that broke out at the presidential forum at Netroots Nation over the weekend in Arizona courtesy of the Black Lives Matter movement has sparked a debate about just how united the longtime Democratic coalition -- a pillar of which is almost-uniform support from black voters --really is heading into the 2016 election.

The shock and umbrage that protest generated has been pretty well covered -- as has Martin O'Malley's apology. But, there's something bigger here than a momentary spectacle. Can any Democrat win the presidential nomination, much less the general election without those protesters and people outside the hall who have been essential to President Obama's victories? And if not, what will candidates have to do, say, support and ultimately propose to get those voters to show up to the polls?

Netroots Nation is an interesting window into the Democratic coalition; the annual gathering tends to attract political nerds, staffers and political obsessives. It also tends be run by and supported mostly by whites. (Yes, we know that voting rights was on the agenda this year and that there was at least one session featuring black female bloggers, political commentators and the like. But, still.)

This year, the activists who seized control of the presidential candidate forum didn't think the talk about expanding economic opportunity and creating citizen panels to review police complaints was enough. Or even close. There may be corners of the Democratic and Republican electorate who insist that the worst of black America's current problems stem from the prevalence of inter-group violence, joblessness and the shape of many black families. But, for these protesters and people who support them, the reality that by June nearly 400 unarmed people had been killed by police this year, and that a staggering and disproportionate share of them were black, is not a concern. It is the concern.

Their logic boils down to this: Black life in America and the pivotal conversations between families, between friends, between parents and kids has always included some element of physical danger. Today, for reasonable and relatively informed black people, the discussion about that danger has to include what can happen when in proximity to violent criminals, armed and frightened private citizens and police. One of those groups enjoys state sanction, making them the most threatening of all. Unlike those other groups, even when there are legitimate questions about police wrongdoing, excessive use of force or unlawful shootings, the odds of indictment and conviction remain shockingly low, as The Washington Post reported in April.

And, of course, if the way that police sometimes do their work has enhanced the odds that you may wind up dead, maimed or in jail, paying attention to police makes a certain amount of sense. Reasonable people don't have to agree with that read on America or what imperils black life in this country. But that's where the activists who stormed into Netroots are at. And there's evidence that others are there with them.

Now, in complete fairness to O'Malley, Bernie Sanders and all the politicians who weren't there, the spectacle at Netroots this weekend could also certainly be described as just that -- an obvious ploy for publicity. The Black Lives Matter movement has, so far, made clear its ability to galvanize public interest, to draw press attention and to disrupt events as well as the flow of traffic in major American cities. And in the time since that Netroots showdown this weekend the movement and its supporters flexed some serious satirical muscle in Sanders' direction in the form of the hashtag #BernieSoBlack. (Prepare to laugh. Prepare to gasp. Prepare to understand that, at least on line, these folks are a force with which 2016 candidates must reckon.)

A demonstrator protests recent grand jury decisions not to indict police officers in the deaths of Michael Brown and Eric Garner at Boston Common in Boston on Thursday. (Brian Snyder/Reuters)

But what else has Black Lives Matter got? And to what extent is the Black Lives Matter movement prepared to work in or with the existing political system to transform their goals into policy?On Saturday night, at a film festival in Washington, D.C, where organizers screened, "Vanguard of the Revolution," a new documentary about the rise and fall of the Black Panther Party, there were plenty of sobering reminders that the answers to those questions will matter. A lot.

Perhaps the most pointed came from former Black Panther Eddie Conway. Conway spent 44 years in a Maryland prison after a jury convicted him in the murder of a police officer. Conway has long claimed that he is innocent. Others have referred to him as a political prisoner. And in March 2014, Maryland prosecutors struck a deal with Conway. Conway was released. His conviction stands.

When an inevitable question about the Black Lives Matter movement came from the audience at that film screening, Conway offered this: "At some point, these young people, the Black Lives Matter movement, will have to something more than lay down in the street. Spectacle, believe me, is only a start."

Democratic Party Machinery Shows Rust // WSJ // Peter Nicholas & Colleen McCain Nelson – July 20, 2015

Democrat Chris Redfern was confident of his re-election chances, and with good reason. Voters in his state House district had elected Democrats for decades, and he was Ohio’s Democratic Party chairman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet on election day, Mr. Redfern lost to a tea-party Republican, a defeat that drove him from politics into a new line of work, running an inn and winery.

Mr. Redfern's political exit came amid a string of midterm-election losses by Democrats in Ohio and nationwide that reflected a deeper problem: As the party seeks its next generation of candidates, the bench has thinned.

A tepid economy and President Barack Obama's sinking approval ratings contributed to some of the Democratic losses last fall. The setbacks also revealed a withering of the campaign machinery built by Mr. Obama's team more than seven years ago. While Democrats held the White House, Republicans have strengthened their hand in statehouses across the U.S.

Democrats maintain a significant electoral college advantage as shifting U.S. demographics tilt their way. This spring, a Pew Research Center analysis found that 48% of Americans either identify as Democrats or lean Democratic, compared with 39% who identify with Republicans or lean Republican.

But many Democrats worry that GOP success capturing state and local offices will erode that advantage before they have a chance to rebuild.

"If you don't have a well-funded state party, if you don't have state infrastructure, then you're just whistling past the graveyard," Mr. Redfern said. From his new perch in the hospitality industry, he described leading the state party as the "worst job in politics."

After two presidential victories, Mr. Obama presides over a Democratic Party that has lost 13 seats in the U.S. Senate and 69 in the House during his tenure, a net loss unmatched by any modern U.S. president.

Democrats have also lost 11 governorships, four state attorneys general, 910 legislative seats, as well as the majorities in 30 state legislative chambers. In 23 states, Republicans control the governor's office and the legislature; Democrats, only seven.

Such losses help shape the future: An ousted state lawmaker doesn't run for Congress; a failed attorney general candidate loses a shot at the governor's office. As a result, the flow of fresh political talent rising to statewide and national prominence in the years ahead won't be as robust as Democrats hope.

The party's failure to elect more governors, for example, has shrunk the pool of potential Democratic presidential candidates, one reason few have challenged Hillary Clinton for the 2016 nomination.

For now, the two parties wield their influence in competing branches of government: Republicans in control of Congress, using state-level dominance to draw congressional districts friendly to GOP candidates; and Democrats in the White House, using their demographic advantage nationwide.

In few places are the Democrats' troubles more apparent than in Ohio, the perennial presidential battleground state twice won by Mr. Obama. Ohio Democrats lost every statewide contest in the November midterms, allowing the GOP to build supermajorities in both legislative chambers. Democrats won just a quarter of races last year for county commissioner—the local masters of land-use rules, as well as county roads, jails and a host of other government services.

The losses in Ohio are the consequences of failing to develop a strong corps of local officeholders and the campaign machinery to support them, Democrats in the state say.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One reason Democrats have struggled to recruit candidates for higher office is that the pipeline has been choked off by a redistricting process dominated by the GOP. In Ohio, a five-member state committee made up of elected officials draws the district lines for state legislative seats that serve as a springboard to higher office.

The Ohio League of Women Voters, which has been studying redistricting for decades, says district boundaries now favor Republican candidates—just as in the past, Democrats drew lines that benefited their party, according to Carrie Davis, executive director.

An independent study of Ohio's redistricting process in 2011 concluded: "The party in power used the process to gain maximum political advantage." Today, Republicans outnumber Democrats in the state Legislature 2 to 1.

With a shallow bench, Ohio's Democratic candidate for governor, Ed FitzGerald, a former mayor and county executive, faced little opposition in the party primary. Once nominated, bad news undermined his candidacy, including the revelation that he drove for years without a valid driver's license. He lost by 30 percentage points in November to incumbent Gov. John Kasich.

Mike Zickar, chairman of the Wood County Democratic Party, said members of his executive board confided to him that even they didn't vote for Mr. FitzGerald, instead leaving the top of the ballot blank.

Without an inspiring candidate at the top of the ticket, Democrats in the 2014 midterm elections couldn't rely on a broad network of volunteers, the kind of force that boosted Mr. Obama to wins in Ohio in 2008 and 2012. The state party mustered three paid field staff members; two years earlier, with Mr. Obama's re-election bid in full swing, the number was 600.

"I offered to do more, work-wise, but nobody ever contacted me," said Loree Resnik, a neighborhood team leader during Mr. Obama's re-election campaign.

Nina Turner, a former Ohio state senator who lost her bid for secretary of state last year, said Democrats asked for a visit by Mr. Obama or first lady Michelle Obama, an invitation the White House said was never received.

"We would have loved to have the president come into Ohio," Ms. Turner said. "They didn't come…I'm not going to mince words about it. We needed help in 2014, and we did not get it."

White House officials said the president did all he could to boost fellow Democrats, headlining dozens of fundraisers and appearing at a handful of campaign events during the midterm campaign. They said he was willing to do more but few candidates wanted to share a stage with the president, whose popularity was slipping at the time.

Obama campaign officials said the president's campaign staff shared voter files, data and volunteer lists with Ohio Democrats. But they acknowledged that the energy and manpower that boosted Mr. Obama's White House bids in 2008 and 2012 couldn't be easily replicated in last year's midterm elections.

"People have a false expectation that because Obama was able to create all this enthusiasm that it was directly transferrable to the next campaign," Aaron Pickrell, a top Obama campaign official in Ohio, said of Democrats' struggles in 2014. "It doesn't mean that Obama can just flip a switch and say, 'Now go work for these people.'"

Ohio's Democrats are trying to regroup. This spring in Columbus, party officials began training candidates for local office on everything from how to ask their friends for money to when to put up yard signs.

During a Saturday morning session, candidates for city councils, mayor and the state Legislature watched PowerPoint presentations and lobbed questions at Democratic officials about the nuts and bolts of campaigning.

Ms. Turner, the former candidate for secretary of state, told the few dozen Democratic hopefuls that "the glitz and the glamour seem to be on the federal level…but this is where the rubber meets the road."

In nearby Union County, Ohio Democratic Party Chairman David Pepper, who succeeded Mr. Redfern, joined a statewide listening tour aimed at re-energizing the party. One conclusion, detailed in a report by state Democratic leaders: We need better candidates.

Written in the aftermath of Mr. FitzGerald's defeat, the report said: "A strong bench of effective public servants at all levels comprises the heart of a strong state party." A priority for the state party will be "recruiting and cultivating candidates who connect with voters, win elections at all levels, and once they enter office, make a difference on the issues that matter most in the lives of their constituents."

Democrats are quick to say they will rebound, just as the GOP bounced back from setbacks in 2006 and 2008. At the same time, some Democrats say the party can't ignore its state-level defeats.

"We have a little bit of blue in the West Coast. A little bit of blue in the Northeast, and occasional blue elsewhere. But, boy, it's a bright red map in all of those big, square states," said former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle. "That's where I do worry about recruiting and building a bench and finding ways to connect with real voters. We're not doing a very good job of that."

On the campaign trail, Mrs. Clinton has assured local Democrats that she is aware of past setbacks and is committed to making the party more competitive at all levels. More states need a "permanent Democratic Party," she has said.

Earlier this month in Iowa City, Mrs. Clinton mentioned Iowa Republican Joni Ernst's victory over the Democratic candidate in the 2014 race to succeed longtime Democratic senator Tom Harkin. "I want to help rebuild the Democratic Party in Iowa because you can't have a loss like having Tom Harkin retire and not be really motivated to get other Democrats in there," she said.

Some Democrats blame Mr. Obama, saying his political machine, Organizing for Action, was good at electing him president but has done little for other candidates.

"That did hurt the Democratic Party, because a lot of money went into OFA that might have ordinarily gone into the Democratic National Committee," said Howard Dean, a former DNC chairman.

The Obama team "basically ignored" the party, said Ed Rendell, former governor of Pennsylvania and former chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Mr. Obama's defenders said he has left a lasting legacy by modernizing campaigns with data and technology.

"The tools and the tech culture that defined the Obama operation are now ingrained here at the party," Mo Elleithee, the former communications director for the Democratic National Committee, said before leaving the job last month.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Pepper, Ohio's party chairman, meanwhile told Democratic activists during his state tour: "Every volunteer who gets excited about Hillary Clinton, we can't let them leave a year later. Every piece of information we enter into the voter file, we keep and learn from not just to win in '16, but to win in '18."

Kenya is set to welcome Obama 'home' to a continent that feels ignored // Reuters – July 20, 2015

When Barack Obama visits Africa this month, he will be welcomed by a continent that had expected closer attention from a man they claim as their son, a sentiment felt acutely in the Kenyan village where the 44th U.S. president's father is buried.

"We thought the American government could at least bring some assistance to the area," said Stephen Okumu Obewa, a teacher in Kogelo village who works at Senator Barack Obama Primary School, named before Obama reached the White House.

"Maybe he is interested somehow but we are not aware," he said in a scruffy school with many broken chairs and desks.

Obama wrote about a visit to Kogelo in his 1995 book "Dreams from My Father", which helped launch his swift political ascent.

Some of the fame rubbed off on the village. Tourists turned up and visitors often knock on the door of Mama Sarah, as Obama's step-grandmother is known.

Nearby is the grave of his father, the senior Barack Obama, a Kenyan government economist who died in a car accident in 1982, 21 years after fathering the future U.S. president while living in Hawaii as a visiting student.

Many Africans wonder why Obama has not made development on their continent more a priority in his two terms in office.

"With his election, there was this huge euphoria and high hopes that the U.S.-Africa relationship would see substantive improvements and the U.S. would give more attention to Africa," said David Zounmenou, a research fellow at the Institute for Security Studies in South Africa. "But the record is very weak."

Obama visits Kenya and Ethiopia later in July, his third major trip to Sub-Saharan Africa after traveling to Ghana in 2009 and to Tanzania, Senegal and South Africa in 2011. He has also visited Egypt, and South Africa for Nelson Mandela's funeral.

"NOT LIKE AN AFRICAN MAN"

"My hope is that we can deliver a message that the U.S. is a strong partner not just for Kenya, but for Sub-Saharan Africa generally," Obama said last week. He said he hoped to build on progress made in health, education and counterterrorism, and to encourage democracy and reducing corruption.

U.S. officials say the perception Obama has ignored Africa is unfair. They point to U.S. efforts to contain the Ebola virus in West Africa and a $7 billion continent-wide initiative to expand electricity supply that was launched in 2013.

But that is a tiny sum compared to the many billions that China has been spending on infrastructure in Africa, bringing roads, airports and railways to a continent with almost 1 billion people and an emerging middle class.

The year Obama took office, 2009, was also the year China overtook the United States as Africa's biggest trade partner.

Nor does Obama have a signature African achievement, unlike his two predecessors.

George W. Bush was lauded for funding HIV/AIDS treatment across the continent. Bill Clinton signed a law which sharply reduced trade restrictions on imports from 35 African states. Obama, who leaves office in January 2017, has carried on both initiatives, but cannot claim them as his own.

"To me, he's not like an African man. He doesn't even have a building or a business here," said Calvine Rachuonyo, 28, who drives a motorcycle taxi in Kisumu, the nearest big city to Obama's father's western Kenyan home village.

In Kenya, his visit could attract some protests, most likely small. Members of one fringe anti-gay group are planning to protest naked in the capital on the eve of Obama's visit because of his support for gay rights. A student group says it will defile a tree that Obama planted before he became president at Nairobi University, unless he returns there for another visit.

Still, the upcoming arrival has meant an uptick in business for Victor Agwa, who sells Obama trinkets and t-shirts, some emblazoned with the words "Son of Africa", in Kisumu.

Agwa sold a thousand T-shirts before Obama's first election in 2008. Since then, business has steadily declined.

"People have a feeling that maybe he got too busy to come here," he said, hoping for more visits when Obama leaves office.

U.S. Ambassador Robert Godec has said Obama would not visit Kogelo, and that he will instead address the Kenyan people at a Nairobi stadium on July 26.

But Kogelo residents are still preparing just in case Obama does turn up, including sprucing up the grave site of the president's father.

"The gate is always open for Barack, day and night," said Mashart Onyango, who lives on the family compound and said she was one of Obama's aunts. "He is our relative."

BUSH

Jeb Bush Promises to Curb Lobbying and Cut Size of Government // NYT // Michael Barbaro – July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush outlined on Monday a sweeping and detailed plan to rein in the size of the federal government and to curb the influence of the lobbyists who live off it, calling for a 10 percent reduction in workers, an immediate hiring freeze, a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget and a six-year waiting period before members of Congress can become lobbyists.

Invoking his record as a budget watchdog during his time as Florida's governor, Mr. Bush vowed to replicate that approach during his first term as president if the 2016 election sends him to Washington, which he held up as a model of unyielding dysfunction.

"The overspending, the overreaching, the arrogance, and the sheer incompetence in that city – these problems have been with us so long that they are sometimes accepted as facts of life," Mr. Bush said in Tallahassee, not far from Florida's Capitol. "But a president should never accept them, and I will not."

Mr. Bush also vowed to "challenge the whole culture in our nation's capital."

His speech amounted to a pointed rebuttal to his Republican rivals in the presidential campaign who have questioned the depth of his conservatism. It also appeared to be an attempt to portray Mr. Bush as he defines himself: a serious leader prepared to govern, rather than a clever speaker without a meaningful record, as he depicts many of his opponents.

Much of his agenda would face stiff resistance in Washington, where a divided Congress could present a set of obstacles Mr. Bush rarely faced as governor, when the Republican Party dominated the state's government.

Mr. Bush said his policies could reduce the size of the federal work force by 10 percent in four years. Much of that, he said, would be accomplished through attrition and a strict system of replacing every three departing federal workers with one new employee.

In a proposal likely to be greeted with deep opposition from federal workers and the unions that represent them, Mr. Bush demanded changes to the Civil Service system that would make it far easier to punish and replace employees.

"There are a lot of exemplary employees in the federal government, but they're treated no better than the bad ones," Mr. Bush said. "And the bad ones are almost impossible to effectively discipline or remove."

But he held out a carrot along with the stick: merit pay and bigger raises for high-performing workers and managers who save money for the government.

Mr. Bush took direct aim at K Street, Washington's collection of lobbying firms that have long employed former lawmakers to do the bidding of major corporations.

He proposed heightened levels of disclosure that would require members of Congress to report every meeting with a lobbyist on a weekly basis. The information would be posted on congressional websites.

Mr. Bush has been critical of the lobbying culture, regularly repeating an anti-Washington message during his fledgling presidential campaign. But he also has tapped the fund-raising potential of the K Street crowd, bringing in millions of dollars for his “super PAC” from Washington lobbyists, political operatives, lawyers and business leaders.

His most eyebrow-raising plan: requiring an inflexible six-year ban on lobbying for departing members of Congress. Currently, departing House members must observe a “cooling-off period” of a year before lobbying on Capitol Hill, and departing senators must wait two years.

“We need to help politicians to rediscover life outside of Washington,” Mr. Bush said. “Which — who knows? — might even be a pleasant surprise for them.”

He said he was not interested in making friends with Washington’s power brokers, a fact that seemed clear from his proposal to encourage members of Congress to show up for votes.

Mr. Bush wants Congress to introduce a bill that would dock members pay for days when they are absent from work.

“The reality,” he said, “is that Congress is in session for three days in a typical week anyway, so it’s not asking too much that every member be there and work on those days.”

How Jeb Bush would revamp Washington and the federal government // WaPo // Ed O’Keefe – July 20, 2015

In Jeb Bush's Washington, the federal workforce would shrink, a president would earn back line-item veto powers and former lawmakers wouldn't be able to lobby old colleagues for at least six years.

The former Florida governor and Republican presidential candidate on Monday embraced a series of fix-it plans that congressional Republicans and watchdog groups have tried failed to enact for decades. Democrats noted that many of Bush's wealthy supporters would be directly affected by the changes.

"Should I win this election, you will not find me deferring to the settled ways of 'Mount Washington,'" he said during a speech at Florida State University. "The overspending, the overreaching, the arrogance, and the sheer incompetence in that city -- these problems have been with us so long that they are sometimes accepted as facts of life. But a president should never accept them, and I will not."

As a gubernatorial candidate in the 1990s, Bush derided what he called "Mount Tallahassee," a city where lawmakers and lobbyists grew too cozy. Now, as a presidential candidate, he tells voters how he slashed $2 billion in spending and helped cut the state payroll by roughly 13,000 public sector workers, all while Florida's economy grew at roughly 4 percent annually -- thanks partly to a housing boom that later fizzled.

Bush, a professed policy wonk, sometimes sounded on Monday like a White House budget director or lawmaker pining to be Speaker of the House as he ticked off a series of potential reforms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He endorsed a federal worker attrition plan Republicans have unsuccessfully pursued for years that would replace every three departing federal workers with just one new hire. He backed a GOP plan to partially restore the line-item veto by letting the White House demand a separate up-or-down vote on spending items a president dislikes. And he said he likes military contracting reforms unveiled in March that would strip away many of the mundane hurdles faced by Pentagon contracting officers.

Most boldly, Bush proposed a six-year "cooling off" period for former lawmakers who want to be lobbyists -- an aggressive expansion of current law. Once a House lawmaker leaves office, they must wait one year before actively lobbying former colleagues; senators must wait two years.

"We need to help politicians to rediscover life outside of Washington, which -- who knows? -- might even be a pleasant surprise for them," he said.

Bush said he wanted lawmakers to publish on their official Web site any time they meet with lobbyists -- including people who work in "government relations" or "government affairs." And he would also expand President Obama's current policy of banning departing executive branch officials from lobbying the administration.

The changes would have an adverse affect on Washington's $3.2 billion lobbying industry, and several former lawmakers-turned-lobbyists dismissed Bush's ideas as unworkable.

"It's over the top," said former Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), who works for Deloitte, the consulting giant. He suggested that online reporting requirements would violate the constitutional right to petition the government.

"Shouldn’t a congressman be able to meet with some expert without the world knowing about it?" he said. "Why would Congress want to give that authority up?"

Davis said he likes Bush as a candidate, but suggested the former governor might have other motives: "If you’re a Bush, running against Washington is a lot harder than if you’re other people."

Former Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), who once chaired the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee, called Bush's plan "far-reaching."

"It sounds good – just like President Obama’s proposals sounded good not to hire former lobbyists – but then he ended up depriving his administration of some very good talent," he said.

Obama banned lobbyists from serving in his administration except in limited circumstances. Since the ban began in 2009, at least 61 executive branch employees have received waivers from parts of the ethics pledge.

Waxman retired this year after 40 years in Congress and now works for a public relations and consulting shop established by his son. A vocal supporter of environmental protections and health-care reform, Waxman said he works "only for those clients and those causes that I advocated for in Congress. ... I have no apologies to make for that."

Two former lawmakers-turned-lobbyists who are active Bush supporters, Republicans Tom Loeffler (Tex.) and Vin Weber (Minn.), didn't return requests for comment.

Bush's campaign and allied groups raised an unprecedented $119 million for his presidential bid in the last quarter. The campaign raised $11.4 million, with the rest raised by an allied super PAC and another leadership PAC. Given the size of the haul, Bush has faced criticism from some of his GOP rivals -- including business magnate Donald Trump -- that the large sums mean he might one day reward top donors representing interest groups or corporations.

Eight lobbyists raised a collective $228,400 for Bush during the second quarter, according to Federal Election Commission filings submitted by the campaign Wednesday. The top bundlers including William P. Killmer of the Mortgage Banking Association, who raised $36,200; Ignacio Sanchez, co-chair of the lobbying practice at DLA Piper, who raised $32,400; and Al Cardenas, former chairman of the Republican Party of Florida and now a lobbyist at Squire Patton Boggs, who helped bring in $18,900.

A number of lobbyists, though not bundlers, also contributed the individual limit of $2,700 to Bush's campaign. They include Kirk Blalock of Fierce Government Relations, David Beightol and Brian Sailer of Flywheel Government Solutions and Josh Holly of Podesta Group. And Bush drew support from top lobbyists within major corporations including Maria Cino of Hewlett-Packard, Matt Niemeyer of Goldman Sachs and Woody Simmons Jr. of Verizon Communications.

Bush also said Monday that he would push Congress to pass legislation that would withhold pay from lawmakers who miss votes.

"A bill to dock the pay of absentee members might not pass the House or Senate, but at least it would get them all there for a vote," he said.

Jeb Bush wants to dock members of Congress for missing votes. What would that look like? // WaPo // Philip Bump – July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush has a crazy idea: Maybe members of Congress should get paid for how much they actually work.

In a speech on Monday, the former governor of Florida proposed creating a way to get members of Congress to show up for votes. "If it's an incentive they need," he said, "how about the one that pretty much every worker in America has in their job: you don't show up, you don't get paid for that time."

Bush was targeting the habit of some members of the House and Senate to miss the (relatively few) votes that each chamber actually takes. Like his primary opponents in the presidential race, for example.

Since January, Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio and Lindsey Graham have each missed at least a fifth of the votes the Senate has taken, according to data from GovTrack. Since getting to the Senate, Cruz and Rubio have each missed at least one in ten votes -- which is in part a function of their having been running for president for much of their tenures as senators. (And, yes, the figure pales next to the votes missed by President Obama when he was a senator.)

Bush didn't really articulate how the plan would work. But let's say that the senators only got the same percentage of their $174,000 salaries as the percentage of votes they made. That would result in Graham and Cruz losing $40,000 a year -- and Rubio losing $50,000.

That's only looking at votes, though. As Bush pointed out, Congress is "in session for three days in a typical week anyway." Since 1978, Congress has been in session for a full five-day week about once every two months, thanks in part to the vacation schedule members enjoy. Members of Congress will point out that they are doing work even when they are not in session, but of course that's harder to gauge.

For kicks, let's apply the Bush formula more broadly. The government's Office of Personnel Management says a full-time year is 2,087 hours of work -- 261 days, or thereabouts.

Here's how Congress' number of days in session has compared to that standard since 1985.

It was only toward the end of 2014 that Congress had been in session for enough days since January 1, 2013 to match the government annual standard of workdays.

In 2014, the Senate was in session for 136 days and the House for 135. That's about 52 percent of the OPM standard for work days. Let's -- generously! -- give them another 60 days that they worked doing other things, having meetings in districts, etc. That means that each branch worked about 75 percent of a full year -- and that each should get about $130,000 of their $174,000 salaries.

Bush also made another point: That a bill like this would never be passed by Congress. He probably meant that legislators wouldn't vote against their own economic self-interest. But he also might have meant that Congress simply doesn't hold that many votes.

Jeb Bush says he would make it harder for lawmakers to become lobbyists // WaPo // Catherine Ho – July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush on Monday said that former House and Senate members should be banned from lobbying their former colleagues for six-years after leaving office as the Republican candidate outlined how he would push to limit the lobbying industry's influence if he becomes president.

The proposed change would significantly lengthen the "cooling off period" for members of Congress who later lobby lawmakers on behalf of paying clients, such as corporations and foreign governments. House members currently have a one-year ban on lobbying and Senate members have a two-year ban. Changing the current system would require congressional action.

Bush said he would put in place similar restrictions for officials who leave the White House for lobbying jobs, but did not specify an exact length of time. Currently, executive branch officials who become lobbyists have either a one or a two-year ban, depending on their seniority level.

"I will strengthen existing prohibitions that prevent departing executive branch employees from lobbying members of my administration," Bush said in a speech in Tallahassee.

Bush also proposed stricter lobbying disclosure rules that would require lobbyists and members of Congress to report every meeting they have with each other.

"Every time a lobbyist meets with any member of Congress, that should be reported online — every week, and on the member's official Web site," Bush said.

It is not the first time Bush voiced criticism of the lobbying industry. In a speech announcing his candidacy last month, he said "swarms of lobbyists" have complicated the U.S. tax code by advocating for special provisions and carve-outs for the industries they represent.

On Monday, he continued to take aim at K Street.

"It's the relentless expansion of government that made lobbying Washington's premier growth industry," he said. "Spending on lobbying has risen by more than 45 percent over the past decade, translating to $12.5 million per member of Congress. Restrain federal spending and bureaucratic meddling, and we'll disrupt the culture that thrives on big government."

Despite his tough rhetoric, Bush enjoys support, financial and otherwise, from many lobbyists, including several former members of Congress. This group includes retired Reps. Tom Loeffler (R-Texas) and Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.), who are now lobbyists at Akin Gump. Both declined to comment on the lobbying proposal Bush discussed on Monday. Loeffler, a longtime supporter and adviser to the Bush family, was one of eight lobbyists who bundled a collective $228,400 for Bush during the second quarter of 2015. Loeffler raised $31,500 for Bush's campaign during that period.

Bush also has the support of retired Reps. Vin Weber (R-Minn.) and Denny Rehberg (R-Mont.), both of whom are now lobbyists at the lobby and public affairs firm Mercury. Neither immediately returned a request for comment Monday. Weber has spoken at an event for Bush's super PAC about economic mobility and has said he is interested in advising on policy. Rehberg has been gathering support for Bush in Montana and Washington.

Jeb Bush Takes Aim at Lobbyists // WSJ // Beth Reinhard & Chris Stewart – July 20, 2015

Vowing to rattle the political establishment in Washington, Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush on Monday said members of Congress should disclose their meetings with lobbyists and refrain from lobbying former colleagues for six years after leaving office.

Senators are now barred from lobbying their former colleagues for two years after stepping down, though House members can advocate on issues in that chamber after a year. Critics say the rules are regularly flouted because ex-lawmakers and administration officials, who also face restrictions, have begun calling themselves "strategic advisers" or other titles that don't require them to register as lobbyists.

"We need a president willing to challenge the whole culture in our nation's capital," Mr. Bush, the former governor of Florida, said in Tallahassee, the state capital.

Mr. Bush's proposed lobbying overhauls were part of a sweeping speech promising to shrink the federal workforce and budget, goals that have long been advocated by Republicans in Washington.

His attack on lobbyists and special interests also is a familiar theme on the campaign trail, usually espoused by Democrats.

In his first term, President Barack Obama signed an executive order barring his appointees who later become lobbyists from advocating on the issues they had worked on at the White House. He also banned gifts from lobbyists. Almost all of those rules have been loosened or abandoned since then for legal, political and practical reasons.

The anti-lobbying agenda runs counter to what happened in Florida after Mr. Bush as governor passed legislation aimed at cracking down on the advocacy class. He delivered his remarks at Florida State University, whose president, John Thrasher, served in the Florida House during Mr. Bush's first term before becoming a lobbyist at one of the highest-grossing firms in the state. He later returned to the state Senate.

In December 2005, one year before he left office, Mr. Bush signed a law requiring lobbyists to disclose their compensation and banning them from plying lawmakers with meals and gifts. On Monday, Mr. Bush called the measure "the strictest lobbying reforms in the country."

However, state disclosure reports show that the lobbying community saw robust growth after the law was passed. Lobbyists reported fees ranging from about $145 million to $219 million in 2007, according to filings with the state. Those dollar figures have risen gradually since Mr. Bush left office to a range of $178 million to $264 million in 2013. The range of the reported payments dipped in 2014 to $150 million to $240 million.

In addition, lobbyists found ways around the Florida law by contributing to lawmakers' political committees, which could then use the funds to pay for meals, travel and more. "It stopped us from getting coffee and a muffin but allowed us to get wheelbarrows of cash," said former Democratic House Majority Leader Dan Gelber. The new committees were banned in 2013 in another effort to curb special interests.

Another sign that the Florida law failed to mitigate the sector's influence: The number of registrations for legislative lobbyists increased from 7,915 in 2004 to 10,507 today, including lobbyists representing multiple clients.

"I think Gov. Bush helped usher in and encourage the rise of the super lobbying firms we see today," said Ben Wilcox, research director at Integrity Florida, a nonpartisan government watchdog group.

Mr. Bush's proposal could draw attacks from his Republican rivals, as lawyers and lobbyists donated $1.2 million to his 1998 and 2002 campaigns, according to the National Institute on Money in State Politics, and they are emerging as major backers of his presidential bid.

The campaign disclosed last week that eight lobbyists bundled a total of $228,400 of the $11.4 million raised in the first 15 days of Mr. Bush's campaign—more money from the industry than any other Republican candidate. The only other GOP contender who reported bundlers was Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who said three lobbyists raised $113,450 for his bid.

Mr. Bush's disclosures didn't include the $103 million raised by his super PAC as of June 30, which won't detail its donors until July 31. The super PAC held about half a dozen events in Washington and many of the co-hosts were lobbyists. It also organized a $1,000-per-person February fundraiser in Tallahassee that was co-hosted by 55 industry groups and individuals, mostly registered lobbyists.

In 1991, Mr. Bush registered as a lobbyist in Miami-Dade County on behalf of his real estate company with developer Armando Codina before he was elected to office, according to records. The documents show Mr. Bush also listed that he was representing the Deering Bay residential development, which he and Mr. Codina sold after it was battered by Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

"Governor Bush was not working as a lobbyist," said a spokeswoman, Kristy Campbell. "This was specific to the Derring Bay project where Governor Bush was a partner and the project required the Commission weigh in on permitting approval issues to move forward with work."

Jeb Bush Vows to Shake Up 'Mount Washington' Establishment // WSJ // Beth Reinhard – July 20, 2015

Boasting of reforms to “Mount Tallahassee” during his two terms as Florida governor, Republican candidate Jeb Bush on Monday vowed to shake up the status quo in Washington, D.C. if he is elected president.

“I was a governor who refused to go along with that establishment. I wasn’t a member of the club, and that made all the difference,” Mr. Bush said, according to his prepared remarks given at Florida State University in Tallahassee. “Should I win this election, you will not find me deferring to the settled ways of ‘Mount Washington,’ either.”

What Donald Trump Has Said -- About McCain, Obama, Immigrants, His Hair

Vowing to reform Washington, D.C. is a common talking point for presidential candidates, and it’s an especially tough case to make by a candidate who is the son and brother of past presidents.

Mr. Bush touted the state’s average annual economic growth of 4.4% on his watch, his vetoes of $2 billion in spending projects, and the state’s upgraded bond rating. He was considered one of the most aggressive conservative governors when he served from 1999 to 2007.

As president, Mr. Bush said he would support a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget, line-item veto power, an overhaul of the defense procurement process, more detailed vetting of budget requests from federal agencies, and a freeze on federal hiring.

As governor, Mr. Bush stripped civil service protections from more than 16,000 state jobs, making workers easier to fire, a move that presaged fights Republican governors later waged in other states. Mr. Bush said Monday that federal employees should retain civil rights and whistleblower protections but that it should be easier to remove unproductive employees. He also backed merit pay and financial incentives for managers who reduce spending.

Mr. Bush also proposed that members of Congress should report their meetings with lobbyists online, and that the definition of lobbyists should be expanded “to address the cadre of ‘government relations’ and ‘government affairs’ specialists now populating the Capitol.” Ex-House and Senate members should be banned from lobbying for six years, he said.

Bush's speech is the first in a series to lay out his domestic priorities and he is expected later this year to release proposals dealing with entitlement programs and his plan to replace President Barack Obama's health care overhaul. He'll also hold town hall-style meetings in South Carolina and New Hampshire later this week.

Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush vows to cut spending, rein in lobbying // AP // Gary Fineout – July 20, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush on Monday vowed to rein in federal spending and combat the "arrogance," "sheer incompetence" and size of government if he's elected.

In a speech aimed at President Barack Obama's administration as well as his rivals for the GOP nomination, Bush called for limiting new hires in government and extending the ban on former members of Congress from lobbying their colleagues to six years.

Bush also called for amending the U.S. Constitution to require a balanced budget and to give the president line-item veto power to challenge what he called "Mount Washington," a quip echoing his time as governor when he called the state capital "Mount Tallahassee."

"The overspending, the overreaching, the arrogance, the sheer incompetence of the city are sometimes treated as though it's a fact of life," Bush said during a speech at Florida State University. "But a president should never accept it and I will not. We need a president willing to challenge the whole culture in our nation's capital - and I mean to do it."

Bush gave his speech less than a mile from where he spent eight years as Florida's governor and he pointed repeatedly to his achievements during two terms in office as proof he would fulfill his promises even though he was aided by a solid GOP majority in the Legislature.

Some of his remarks were aimed at fellow Republicans, including Sen. Marco Rubio, who is also running for president. Bush scolded members of Congress who miss votes and said they should forfeit their pay if they are absent. Rubio's missed votes have come under scrutiny recently.

"The reality is that Congress is in session for typically three days a week when they are up there, so it's not asking too much that every member be there and work on those days," Bush said.

A Democratic National Committee spokeswoman called Bush's "talk of government reform nothing but thin air."

"What we have seen from Jeb Bush before, we will see again - greater income inequality, sky high debt, allegiances to lobbyists and a failed economic agenda that benefits the wealthy," said Christina Freundlich. "Bush may have an elevated sense of his record here - but those who are paying attention know better. "

When Bush became governor in 1999, Republicans controlled both houses of the Legislature and the governor's mansion for the first time in more than a century. Many GOP leaders, including current FSU President John Thrasher, were eager to work with him many initiatives, including an overhaul of the state's public school system. That effort remains contentious 15 years after it was put in place.

Bush noted that as governor he pushed through tax cuts and overhauled the state's civil service system. He cut taxes consistently while the state's economy tracked upward, in part due to a supercharged real estate market that collapsed after he left office. But overall state spending also rose during his administration.

If he's elected Bush said he would save money by implementing a freeze on new hiring and to replace only one person for every three federal workers that retire. He said his goal was to eliminate 10 percent of the federal workforce within five years.

He also promised to crack down on the influence of lobbyists, noting that as governor he enacted a strict ban on gifts from lobbyists to legislators. He made his comments before an audience filled with many of his supporters and former aides who are now registered lobbyists. One of Bush's top advisers, Sally Bradshaw, is married to the founder of one of Tallahassee's most successful lobbying firms.

Jeb Bush says that 'arrogance and sheer incompetence' have been accepted in DC for too long // AP // Gary Fineout – July 20, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush, who pursued an aggressive agenda when he was Florida's governor for eight years, returns to the state capital on Monday where he plans to outline his top domestic priorities if elected.

date. In a preview on his campaign website Bush said it's time to challenge what he calls "Mount Washington." When he was governor Bush referred to state government as "Mount Tallahassee."

"We need a president who will not defer to the settled ways of 'Mount Washington,'" states Bush's campaign website. "The overspending, the overreaching, the arrogance and sheer incompetence has been accepted for too long."

It's not surprising that Bush would begin rolling out a series of policies even as the field for president continues to grow. Before he ran for president he constantly urged other Republicans to offer up alternatives to Democratic-backed ideas like President Barack Obama's health care overhaul instead of just opposing them.

The speech also reinforces Bush's attempts to distance himself from the other Washington politicians in the race, including U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, who is also from Florida.

When Bush became governor in 1999 it marked the first time that Republicans had complete control of Florida state government in more than a century. Many GOP leaders, including current FSU President John Thrasher, were eager to work with him on a long line of substantial initiatives, including an overhaul of the state's public school system that remains contentious 15 years after it was first put in place.

Bush, who has been an infrequent visitor to Tallahassee since he left office in 2007, is expected to tout that record as proof of his ability to push forward changes on taxes and spending. His website includes a video mentioning that Bush balanced budgets for eight years and built up billions in reserves while slashing state worker jobs.

The video, however, does not note that Florida requires the state to pass a balanced budget. The reserves cited by Bush also include money that the state won in a landmark settlement reached with the nation's tobacco companies prior to his election.

Bush was able to cut taxes consistently while he was governor because the state's economy tracked upward, part of which was due to a supercharged real estate market that collapsed after he left office.

Jeb Bush vows to shrink Washington's bloat // Politico // Matt Dixon – July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush kicked off a series of policy speeches in his old political stomping ground on Monday, rolling out a reform agenda for “Mount Washington,” a spinoff of the nickname he gave Tallahassee during his eight years as governor.

“We used to call this city 'Mount Tallahassee' because it was so remote from the people, caught up in the settled ways of a comfortable establishment,” Bush said to an audience of political supporters.

The former governor, who served from 1999 through 2007, used the speech to push for a handful of policy proposals he said will clean up Washington, outlining a plan to to blunt elected officials' ability to get rich by leaving office and quickly turning around to lobby their former colleagues, add transparency to lobbying meetings and expand the president’s veto power.

Bush delivered the roughly 30-minute speech to a room stocked with more than 200 allies, many of whom worked in his administration before transitioning to the lobbying firms that line Tallahassee’s downtown streets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush highlighted lobbying reforms he signed while he was in office, including a “gift ban” that prohibited lobbyists or any entity that employed a registered lobbyists from buying meals or gifts for lawmakers.

“Over time, lobbyists and legislators grew too comfortable in each other’s company,” Bush said, calling the gift ban one of the “strictest lobbying reforms in the county.”

He called for federal lobbying reforms, including forcing members of Congress to post any meetings with lobbyists online, and extending to six years a ban on members leaving office and becoming lobbyists.

“If I am elected president, I will use all of my influence to enact into law an immediate, unequivocal six-year ban on lobbying — a full Senate term — for ex-members of the House and Senate,” Bush said, to loud applause.

Bush's remarks also criticized members of Congress who miss votes, a category that includes Marco Rubio, a Miami Republican who is also running for president. (In February, POLITICO reported on a Vocativ analysis that showed Rubio had missed the most votes of any senator—a total off 99 votes, or about 8 percent, of the total 1,198 cast since he joined the Senate in 2011.)

Bush joked legislation blocking pay for members who miss votes might not pass, but at least “it would get them there for a vote.”

He also highlighted parts of his record that he said helped shrink the size of government in Tallahassee, a city he likened to Washington for its bloated special interests.

Bush slashed the state workforce by 13,000 workers — or about 11 percent — in his eight years in office, an accomplishment that has already been touted by Right to Rise, a pro-Bush super PAC. A video released by Bush’s campaign prior to his visit boasted of 13,000 “fewer bureaucrats” after the governor’s eight years in office.

Bush said he would call for a federal hiring freeze, as part of his efforts to slim “federal bureaucracy.”

“It is a fairly safe bet that not everyone who leaves needs to be replaced,” he said.

Bush also boasted of his heavy veto pen as governor, having vetoed over $2 billion in state spending, which earned him the nickname “Veto Corleone.”

He said the president has to act in the “national interest,” which requires the ability to line-item veto specific spending items, a power he enjoyed as governor of Florida.

Democrats who served during Bush’s administration decried his cuts.

“Most of those cuts had been employees that were in critical services,” said Democrat Dan Gelber, who served in the House from 2001 to 2008, in an interview before the speech. “Florida has always been austere. We did not have a lot of staff before the cuts.”

Though he racked up large numbers of vetoes, the size of the Florida’s overall budget did grow from roughly $50 billion during Bush’s first year in office to $71 billion when he left in 2007.

Bush said as president he would push for a balanced budget amendment, saying he had “balanced Florida’s budget” for eight consecutive years. (Florida politicians regularly tout a balanced budget on the stump, without mentioning that the state constitution requires a balanced budget.)

Bush also cited improvements to the state's child welfare system while he was in office, including changes spurred by the death of 4-year-old Rilya Wilson, was a foster child in the care of the Department of Children and Families.

She disappeared in 2000, but DCF did not notice she was missing until 2002. Her death prompted the "Rilya Wilson Act," a 2003 law that required children in state custody enrolled in an early learning program to attend that program five days per week. An unreported absence now prompts a DCF home visit.

"Working with the Florida legislature we stepped up our commitment to community-based care and made the system much more responsive," Bush said.

But Gelber, who served as the House's top Democrat just after Bush's tenure, said the deep cuts across state government had contributed to a dangerous lack of oversight at the agency. (A Miami Herald investigation in 2014 found that 477 children whose cases had some contact with the department had died since 2008, the year after Bush left office.)

"I don't know how anyone can point to hundreds, maybe thousands, dying without regretting not having that oversight," said Gelber.

Bush did not meet with reporters after the speech. Aides said they were "crunched for time," but would not elaborate on the candidate's schedule.

Jeb Bush Takes Aim at Revolving Door in Washington // Bloomberg // Michael Bender – July 20, 2015

U.S. lawmakers leaving Congress should be banned for six years from lobbying, tripling the current prohibition, and prevented from influencing government as consultants, said Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush.

In what his campaign billed as a major address about government reform, Bush also vowed to reduce the federal workforce by 10 percent over five years by hiring only one new employee for every three who leave. He said he supports a line item veto, giving the president the authority to cut spending, and a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution.

Lawmakers should have their pay docked for missing legislative days, Bush said, something his Senate rivals for the Republican nomination occasionally have been known to do.

"It will not be my intention to preside over the establishment, but in every way I know to disrupt that establishment and make it accountable to the people," said Bush, the son and brother of former presidents and the grandson of a former senator, adding that his record in Florida shows he can be a government reformer.

Bush's speech in Tallahassee, the Florida capital where he spent eight years as governor, is the first in a series of policy addresses from the presidential contender. Already a favorite of establishment Republicans, Bush is appealing to the party's grassroots small-government movement with tough talk on Washington.

Saying the federal system of acquiring military equipment is broken, Bush encouraged competition among defense contractors and called for a simplified chain of command in military's procurement process. A document provided the Bush campaign took aim at the F-22 Raptor, the Comanche Helicopter and the Zumwalt Destroyer, saying the federal government could increase efficiency by upgrading defense systems over time, instead of "waiting decades to launch a new ship or plan with every conceivable bell and whistle."

"The Pentagon's acquisition system is so swamped with regulations, only a handful of giant defense companies can compete for big contracts," Bush said, endorsing reforms from Senator John McCain and Representative Mac Thornberry, the Republican chairmen of the Armed Services committees in their respective chambers.

Targeting a lobbying industry that he said has spent $12.5 million per member of Congress at last count, Bush designed his six-year lobbying ban would ensure than senators serve at least one full term without being influenced by a former colleague. Current restrictions prevent senators from lobbying for two years, and House members for just one.

Miles Rapoport, president of Common Cause, a Washington-based group that advocates for tougher lobbying restrictions, praised Bush's proposals, saying a six-year ban would be "at the top end of what we would have wished or hoped for."

"It's a strong statement," Rapoport, a former Democratic Connecticut secretary of state. "It reflects the fact that voters are really turning into the idea that there are real problems in how Washington's campaign finance and lobbying industries are operating."

The Republican presidential candidate also proposed weekly, online disclosure of lobbyists' meetings with members of Congress, and an expansion of the definition of lobbying to capture the growing class of what has come to be known as "unlobbyists," which Bush defined as an "ambiguous class" of individuals who don't register to lobby but belong to "the cadre of 'government relations' and 'government affairs' specialists now populating the Capitol."

Lax regulations defining lobbyists have allowed many former congressional staffers and even former members of Congress to hire on with organizations that do lobbying but not register as lobbyists.

"We need to help politicians to rediscover life outside of Washington, which—who knows—might even be a pleasant surprise for them," Bush said.

Without naming names, Bush took a aim at some current members who already have been spending time outside Washington. Some of the former governor's top rivals for the Republican nomination are U.S. senators, including Marco Rubio of Florida and Ted Cruz of Texas, who have missed votes in recent months while campaigning and raising money.

"A bill to dock the pay of absentee members might not pass the House or Senate, but at least it would get them all there for a vote," Bush said. "If we can't always get them on the job, let's at least get them on the record."

Bush said his first reform would be the partial freeze on hiring for the federal government, whose civilian workforce includes about 2 million employees. His plan, which would make an exception for security and safety workers, would save the government "tens of billions of dollars" without adding to unemployment, Bush said. A document provided by the campaign showed that 31 percent of the federal workforce will be eligible for retirement by September 2017.

Bush also suggested that federal workers are collecting too much compensation without enough oversight, and said it should be easier to fire an "unproductive employee." Bush criticized the federal government for firing just 0.18 percent of its workforce for cause in 2013, but didn't suggest an appropriate alternative.

In a Swipe at Rivals, Jeb Bush Proposes to Dock Pay for Absentee Lawmakers // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush proposal Monday "to dock pay of absentee members" of Congress amounted to a crafty swipe at his Republican presidential rivals, most notably his "good friend," Senator Marco Rubio.

"Consider a pattern in Congress of members who sometimes seem to regard attendance and voting as optional, something to do as time permits," the former Florida governor said during a speech in Tallahassee taking aim at institutional Washington. "And if it's an incentive they need, how about the one that pretty much every worker in America has in their job? If you don't show up, you don't get paid for the time that you miss."

Not-so-coincidentally, some of the biggest truants in the current Congress include several of Bush's presidential rivals, whose White House bids have caused them to miss many votes this year. Topping it is none other than Bush's home-state ally turned rival: Rubio has recently faced criticism for being the most absentee member of the Senate. So far in the 114th Congress, the first-term Floridian has missed 72 out of 249 votes, an absentee rate of 29 percent, according to data compiled by Bloomberg Government.

Others aren't much better: Texas Senator Ted Cruz has missed 24 percent of votes so far this year; South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham has missed 23 percent of votes. Of the Senate presidential hopefuls, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul, stands out for having made 99.9 percent of the Senate roll call votes this year. He missed just three this year.

Balancing the demands of a presidential campaign with the Senate's often unpredictable schedule sometimes gets awkward: In April, Cruz gave an impassioned speech urging senators to reject the nomination of Loretta Lynch for U.S. attorney general, whom he warned had "embraced the lawlessness" of the Obama administration. By the time the Senate held a final vote on the nomination, he had skipped town, apparently for a fundraiser in Texas.

It's a convenient swipe for Bush, who hasn't held elected office since 2007 and, given his disclosed earnings, doesn't need a full-time job as he runs for president. While roll call votes provide an easy metric to measure lawmakers' performance, other officeholders, such as governors, aren't as vulnerable. But Bush's proposal also highlights a real problem: Members of Congress can skip votes whenever they want, without having to explain why, and the only accountability they face is reelection. For senators, that's just once every six years.

This year's crop of senators running for president aren't the first to rack up jarring absentee rates as they barnstorm the country courting votes and raising money. During the 2008 election cycle, Republican nominee John McCain missed 64 percent of votes; Democratic nominee Barack Obama missed 46 percent, according to GovTrack.us.

For now, Paul isn't the only one bucking the trend: Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, who's running for the Democratic presidential nomination, has missed just six votes this year, marking an attendance rate of 99.8 percent.

'Constitutional questions'

Though Bush's proposal could win him points with good-government advocates, members of Congress are about as likely to pass a bill cutting their own pay as they are to dance naked en masse in Statuary Hall. And there is another hurdle: the 27th Amendment to the Constitution. "No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened," it states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That means there's no way lawmakers can be prevented from receiving full pay during a given Congress. The last clause of the amendment, however, may leave room to enact a law tying pay to attendance, as long as it takes effect after the following election.

"Bush's play-to-pay law raises some important constitutional questions," said Adam Winkler, a constitutional law professor at UC Irvine School of Law. He said Article I, Section 6 gives Congress authority to establish compensation for members, although there are "questions of timing" due to the 27th Amendment. "No law changing the terms of compensation can go into immediate effect, but it could be delayed."

Asked about the constitutional barrier, a Bush campaign spokesperson said Congress seems to have the power to link pay to attendance, pointing to a passage in Article I, Section 5 of the Constitution that authorizes Congress to "compel the attendance of absent members" and "under such penalties as each House may provide."

Jeb Bush vows Washington culture shake-up // Reuters – July 20, 2015

U.S. Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush will vow on Monday to shake up Washington's culture if he reaches the White House, saying an "era of excuses" in the nation's capital must end.

Bush plans to say in a speech in Tallahassee, Florida, that he wants to reduce U.S. government debt, spark higher economic growth, cut spending and tackle other problems, such as the number of people on the federal payroll.

"It will not be my intention to preside over the establishment, but in every way I know to disrupt that establishment and make it accountable to the people," the former Florida governor said in excerpts released by his campaign.

Bush, whose father and brother both served as U.S. president, has been eager to avoid appearing as if he is a creature of Washington or part of a political dynasty.

He has pointed to his record in Florida to cast himself as a reformer and to separate himself from the pack of Republicans seeking the party's nomination for president in the November 2016 election.

On Monday, Bush will say Floridians called their capital "Mount Tallahassee," before he took over as governor, because its leaders held themselves apart from their constituents. He said the problems in Washington were similar and would be unacceptable if he were president.

Jeb Bush on John McCain: 'A real hero' // CNN // Ashley Killough – July 20, 2015

Bipartisan elected officials from the White House all the way to the wide open Republican primary field are using incendiary comments from Donald Trump to praise former prisoner-of-war Sen. John McCain.

Jeb Bush broke from his prepared remarks of a policy speech Monday to declare that McCain is a "real hero," as Donald Trump insists that he owes no apology to McCain for questioning the Arizona senator's military heroism.

Trump, who's experienced a bump in the polls since announcing his presidential bid last month, is known for his unfiltered rhetoric, but the comments made at an Iowa voter forum from over the weekend drew immediate and near universal rebuke from other elected officials and candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Making his pitch for reforming Washington, Bush said Monday in Tallahassee that he supports a proposal by McCain, who chairs the Senate Armed Services Committee, to change the defense procurement process.

When Bush mentioned McCain's name, he interjected to describe the former GOP presidential nominee as "a real hero, by the way." The audience, largely comprised of his former associates from his days as governor, broke out into huge applause.

Shortly after Bush's comments, White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest said that despite the difference between President Barack Obama and his former campaign rival McCain, "have not reduced (Obama's) appreciation for Sen. McCain's remarkable service to the country," adding Obama had "deep respect for Sen. McCain's heroism."

Responding for the first time himself, McCain said Monday morning that he didn't feel Trump owed him an apology, suggesting instead the billionaire real estate developer apologize to American veterans.

"... I think he may owe an apology to the families of those who have sacrificed in conflict and those who have undergone the prison experience in serving our country," McCain told MSNBC's "Morning Joe".

Bush was quick to defend McCain on Twitter on Saturday, when Trump stirred controversy by saying McCain wasn't a war hero because he was captured.

"Enough with the slanderous attacks. @SenJohnMcCain and all our veterans - particularly POWs have earned our respect and admiration," he tweeted.

And Bush was by no means the only 2016 candidate condemning Trump's comments. Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, as well as Republican Sens. Marco Rubio and Lindsey Graham condemned the remarks.

"It's not just absurd, it's offensive" Rubio said in an interview Sunday with CNN's Jake Tapper on "State of the Union." "It's ridiculous. And I do think it's a disqualifier as commander-in-chief."

Jeb Bush defends McCain, but supported Swift Boat attacks against Kerry // CNN // Jeremy Diamond – July 20, 2015

After Donald Trump questioned Republican Sen. John McCain's status as a war hero, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush quickly jumped to McCain's defense.

"Enough with the slanderous attacks. @SenJohnMcCain and all our veterans - particularly POWs have earned our respect and admiration," he tweeted on Saturday.

But that outrage was missing ten years ago, when a political group attacked another Vietnam veteran -- then-Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic nominee who sought to unseat Bush's brother, the incumbent president, during the 2004 election.

Instead, Bush praised Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, the group that lobbed attacks questioning Kerry's service record in Vietnam -- attacks McCain unequivocally criticized in 2004 as "dishonest and dishonorable."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When his campaign was asked if Jeb Bush saw a double standard, a spokesman rejected the premise.

"A thank you letter to Col. Bud Day, Medal of Honor recipient and Air Force Cross recipient, twice captured as a POW, is not in any way analogous to condemning Donald Trump's slanderous attack on John McCain," said Bush campaign spokesman Tim Miller.

In a letter to the head of that group obtained by CNN, Bush thanked Col. George Day for his "unwavering support" and thanked the group for "their willingness to stand up against John Kerry."

"As someone who truly understands the risk of standing up for something, I simply cannot express in words how much I value their willingness to stand up against John Kerry," Bush wrote in a letter dated January 19, 2005.

Of the group's members, Bush added: "Their efforts, like their service to their country, speak volumes about what matters most."

All of the charges were contradicted by official military records and almost all of the men who served with Kerry came out in defense of their former crewmate, praising his courage. Only one of the swift boat critics served with Kerry.

Kerry received several medals for his service in Vietnam, including several Purple Heart medals for injuries he sustained in combat.

The Swift Boat attacks have since been widely discredited and the term swiftboating is now synonymous with lobbing unfair political attacks.

Jeb Bush Wants Military Recruiters Armed...Overturning His Dad's Policy // HuffPo // John Tures – July 20, 2015

Presidential candidate Jeb Bush says he wants to overturn the ban on arming military recruiters, a response to the killing of five servicemen in Chattanooga, Tennessee. In doing so, he'll undo a policy enacted under his dad's administration, back in 1992.

In a campaign stop in Nevada, Bush said "it seems to me that if you have military bases or recruiting offices, these are symbols of American might, they're targets." He also called upon Congress to act to overturn the ban.

Ironically, Jeb Bush would be overturning a policy from his father's presidential administration, adopted when President George H. W. Bush was in the last year of his term in office.

Oliver Darcy with The Blaze, a site founded by conservative talk show host Glen Beck, reported that the having recruiting stations become "gun free zones" came from Department of Defense Directive 5210.56, signed by Donald J. Atwood, Deputy Defense Secretary under George H. W. Bush.

Fox News guest Chad Jenkins said:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Well, and look at the Fort Hood shootings. We had two shootings now that were mass casualty situations and now the recruiting station. Unfortunately, the executive order put in place by President Bill Clinton back in the nineties took away the rights for service members to carry, conceal, and to protect themselves here in the homeland."

The conservative "Patriot Post" makes a similar claim.

In researching all of President Bill Clinton's Executive Orders (you can look for yourself here) from 1993, none of them covered this issue.

I did find this military regulation, Army Regulation 190-14, signed in March of 1993. But all it does is implement the Bush Administration policy from 1992.

Army Chief of Staff Ray Odierno, who served as the military commander in charge of forces in Iraq during the George W. Bush Administration, said he'll review the policy, but noted that such a policy could cause more problems than it solves. Sure enough, in Gainesville, Georgia, a recruiter accidentally shot himself while on duty.

A lot of the debate after shootings at Ft. Hood (and the less documented shooting at an Arkansas military recruiting station) was about whether the act was terrorism or workplace violence, missing the point about whether the military should protect itself better against either event.

I'm inclined to agree with Republican candidates (others like Scott Walker and Donald Trump agree with Jeb Bush) and like Bobby Jindal's plan for providing armed guards for these stations. But I don't agree with attempts to blame the incident on Bill Clinton. Evidence shows the policy was developed before Clinton became president.

And Republicans who want to lift the gun ban should be prepared to explain it to a small group of constituents, the ones who have conspiracy theories about the military concerning exercises like "Jade Helm 15" and the belief that our military is about to put us all in Wal-Mart concentration camps.

Jeb Bush releases new web ad accusing Trump and Obama of divisiveness // CBS News – July 20, 2015

Jeb Bush's campaign released a new web ad during the height of the Trump dustup over the weekend, called "Come join us," and it goes after Donald Trump and Barack Obama for their "divisiveness."

The ad, a compilation of Bush moments on the campaign trail, says, "We need to focus on the things that tie us together, and whether it's Donald Trump or Barack Obama, their rhetoric of divisiveness is wrong."

Bush presents himself as a contrast, saying, "I campaign embracing diversity. Come join us - come join the team that is creating hope and opportunity."

And, he continues, "A Republican will never win by striking fear into people's hearts."

Bush has criticized Trump on the campaign trail, notably over Trump's remarks about Mexican immigrants, which he called "extraordinarily ugly." Trump, for his part, has claimed he doesn't see Bush as "a factor" in the race.

Jeb Bush Pledges to 'Challenge the Whole Culture' of D.C. // NBC News // Carrie Dann – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush pledged on Monday to stir up the "settled culture" of Washington D.C. by shrinking government, overhauling lobbying rules and granting the White House line-item veto power.

"The overspending, the overreaching, the arrogance, and the sheer incompetence in that city - these problems have been with us so long that they are sometimes accepted as facts of life. But a president should never accept them, and I will not. We need a president willing to challenge the whole culture in our nation's capital - and I mean to do it," he said in remarks in Tallahassee, Florida.

Bush, who served two terms as the governor of Florida, pointed to his experience in the state, saying that his record as a reformer makes him well equipped to cut government spending and waste in Washington.

"It will not be my intention to preside over the establishment, but in every way I know to disrupt that establishment and make it accountable to the people," he said.

He pledged to push Congress to submit a balanced budget amendment to the states, and he praised proposals to reform outdated government procurement protocols.

He also proposed a hiring freeze on federal workers and a six year ban on lobbying for former members of the House and Senate.

"We need to help politicians to rediscover life outside of Washington, which - who knows? - might even be a pleasant surprise for them," he joked.

Jeb Bush ahead of Marco Rubio among Cuban-Am erican GOP voters in Miami, poll finds // Fox News // Serafin Gomez – July 20, 2015

A new poll published Monday by the Miami Herald shows that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush leads fellow Florida Republican Sen. Marco Rubio among Cuban-Americans in Miami-Dade County — which both candidates call home.

Rubio, whose parents were born in Cuba, trails Bush 31 percent to 43 percent among GOP registered voters. The other Cuban-American presidential hopeful, Sen. Ted Cruz from Texas, only registered 7 percent in the county, according to the survey conducted by Bendixen & Amandi International.

Among all Miami-Dade GOP registered voters, Bush also led 35 to 25 percent over Rubio.

Miami-Dade is the most populous county of the Sunshine state.

Bush endeared himself to the Cuban-American community during his two terms, with a pro-business, anti-Castro rhetoric that resonated among Latino voters in Florida.

“In spite of the fact that Jeb enjoys honorary Cuban status, he does that much better than the person who would be the first potential Cuban-American president of the United States,” pollster Fernand Amandi told the Miami Herald.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It could be a very difficult number for Marco,” he added. “When he can’t win over the heart of his base, what does that mean for his prospects of winning the primary in Florida?”

Being fluent in Spanish may also help him in the Cuban-heavy county. In a separate article back in June, the Herald noted that the former governor is the only one of the three who speaks Spanish at home — and with a slight Cuban-American accent.

“He speaks Spanish better than some of us,” a young Cuban-American lawmaker named Marco Rubio said of Bush in 2002, the Herald said.

Bush has lived in Venezuela and Mexico, where he not only taught English as a second language but also met his wife, Columba.

The Bendixen survey polled 600 registered voters in English and Spanish between July 8-14. It has an error margin of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

'We'll all become conservatives': Jeb Bush pledges budget reform in Florida // The Guardian // Tom McCarthy – July 20, 2015

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush returned on Monday to the state capitol to accuse the federal government of broad incompetence and present himself as the person to fix it.

Touting his record as a steward of the Florida economy and scourge of do-nothing bureaucrats, Bush sought to create sparks in the damp caverns where people go to discuss deficit spending, federal procurements and civil service contracts.

The presidential candidate mixed in some politics. He railed against absenteeism in Congress, without mentioning by name the member with the worst attendance record, according to a February study – Florida senator Marco Rubio, Bush’s former ally and Republican presidential rival.

Bush also went out of his way to praise Senator John McCain – “a real hero, by the way” – after a weekend in which a remarkable amount of political oxygen was consumed by another White House pretender, Donald Trump, and his attack on McCain’s war record.

The bulk of Bush’s speech, however, was given to workmanlike promises to reshape the federal budget, founded on boasts, some of which have attracted robust skepticism, about his record in two terms as Florida governor.

Bush said, as he did last month in announcing his candidacy, that he would lead the country to 4% economic growth, pointing to Florida’s 4.4% growth and 1.3m jobs added during his tenure, from 1999–2007.

Much of Florida’s nominal success, however, was driven by the real estate speculation that made the state ground zero for the national housing bubble that burst just as Bush left office. In the next four years, the state shed 900,000 of those 1.3m jobs.

In his return to Tallahassee on Monday, Bush called for a balanced budget amendment, line-item veto power for the president, an overhaul of defense department procurements, a federal hiring freeze and an end to automatic "baseline" funding increases.

"It doesn't matter who's the cause of all this," Bush said. "It's time to reform all these things to make government smaller so that we can rise up again."

Looking past the numbers, Bush cast the promise of smaller government in terms of political enlightenment, with capital-R Republicanism as an end. "A self-governing society doesn't need the kind of government we have," he said. "By our very nature we'll all become conservatives, because demands on government will subside."

Jeb Bush Wants Every Single Lobbyist-Lawmaker Meeting Made Public // The Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – July 20, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush said Monday he would like to see a new law requiring lawmakers to disclose all meetings with lobbyists.

"We need to reform disclosure rules in Washington," Bush said in a speech Monday morning in Tallahassee. "Here is what I propose: every time a lobbyist meets with any member of Congress, that should be reported online – every week, and on the member's official website."

Bush said the "definition of the term 'lobbyist' should be expanded to address the cadre of 'government relations' and 'government affairs' specialists now populating the Capitol."

The Republican also said he wants a law that would increase the amount of time between lawmakers leaving the House and Senate and becoming lobbyists.

"I will use all of my influence to enact into law an immediate, unequivocal six-year ban on lobbying – a full Senate term – for ex-members of the House and Senate," he said.

As for the executive branch, Bush said, "We will take similar measures at the White House. I will strengthen existing prohibitions that prevent departing executive branch employees from lobbying members of my administration."

During his speech at Florida State University, Bush presented his plan for reducing the federal workforce by implementing a freeze on hiring.

"We will go by a simple three-out, one-in rule across the federal workforce, with exceptions for critical positions related to our security and safety," he said. "Only one new hire for every three who leave."

Added Bush: "This policy can, on its own, reduce the size of the federal bureaucracy by 10 percent within 5 years."

Jeb Bush Wants to Cut Automatic Raises for Federal Employees // National Journal // Eric Katz – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush on Monday outlined how he would overhaul the federal civil service if he is elected president, including a proposal to transform the pay-raise system for federal employees.

Speaking at Florida State University in Tallahassee, the former Florida governor said the practice of awarding the approximately 2.1 million federal employees an across-the-board pay raise each year should be done away with. Billed as a policy address to spell out his economic agenda, Bush detailed the importance of modernizing what he called an outdated federal personnel system.

Bush said the civil service, like much of federal government, operates problematically without anyone "stopping to ask why."

He added: "It's a system in the old ways, rule by inertia and unaccountable to the people. With more than 2 million people on the federal payroll, these programs and these problems carry a heavy cost, and a few serious reforms will go a long way."

The first reform of a Bush administration would be to institute a federal hiring freeze. Over the next five years, Bush said with a smile on his face, it is a "fairly safe bet" that not everyone who retires would need to be replaced. Therefore, he explained, his administration would fill just one out of every three vacancies created by departing federal workers. The plan echoes one lined out in the budgets of Wisconsin GOP Rep. Paul Ryan, which were twice approved by House Republicans.

Like the Ryan budget, Bush would make exceptions for national-security positions. He said the strategy would allow for a 10 percent reduction in the size of the federal workforce within five years. Coupled with other reforms, however, Bush said he would slash more than 10 percent of the workforce within his first term and save "tens of billions of dollars without adding to unemployment."

Bush called the personnel system a "relic of the 1970s" under the Carter administration, which "didn't have the taxpayers' interest foremost in mind."

"The whole idea of management is to reward good performance and make the best the standard," Bush said. "And that's not the system we have in Washington, D.C. right now."

The next significant reform would be to undo rewarding "longevity instead of performance." He said federal employees earn, on average, $1,500 more in annual salary than their private sector counterparts, and $16,000 more in benefits.

The private-federal pay gap has long been disputed, with conservative groups finding that feds earn more than their private-sector peers, federal-employee groups finding that nonpublic employees earn more, and the nonpartisan Government Accountability Office concluding that there was no clear way to make the determination.

Regardless of that debate, Bush said the pay system does not provide the proper incentives to "bring out the best" in public servants or to improve the morale of the federal workforce.

"Just like in the real world, compensation should depend on the type of work, and the quality of the work," Bush said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To fix that issue, Congress and the White House should no longer approve across-the-board pay raises, he said. Instead, Bush said the government should move to a merit-based pay system. Bush's brother, former President George W. Bush, oversaw moving the Senior Executive Service to a pay-for-performance system.

"If we respect and recognize skill and dedication when we see them," Bush said, "then I promise you we'll see a lot more excellence in the ranks of civil service and we'll attract new talent as well."

Additionally, Bush proposed giving bonuses to managers who identify ways to cut spending at their agencies, similar to a proposal put forward by another 2016 Republican presidential contender—Sen. Rand Paul—earlier this year.

"When federal employees are found squandering money, we should call them out on it," Bush said. "And when they find ways to save money, we should reward them." Bush noted that as governor, he instituted the Davis productivity awards. Employees that find ways to "shrink government" deserve bonuses, he said.

The third tenant of Bush's civil-service reforms, which he called "long overdue," would make it easier to fire federal workers. Bush did not lay out specifics of which civil-service laws he would attempt to change, but did promise to maintain "civil rights and whistleblower protections." Otherwise, he said, the time it takes to "remove an unproductive employee should be weeks, rather than years."

"There are a lot of exemplary employees in the federal workforce, but they're treated no better than the bad ones," Bush said. "And the bad ones are nearly impossible to effectively discipline or remove." He added that "job security is one thing; job entitlement is another." Every removal of a federal employee should not be a "federal case," Bush said.

The son and brother of former presidents hailed his ability to transform the personnel system in Florida during his eight years as governor.

In his first term, Bush introduced his "Service First" reforms to remake much of the state's workforce. Bush successfully stripped Florida's 16,000 career managers and supervisors of due-process protections by turning them into at-will employees. Bush also changed the policy for "cause" from a specific list of fireable items to the much broader "sound discretion of an agency head." He coupled those policies with a directive to all state agencies requiring them to issue blueprints for reducing their workforces by 25 percent.

Florida already ranked 50th among states in spending on government salaries per citizen, but Bush successfully trimmed the number of state employees by 25 percent within five years.

Bush placed his federal civil-service reforms in the broader context of cutting agency spending and reducing the size of government.

"We're going to turn off the automatic switch of discretionary-spending increases and weigh budgets only on its merits," Bush said. "Too much of federal government runs on automatic."

Jeb Bush unveils his plan for 'disrupting' America's government // Business Insider // Maxwell Tani – July 20, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) on Monday laid out his plan for how he'll overhaul federal-government spending if he's elected president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a speech on Monday in Florida, the Republican presidential candidate unveiled his plan for "disrupting" Washington by downsizing the federal government.

Bush's plan takes aim at the federal budget. He proposes cutting the number of federal employees by at least 10% and radically overhauling the budget process to require a balanced budget, a controversial prescription popular with the conservative base.

"It will not be my intention to preside over the establishment, but in every way I know to disrupt that establishment and make it accountable to the people," Bush said.

Bush is calling his reform effort "Mount Washington," a reference to "Mount Tallahassee," the disparaging nickname given to Florida's state government for being far removed and inaccessible to the people.

Here are the reforms that Bush outlined in his speech:

Balanced budget amendment. Bush says that he will push for a constitutional amendment that would require the federal government to balance its budget every year. The idea has been gaining steam in conservative circles for some time, though it seems difficult to achieve considering opposition in blue states.

Line-item veto. Bush supports a line-item veto like the one sponsored by Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wisconsin). According to The Washington Post, Ryan's 2012 line-item veto bill proposed granting the president the ability to send budget items that he or she dislikes back to Congress for an amendment-free up or down vote. Proponents believe that this will allow the president to cut wasteful spending, while critics note that Ryan's plan reduces the deficit, instead of allowing the money saved to go back into the pot. President Bill Clinton briefly enjoyed a line-item budget veto, but it was ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

Federal employee hiring freeze. Bush says that he will institute a policy of hiring one employee for every three who leave when it comes to federal hiring, with the exception of national-security related jobs. Bush suggested that federal agencies shouldn't replace many workers who retire — according to the governor, 10% of the federal workforce will retire within the next five years, and "not everyone who leaves has to be replaced."

Merit pay. Bush claims too many mediocre federal employees are being paid the same as exemplary employees. Though he didn't delve too far into specifics on this point, the former Florida governor said that he'll make it easier to fire bad federal employees.

Dock congressional pay. Bush suggests that members of Congress who don't show up for votes or committee hearings should have their pay docked. This could be seen as a slight dig at some of his primary rivals — Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Florida) has missed more votes than any other senator. Many members have to juggle intense fundraising schedules in addition to their official congressional duties. The Huffington Post reported in 2013 that Democratic freshmen members were advised to spend four hours a day fundraising.

Budget procurement reform. Bush says that he supports a procurement reform plan by Sen. John McCain (R-Arizona). It would reduce the Secretary of Defense's power to dictate military acquisitions, and would change defense contracts to reduce incentives for contractors to not meet deadlines, which results in cost overruns.

Get rid of "baseline budgeting." Bush would no longer measure spending cuts based on last year's budget.

RUBIO

Rubio: We're in 'the most dangerous phase of the Obama presidency' // The Hill // Jordain Carney – July 20, 2015

Presidential hopeful Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) slammed President Obama for allowing the United Nations Security Council to vote on the Iran nuclear agreement.

“President Obama’s nuclear deal with Iran is a dangerous and destabilizing failure, and it is telling that he is seeking Russia and China’s seal of approval of his deal before administration officials have even briefed Congress," Rubio said in a statement. "The stakes are too far high for America’s security to be outsourced to the United Nations."

Rubio's comments came after the U.N. Security Council unanimously endorsed the deal in a 15-0 vote.

The Iran vote at the U.N. also took place on the same day that the United States and Cuba reopened their embassies as part of the restoration of diplomatic ties.

Rubio, a vocal critical of the president's Cuba policy, linked the two events, suggesting that July 20, 2015, will be remembered as "Obama's capitulation Monday."

"Monday’s events at the U.N., Washington and Havana leave no doubt that we have entered the most dangerous phase of the Obama presidency in which the president is flat-out abandoning America’s vital national security interests to cozy up to the world’s most reprehensible regimes," he added.

“July 20 will be a powerfully symbolic day for the Obama-Clinton foreign policy legacy, which will be remembered as a dark time in American history when the mullahs in Iran and the thugs in Havana celebrated at America’s expense.”

The Florida senator is part of a growing number of Republicans, as well as key Democrats, who pressed the administration to block action at the U.N. until after Congress had 60 days to review the Iran agreement.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), another 2016 presidential candidate, said allowing the U.N. to vote before Congress "is an affront to the American people and further evidence of a weak president trying to sell a bad deal."

The State Department handed over the final parts of the Iran deal to Congress over the weekend, which means the review period officially started Monday.

The pushback over the U.N. Security Council vote is threatening to complicate the administration's sales pitch to Congress, where Republicans have largely disavowed the deal and many Democrats remain skeptical.

Marco Rubio’s Close Relationship With For-Profit Corinthian Colleges // Think Progress // Casey Quinlan – July 20, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL), who is running for president in 2016, has a strong record of supporting for-profit colleges, namely Corinthian Colleges, which shut down all of its remaining campuses in April. Rubio has accepted contributions to the tune of $27,600 throughout the past five years. The last donation filed with the Federal Election Commission was for $2,700 on April 30, Bloomberg reported.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last year, Rubio also sent a letter requesting that the U.S. Department of Education would exercise "leniency" on Corinthian Colleges by not halting federal aid while it was being investigated. The letter was obtained by Bloomberg Politics and reads, in part:

While I commend the Department's desire to protect our nation's students from fraudulent and malicious activity by any institution of higher education, regardless of tax status, I believe the Department can and should demonstrate leniency as long as Corinthian Colleges, Inc. continues to expeditiously and earnestly cooperate by providing the documents requested.

The U.S. Department of Education stated it would fine Corinthian Colleges for misleading students before the campus shutdowns, citing problems such as falsifying post-graduation data. A 2012 Senate report accounted for several trends in the for-profit college industry, such as poor graduation rates, high tuition, even though students with modest financial resources are targeted, and that they often fail to provide adequate student support services.

Rubio has supported the idea of for-profit colleges in general, not only Corinthian Colleges. In a speech this month in Chicago, he said the rules for colleges' accreditation needed to be loosened for "innovative, low-cost competitors" to succeed. That reference to low-cost competitors is likely shorthand for for-profit colleges. Rubio worked with Sen. Michael Bennet (D-CO) on a budget amendment earlier this year that would create an alternative accreditation process. However, some would argue that the process of accreditation is already too loose, as the accreditation agencies are paid by the very institutions they oversee through fees.

Rubio is not the only Republican presidential candidate to support for-profit colleges. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker are among those who have spoken in support of or have received money from for-profit colleges.

WALKER

Scott Walker: We might have to take military action on Day One // WaPo // Greg Sargent – July 20, 2015

A dispute has erupted between Scott Walker and Jeb Bush over how to handle the task of undoing Obama's Iran deal as president, with Bush hinting that Walker is approaching the issue with a lack of maturity, and Walker suggesting that Bush is not zealous enough about confronting the enemy.

Walker is also saying that it's "very possible" the next president will have to take military action on Day One of his presidency — though it's unclear whether he means against Iran in particular, or more generally.

The argument says a lot about the two candidates' differing calculations with regard to the level of nuance GOP primary voters are prepared to entertain about the Iran deal, and more broadly, about foreign policy in general.

But I think the dispute also underscores the point made by David Axelrod last week: That for all the professed GOP confidence about the domestic politics of the agreement, it could prove to be more of a political problem for the GOP presidential candidates than for Hillary Clinton.

The Weekly Standard reports that Bush said this to a voter in Nevada:

"One thing that I won't do is just say, as a candidate, 'I'm going to tear up the agreement on the first day.' That's great, that sounds great but maybe you ought to check in with your allies first, maybe you ought to appoint a secretary of state, maybe secretary of defense, you might want to have your team in place, before you take an act like that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That was a shot at Walker, who has said he would undo an Iran deal on Day One of his presidency, regardless of what our allies have to say about it. Bush subsequently stood by his remarks, noting that on Day One, he would not yet have had the intelligence briefings required to make an informed decision. Bush added: “If you’re running for president, you know, I think it’s important to be mature and thoughtful about this.”

The Weekly Standard report continues thusly:

At a press conference after his appearance at the Family Leader Summit here Saturday, Walker was asked if he thinks Bush is wrong. “He may have his opinion. I believe that a president shouldn’t wait to act until they put a cabinet together or an extended period of time,” Walker said.

“I believe they should be prepared to act on the very first day they take office. It’s very possible – God forbid, but it’s very possible – that the next president could be called to take aggressive actions, including military action, on the first day in office. And I don’t want a president who is not prepared to act on day one. So, as far as me, as far as my position, I’m going to be prepared to be president on day one.”

In a subsequent statement to the Standard, Bush clarified that he thinks the Iran deal is “terrible” and called on Congress to “reject it,” and added:

“Should it be upheld, as President I would begin immediately to responsibly get us out of this deal, with a comprehensive strategy that is responsive to the conditions at the time and confronts Iran’s continued pursuit of a nuclear weapons capability, its support for terrorism and instability, its ballistic missile proliferation, and its horrific human rights record.”

The basic difference here appears to be that Walker believes the next president should start the process of undoing the deal on Day One, while Bush is stopping just short of that and hinting that he would go about this more “responsibly,” and with more solicitude towards changing international conditions. Bush apparently believes he can win the GOP primary while offering a (somewhat) more nuanced and “mature” (his word) approach than Walker. The Wisconsin Governor is apparently trying to appeal to GOP primary voters by portraying Bush’s comments as a sign he’d be more resolved towards Iran (and towards undoing Obama’s deal), and more “prepared” as president.

Obviously, if Congress fails to block the deal, and things go wrong, that could rebound badly on Hillary Clinton, who has already signaled she’ll embrace it. But the dispute between Bush and Walker raises another possibility: That the eventual GOP nominee’s position on the Iran deal could prove a lot harder to explain than Republicans think.

Jeb’s suggestion that he will approach the situation based on the conditions of the moment (that’s crazy talk!!!) suggests an awareness of something that Walker may or may not share: Undoing the deal in 2017 could have all sorts of unpleasant consequences that haven’t been sufficiently gamed out yet. As one expert put it recently, it could undermine our relationships with allies in ways that could have “a lot of ripple effects around wherever the U.S. and Europe have security cooperation.”

What’s more, vowing to undo the agreement would put pressure on the GOP nominee to articulate his alternative. As Axelrod argues, if Democrats can successfully make the case that the only alternative to the Iran deal is likely to be war, then supporting the agreement may well end up being the majority position in this country. (A new Washington Post/ABC News poll finds that 56 percent of Americans support the deal, though a large majority is skeptical that it will work, suggesting Americans want to give it a try even if success is far from assured.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obviously the eventual GOP nominee may not think the consequences that could flow from undoing the deal are all that worrisome, or he may believe that the agreement is so awful that risking those consequences is worth it. But that might prove a tough position to explain, and general election voters might not find it all that persuasive.

UPDATE: A Walker adviser sends over a full transcript of his remarks. It's not entirely clear whether Walker is referring to the possibility of military action on day one against Iran in particular, or more generally. So I've edited the above, just in case he meant the latter.

Still, whatever he meant, the broader point is the same: This dispute between Walker and Bush, over how aggressively to go about undoing the Iran deal, shows that it could create political problems for the GOP nominee, and not necessarily for Hillary Clinton. Here's the transcript:

Walker: "[...] I believe that this deal with Iran is so bad not just because of its implications regarding Iran's illicit nuclear infrastructure, but because we have the premier state sponsor of terrorism now being empowered in that region and by lifting sanctions using economic capacity, as well as the president in terms of his credibility in the world – I think that it's a bad enough deal that it needs to be terminated right off the bat and I will work with the congress not only to reinstate the already previously authorized sanctions but to work with them to put in place even more crippling sanctions and to convince our allies to do the same. To me I just think it's a different opinion, and he may have his opinion.

"I believe that a president shouldn't wait to act until they put a cabinet together or for a certain period of time. I believe that they should be prepared to act on the very first day they take office. It's very possible, God forbid that this would happen, but it's very possible that the next president could be called on to take aggressive actions, including military actions, on their very first day in office, and I don't want a president who is not prepared to act on day one. So as far as me, as far as my position, I'm going to be prepared to be president on day one."

Scott Walker, Confronted by Immigrant in Iowa, Blames Obama for Family's Uncertainty // WSJ // Reid Epstein – July 20, 2015

Some politicians get energized when challenged by protesters. Scott Walker appears calm.

While union protesters are a regular presence outside the Wisconsin governor's 2016 presidential campaign stops, Sunday afternoon marked a rare occasion of his being directly challenged by someone inside of one of his events.

Here, in a no-stoplight town of 450 where Mr. Walker lived as a boy, he'd just concluded an abbreviated version of his stump speech when a 13-year-old girl from Waukesha, Wis., approached him. Mr. Walker put his arm around her shoulder and posed for a photograph. The girl, Leslie Flores, then asked, "Governor Walker, why are you trying to break my family apart?"

What Donald Trump Has Said -- About McCain, Obama, Immigrants, His Hair

Mr. Walker didn't flinch. Within seconds he mentioned he didn't have time for a discussion and turned to walk toward a Fox News crew waiting to record a live interview.

Mr. Walker described his style as a regional affect during a stop earlier in the day in Cedar Falls.

"In the Midwest we just take care of problems. We don't make a lot of fuss, we just go out and get the job done and we go back to work," he said. "Sometimes I think people don't understand that. That's why we didn't lash out [during the 2011 protests against his legislation to strip public-sector unions of collective-bargaining rights]. We just got the job done and moved forward."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, the Flores family – Leslie was with her father, José, an undocumented immigrant who works as a painter, and 7-year-old brother Luis – told the dozen or so reporters traveling with the Walker campaign their plight. José Flores, 38 years old, came to the U.S. illegally from Mexico 19 years ago. He said he is eligible for President Barack Obama's deferred action program for parents of U.S. citizens. (A federal court has ruled the Mr. Obama doesn't have the authority to implement the program.) Organizers from Voces de la Frontera, the Wisconsin immigrants' rights organization that brought the Flores family here, recorded the exchanges on their smartphones.

"My family is at risk of being separated by being deported," Leslie Flores told the reporters

The immigration issue is a delicate one for Mr. Walker, especially in Iowa where would-be 2016 Republican caucus-goers are steadfastly opposed to Mr. Obama's executive actions on immigration and any path to citizenship for the undocumented. For a decade until earlier this year, Mr. Walker was in favor of a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants in the U.S. In 2013, when the Senate was weighing an overhaul to the nation's immigration laws, Mr. Walker said increasing border security was unnecessary.

Once he began building a profile as a presidential candidate, Mr. Walker offered a different view. Now, as part of his regular stump speech, he says he is opposed to a path to citizenship (though he has offered a slightly different view in some private conversations), decries "amnesty" and pledges to secure the border. At his direction, Wisconsin joined 25 other states in a lawsuit to block Mr. Obama's DAPA (Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents) program, for which Mr. Flores said he qualifies.

After his Fox News interview and a tour of the Dietz family farm – Janice Dietz was his childhood babysitter – that included a photo-op with a line of a half-dozen cows, Mr. Walker returned to the Flores family. Leslie had tears welling in her left eye and streaming down her cheek. Both sides were prepared for the second confrontation, and Mr. Walker didn't miss the opportunity to blame Mr. Obama for the family's uncertainty.

"The president had years to deal with this throughout the legitimate legislative process. He even had his own party in charge for the first two years," Mr. Walker told Mr. Flores in a calm, emotionless tone that embodied a father gently scolding his children. "I'm not blocking anything. The president has made this issue. I sympathize with it. But I want to make sure that going forward we follow the law in a way that is responsible."

The answer wasn't satisfactory to Mr. Flores, but it made a ready-made soundbite for Iowa's Republican electorate. Mr. Flores asked if he would be deported should Mr. Walker be in charge of fixing the immigration system.

Young Luis asked Mr. Walker: "Do you want me to come home from school and my dad got deported?"

Mr. Walker said that's not his plan. "That's not what I'm talking about," he said. "My point is that, in America, no one person is above the law. The president can't make the law just because he says it."

One of the camera-wielding activists traveling with the Flores family asked Mr. Walker if he would deport undocumented immigrants before new immigration laws could be enacted. Mr. Walker said he wouldn't. With that, the governor ended the conversation and walked into the crowd of awaiting townsfolk.

GOP presidential hopeful Scott Walker signs abortion ban bill // AP – July 20, 2015

Republican Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, one week after launching his bid for the 2016 presidential nomination, signed a bill Monday that outlaws non-emergency abortions at or beyond 20 weeks of pregnancy.

Abortion is a core issue for the conservative Republican base whose support Walker will seek as he tries to stand out in a crowded presidential field that also includes former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and billionaire Donald Trump.

While Walker has a long history of opposing abortions, it's an issue where he could be targeted by rivals: Just nine months ago he ran a television ad during his gubernatorial re-election campaign where he said whether to obtain an abortion is an agonizing decision between a woman and her doctor.

Walker's record includes defunding Planned Parenthood, requiring abortion doctors to have admitting privileges at nearby hospitals, a law currently blocked by a federal court judge, and requiring women to have ultrasounds and be shown images of the fetus before having an abortion.

Walker last year, during his re-election campaign, refused to say last year whether he would support a 20-week abortion ban.

But in the face of questions from anti-abortion conservatives over his commitment to the issue in the light of the campaign ad,Walker in March came out in support of the 20-week abortion ban.

"The truth is that Scott Walker lied to Wisconsin voters when he was elected governor after saying that abortion is between a woman and her doctor," said Sasha Bruce with NARAL Pro-Choice America, a leading abortion rights advocacy group. "Now, in an effort to win the votes of the extreme base of the Republican Party, Walker has traded the health and well-being of women and families to score cheap political points."

The governor's signature makes Wisconsin the 15th state to pass similar bans. There is no exception for pregnancies resulting from rape or incest.

The new law — which cleared the Legislature without any Democratic support — is expected to be challenged in court. Walker, speaking with reporters after the bill signing, said he was confident it would survive any legal challenge, calling the five-month ban a "reasonable standard."

"For people, regardless of where they might stand, when an unborn child can feel pain I think most people feel it's appropriate to protect that child," Walker said.

But Kaylie Hanson, speaking for the Democratic National Committee, said the new law was nothing more than a "timely favor" for the Republican base days after Walker joined the presidential race.

"The harsh reality is that this law will hurt women, as it puts up barriers to care for rape and incest survivors - no exceptions - and threatens the health of the mother," Hanson said in a statement. "This law doesn't only undermine the most basic women's health services. It's radical, dangerous, and lacks respect for half the population of Wisconsin."

Bans on abortion after 20 weeks are popular, at least on the surface. A Quinnipiac University poll conducted in November of 2014 found that 6 in 10 Americans support banning abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy, except in cases of rape or incest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the other hand, a 2012 CNN/ORC poll found the vast majority of Americans — more than 8 in 10 — said abortion should be legal in cases of rape or incest.

An Associated Press-GfK poll conducted in January and February found that 51 percent of Americans think abortion should be legal in all or most cases, while 45 percent think it should be illegal in most or all cases.

Under the new Wisconsin law, doctors who perform an abortion at or after 20 weeks in non-emergency situations could be charged with a felony punishable by up to $10,000 in fines and 3½ years in prison. Doctors could also be sued for damages.

Doctors would be allowed to perform abortions beyond 20 weeks only if the mother is likely to die or suffer irreversible injuries within 24 hours.

The law's supporters say fetuses can feel pain after 20 weeks. They say the ban will spare those unborn children an excruciatingly painful death. The American Congress of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, however, says fetuses can't feel pain until the third trimester starts at 27 weeks. Minority Democrats have complained that Republicans should leave women alone and let them decide how to handle their own bodies.

Abortions after 20 weeks are rare in Wisconsin. According to the most recent state Department of Health Services information, 89 of nearly 6,500 abortions performed in Wisconsin in 2013, or roughly 1 percent, occurred after the 20-week mark.

The U.S. Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade decision established a nationwide right to abortion but allowed states to restrict the procedures after the fetus reaches viability, the point where it could survive outside the womb. The ruling offered no legal definition of viability but said it could range from the 24th to 28th week of pregnancy.

Courts have blocked bans in Georgia, Idaho and Arizona. Litigation in other states is ongoing. A federal appellate court in May struck down Arkansas' ban on abortions after the 12th week of pregnancy if a doctor can detect a fetal heartbeat, finding that prohibition unconstitutionally burdens women.

Scott Walker signs Wisconsin abortion bill // Politico // Eliza Collins – July 20, 2015

Abortion after 20 weeks is now illegal in Wisconsin — with no exceptions for rape or incest.

On Monday, Gov. Scott Walker signed a bill that bans all non-emergency abortion after 20 weeks.

The legislation makes performing an abortion a felony punishable by up to three and a half years in prison and $10,000 in fines.

The only way abortions after 20 weeks are allowed is if the mother is likely to die or be severely injured.

Anti-abortion activists have coalesced around 20 weeks because, they say, that’s when fetuses begin to feel pain. The American Congress of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, however, says that pain doesn’t occur until 27 weeks.

Walker is running for the Republican nomination for president and is leading in some polls.

Wisconsin legislators approved the abortion measure earlier this month, just days before Walker officially announced his bid for the White House.

GOP lawmakers said that the ban had nothing to do with the governor's ambitions, but the bill benefited from a few legislative shortcuts, including an expedited hearing process and an "extraordinary" July session, to land on his desk at a convenient political time for Walker.

The legislation comes less than a year after Walker, who was stuck in a tight reelection campaign, released an ad that called a woman's decision to terminate a pregnancy "agonizing," saying he supported legislation that would make the decision between a woman and her doctor.

"I said I'm pro-life but I can only imagine how difficult a decision must be for someone who's thinking about ending their pregnancy. That's why I support a law that provides more information to someone to make that decision," Walker said in the ad. "The law still leaves the decision to the woman and her doctor. As for me, I want to look out for the health and safety of all citizens in my state."

On Monday, Walker tweeted: "Just signed pain capable bill into law to protect unborn at 5 months when they can feel pain.- SW #Walker16"

Poll: Walker leads in Iowa, followed by Trump // Politico // Nick Gass – July 20, 0215

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker is still out in front of all Republican contenders in a new Monmouth University poll out Monday surveying likely Iowa GOP caucus-goers.

But in second place is Donald Trump, whose remarks on Arizona Sen. John McCain's military service do not appear to have had a material effect on his standing in the Hawkeye State, or at least not yet. In fact, a plurality of those surveyed (47 percent) said they have a favorable view of the multibillionaire candidate, while 35 percent said they do not.

Walker grabbed 22 percent, compared to Trump's 13 percent. Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson received 8 percent, with former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz with 7 percent each. Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who won the 2008 caucus, follows with 6 percent, with Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul at 5 percent, and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal at 4 percent.

Former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, who won the 2012 caucuses, grabbed 3 percent, as did former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and retired Hewlett-Packard executive Carly Fiorina.

It should be noted that polling for this survey began last Thursday, two days before Trump's statement that McCain "was a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

Trump stood by and intensified his remarks against the senator over the weekend and on Monday.

The poll was conducted July 16-19 via landlines and cellphones, surveying 452 likely Republican caucus-goers. The overall margin of error is plus or minus 4.6 percentage points.

Scott Walker Steps Down as Head of Wisconsin's Job-Creation Agency // Bloomberg // Tim Jones – July 20, 2015

Saying his presence had become a distraction, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker stepped down as chairman of an embattled commission charged with job creation.

Walker, a Republican who announced his candidacy for the White House on July 13, signed a budget provision Monday removing himself as head of the Wisconsin Economic Development Corp., a panel he created after taking office in 2011.

The agency came under attack after a May report from Wisconsin's Legislative Audit Bureau showing the authority failed to follow the law and its own policies in awarding taxpayer-funded incentives. Walker began distancing himself from the operation before his presidential announcement.

"I thought it was important to put the focus on the job creators," Walker said in Oshkosh on Monday, according to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel.

WEDC is a quasi-public authority that Walker created to replace the state's Department of Commerce. He promoted it as a more efficient means to create jobs. Documents made public in June showed more than two dozen awards valued at more than $124 million were made to two companies without a formal staff review.

Wisconsin Democrats quickly pounced on Walker's exit.

"Rather than digging in and solving the problems with his jobs agency, Governor Walker is choosing to escape the bad headlines and instead campaign for president," said House Minority Leader Peter Barca in a statement released from his office.

Walker campaigned in 2010 on a promise to created 250,000 private-sector jobs during his first term. About half of that amount was created during his first four years in office. He was re-elected last November, defeating Democrat Mary Burke, 52 percent to 47 percent.

Scott Walker Signs 20-Week Abortion Ban Into Law // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – July 20, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) signed a bill into law on Monday that bans abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy unless the mother's life is in danger. The legislation, which passed the GOP-controlled state legislature earlier this month, makes no exceptions for severe fetal anomalies or for victims of rape and incest.

Walker, a 2016 presidential candidate, said he supports the legislation because fetuses can feel pain at 20 weeks -- an assertion that has been disputed by the mainstream medical community.

"At five months, that's the time when that unborn child can feel pain," Walker said Monday. "When an unborn child can feel pain, we should be protecting that child."

Abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy are very rare, making up less than 1 percent of all abortions. Often, women who seek abortion care after that point have discovered a severe fetal anomaly that could not be detected earlier on in the pregnancy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several major medical groups in Wisconsin oppose the 20-week abortion ban, including the Wisconsin chapter of the American Congress of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, the Wisconsin Medical Society, the Wisconsin Academy of Family Physicians and the Wisconsin chapter of the American Academy of Pediatrics. A group of 100 gynecologists in the state wrote a letter to Walker and members of the state legislature earlier this month urging them to oppose the bill because they say it "tie[s] the hands of doctors seeking to help women."

"This is bad medicine, based on the thoroughly debunked fallacy that a 20-week fetus – which is not viable – can feel pain," the doctors wrote. "SB 179/AB 237 would block Wisconsin ob-gyns from being able to treat our patients in a medically appropriate and humane manner. These bills would undoubtedly place us in the unconscionable position of having to watch our patients and their loved ones undergo additional emotional trauma, illness and suffering during what is already a difficult time."

U.S. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) vowed to bring a federal version of the 20-week abortion ban to a vote this year, and nearly every GOP presidential candidate has endorsed it.

Anti-abortion activists hope the federal 20-week ban, which has been enacted in 11 states and passed the U.S. House of Representatives this year, will be a vehicle through which to challenge Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion. The court ruled in Roe that women have a constitutional right to an abortion up until the point that the fetus would be viable outside the womb, which does not occur until around 22 to 24 weeks of gestation.

Walker And Bush Clash Over When To Go After Iran -- Day One Or Two // HuffPo // Igor Bobic – July 20, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) said over the weekend that the next president of the United States needed to be prepared to take aggressive military action on their very first day in office, including against Iran.

The presidential contender, who had promised to "terminate" the nuclear agreement with Iran upon his inauguration, made the remark while speaking with reporters at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames, Iowa, on Saturday. Walker was asked about a criticism from former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), who asserted during a town hall last week that unwinding the agreement on day one was an unrealistic promise.

“One thing that I won’t do is just say, as a candidate, ‘I’m going to tear up the agreement on the first day,’” Bush said in Nevada on Thursday. First, said Bush, he needs to have his team in place. "That’s great, that sounds great but maybe you ought to check in with your allies first, maybe you ought to appoint a secretary of state, maybe secretary of defense, you might want to have your team in place, before you take an act like that.”

Asked about Bush's remarks on Saturday, Walker argued -- without mentioning Iran directly -- that a president ought to be ready to take action from the moment they step foot into the Oval Office.

"He may have his opinion. I believe that a president shouldn't wait to act until they put a cabinet together or an extended period of time, I believe they should be prepared to act on the very first day they take office," he said. "It's very possible, God forbid that this would happen, but very possible, that the next president could be called to take aggressive actions, including military actions, on their very first day in office."

After Walker aides accused Bush of softening on his opposition to the agreement, the former Florida governor issued a statement to The Weekly Standard assuring that he “would begin immediately to responsibly get us out of this deal.”

The dispute between the two early GOP frontrunners comes just weeks before the first debate, hosted by Fox News in August. It also follows Walker's efforts to bone up on foreign policy, positioning himself as one of the most hawkish candidates in the 2016 Republican presidential field. Addressing conservatives at the Family Leadership Summit on Saturday, Walker said the U.S. needed "a foreign policy that puts steel in the face of our enemies," and one that unapologetically asserted power across the globe.

Scott Walker signs 20-week abortion ban // MSNBC // Irin Carmon – July 20, 2015

Just in time for his nascent presidential campaign, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker signed a bill Monday banning abortion at 20 weeks — without an exception for rape and incest and with only a narrow emergency exception. In doing so, he reasserts his anti-abortion bonafides after a midterm election where he soft-pedaled his position on the issue, irritating a key portion of the Republican base.

“At five months, that’s the time when that unborn child can feel pain,” Walker said. “When an unborn child can feel pain, we should be protecting that child.”

But Walker’s assertions are disputed by the medical evidence, which has overwhelmingly found that pain receptions come weeks later in gestation. “This is bad medicine, based on the thoroughly debunked fallacy that a 20-week fetus — which is not viable — can feel pain,” wrote 99 physicians, all members of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, in a letter. They said the law “would block Wisconsin ob-gyns from being able to treat our patients in a medically appropriate and humane manner.”

About 1% of abortions take place after the 20-week mark, which also happens to be around the time that many fetal anomalies, some of which are incompatible with life, are detected. Such bans have proliferated in states thanks to a nationwide anti-abortion strategy to undermine the Supreme Court’s repeated holding that women have the right to terminate a pregnancy until the fetus is viable, about four to six weeks after the 20 week mark. In most of the states where these bans have become law, supporters of abortion rights have declined to challenge them, reluctant to test the Supreme Court on this slice of the issue.

The exceptions are Idaho and Arizona, two states with 20-week bans that fell when the more liberal 9th Circuit Court of Appeals found them to be unconstitutional. Wisconsin, which is covered by the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals, previously struck down on a preliminary basis another Walker anti-abortion law requiring hospital admitting privileges for abortion providers. That law threatened to shut down some of the state’s abortion providers.

It was that law, as well as a forced-ultrasound law, that Walker alluded to in a now-infamous television commercial during his 2014 re-election fight. Accused of being anti-woman, Walker described the two laws as “legislation to increase safety and to provide more information for a woman considering her options,” respectively. But, he said, mimicking pro-choice rhetoric, “The bill leaves the final decision to a woman and her doctor.”

That irked his supporters. Penny Nance, president of Concerned Women for America, told Politico, “I didn’t like the ad. You’re using the other side’s garbage and it’s not helpful.”

Seemingly to placate his base, Walker asked for the 20-week ban bill to contain no exceptions for rape and incest, which many opponents of abortion consider unacceptable compromises. He got his wish with unusual speed. Walker also offered assurances on conservative media. On her radio show last week, Laura Ingraham asked Walker about the ad, saying, “You don’t believe the final decision should be between a woman and her doctor? You believe –” Walker cut in, “No.”

Kaylie Hanson, a press secretary for the Democratic National Committee, responded, “If it wasn’t clear before, it is now .... Maybe he doesn’t think we’re capable, maybe he doesn’t trust us, or maybe he wants to make the decision for us. Whatever it is, this statement is just another line from Scott Walker that proves what we've known all along: he's wrong for women."

A similar 20-week ban is expected to be introduced in the U.S. Senate soon after the August recess ends. The House of Representatives passed a similar ban in May. President Obama has promised to veto the bill if it comes to his desk.

Walker first, Trump second in Iowa Poll // The Hill // Jesse Byrnes – July 20, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker leads a crowded field of Republican presidential contenders in the early voting state of Iowa, according to a new Monmouth University poll of likely caucusgoers.

Walker takes 22 percent in the poll released Monday, a double digit lead against all other GOP candidates with the exception of businessman Donald Trump, who has 13 percent support.

Neurosurgeon Ben Carson (8 percent), former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (7 percent), Texas Sen. Ted Cruz (7 percent) and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (6 percent) follow behind.

The poll was conducted amid Trump's controversial comments Saturday in Iowa, in which he said that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) was not a war hero because he was captured during Vietnam.

Republicans seized on the remark to condemn Trump, a celebrity real estate developer who has taken top spots in polls since launching his White House bid in mid-June.

Walker has led a slew of Iowa polls in recent weeks by similar margins to those in the most recent Monmouth poll, leading in favorability especially among tea party and very conservative voters.

The survey of 452 Iowa voters was conducted July 16-19 via landlines and cellphones with a margin of error of 4.6 points.

Scott Walker: Donald Trump 'Needs t o Apologize' for McCain Com ments // NBC News // Kelly O'Donnell – July 20, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker has tried to ignore Donald Trump's bluster by leaning on the old "Reagan commandment" that discourages attacks against fellow Republicans. That ended Sunday after the tycoon's comments about Sen. John McCain's military record.

In an exclusive and wide-ranging interview with NBC News, Walker had a message for Trump and the real-estate mogul's supporters.

"At a minimum, he needs to apologize," Walker said. "I think more people need to push him. Not just candidates or elected officials, I think more people across America including some of those who, maybe up until now, have been supporters of him."

At the Family Leadership Summit on Saturday, Trump said McCain is "not a war hero because he was captured. I like people that weren't captured." Under fire, Trump later acknowledged that McCain's sacrifice was heroic.

Walker was careful not to mention Trump by name but said his insulting rant against McCain went too far, "when it came to personal attack like this against the military, an American hero, I'm gonna call it like I see it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead of an apology, Trump has shown only more defiance. He refused Sunday to take back his slam against McCain's service as a prisoner of war in Vietnam.

Walker said he was not avoiding conflict with Trump to avoid becoming one of his targets. "No, from my standpoint, I just stayed out of it," he said. "We don't want to be a circular firing squad."

The Wisconsin governor is a rarity in presidential politics when it comes to resume. He didn't finish college. Instead, a job offer came during his senior year.

"Unlike some of my friends who were a year or two older than me, they had degrees but they didn't have jobs," Walker said.

He had considered going back to finish school but life's responsibilities intervened. "Next thing you know, all your time and your money is spent on your family," he said.

Walker said his career success despite the lack of a college degree makes him qualified to speak to and for much of the country who choose to do an associate degree or an apprenticeship instead of the traditional four year bachelor's degree.

"I'm not unlike about two-thirds of America who're in a very similar circumstance," he said.

However, Walker wasn't keen for his sons Matt and Alex, a junior and senior in college, to follow in his footsteps. "I think college is great for my sons. It's right for the careers they want to pursue," he said. "They know, not just from my standpoint, but from their mother. She wants them to finish just like I do."

Wisconsin's first family may be on the same page about finishing college, but they do not agree about the right for same-sex couples to marry.

Walker disagrees with the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision that marriage is a Constitutional right for same-sex couples. His sons support gay marriage.

He said his sons' positions won't change his own mind. "I've had this position for more than two decades. I believe that marriage is between one man and one woman," he said. Walker added the family's public disagreement reveals that "we're very transparent."

He said: "Both my sons' generation has different views than some folks do, but that doesn't change who I am or what I believe in."

Walker's 22-year marriage to wife Tonette brings another personal dimension to the GOP race for the White House that is seldom seen in presidential-level politics. Walker, at age 47, is 12 years younger than his wife.

Asked whether he has ever felt judged by society's double-standard on marital age differences, Walker replied: "No, Tonette was a widow before we married. In some ways, I think it actually makes her tough for the job."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker described her life experiences as a political asset. Her first husband lost a battle with a terminal illness at almost the same time her brother died of bone marrow cancer. Her mother also died from brain cancer and her father from lung disease, he said.

"She's dealt with some pretty tough things in her life. And I think looking ahead, when people ask, 'Is she up to the challenge?' Boy, I think anybody who's gone through that personally is more than prepared for anything crazy that could be thrown on his plate."

Scott Walker first, Donald Trump second in Iowa: poll // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – July 20, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker has a nine-point lead over businessman Donald Trump, his nearest Republican rival, in a new poll on the 2016 GOP field in Iowa.

Mr. Walker was the first choice of 22 percent of Iowa Republicans, followed by Mr. Trump at 13 percent in the Monmouth University poll released Monday.

“Walker has been a favorite of Iowa voters ever since his well-received appearance at the Iowa Freedom summit in January. More recently, Trump has outmaneuvered the rest of the field to earn the second spot despite his controversial statements over the weekend,” said Patrick Murray, director of the Monmouth University Polling Institute in West Long Branch, New Jersey.

Many Republicans have hammered Mr. Trump for saying Saturday in Iowa that Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a prisoner of war in Vietnam, is a war hero “because he was captured; I like people that weren’t captured, OK?”

Mr. Trump says the remarks have been misrepresented and said that Mr. McCain is a war hero but he has failed on veterans’ issues.

According to the poll, Mr. Trump got 13 percent of the vote to Mr. Walker’s 19 percent Thursday and Friday — a slight difference from Saturday and Sunday, when Mr. Trump got 13 percent to Mr. Walker’s 25 percent.

Behind those two men were retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 8 percent, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas at 7 percent apiece, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee — who won Iowa in 2008 — at 6 percent, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida and Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky at 5 percent apiece, and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal at 4 percent.

Former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the 2012 Iowa caucus winner, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina were tied for tenth at 3 percent apiece.

Mr. Walker, Mr. Trump, and Mr. Cruz ran 1-2-3 among voters who aligned themselves with the tea party, voters who described themselves as “very conservative,” and voters who said they were evangelicals.

Mr. Murray also took note of Mr. Jindal’s position in the poll.

“It’s worth noting that Bobby Jindal enjoys more support in Iowa than he does nationally,” he said. “He is among the top 10 candidates in Iowa, but his showing in the national polls makes it unlikely he will gain entry to the first debate.”

This Is How Scott Walker Responded When A 13-Year-Old Girl Asked Why He Was Trying To Deport Her Dad // Think Progress // Esther Lee – July 20, 2015

A 13-year-old U.S. citizen of undocumented parents living in Wisconsin twice confronted Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, a 2016 Republican presidential candidate, in Iowa on Sunday to ask why their state was part of a lawsuit challenging President Obama's executive action on deportation relief for upwards of five million immigrants.

During the five-minute exchange obtained by Voces de la Frontera, Walker told 13-year-old Leslie Flores, "I completely sympathize with the situation you're all in and others are in," but said that he wouldn't drop Wisconsin from the lawsuit because "the president of the United States can't make law without going through the Congress."

Turning to address Leslie's family, Walker accused Obama of having the chance to fix immigration in his first two years in office, but failing to do so. Walker added that as president, he would make sure to secure the borders and put "in place a system that enforces the laws, and then, then the next president and Congress can deal with these issues going forward. But right now, I'm not blocking anything."

Leslie was in Iowa with her seven-year-old brother Louis and her undocumented father Jose.

Before breaking out into tears, Louis asked Walker, "Do you want me to like come home and come from school and my dad get deported?" Walker sidestepped, stating that he had two nieces who go to school in Waukesha, but that his point was "in America nobody's above the law." Instead of addressing the topic of deportation, Walker stated that he hoped kids like Louis would learn in school that "the President and the Congress have to work together."

When Jose jumped in later, asking if Wisconsin could be dropped from the lawsuit, Walker stated, "I agree with it, I support the lawsuit because the President can't be above the law."

Watch the extended confrontation here:

Walker has a long history of flip-flopping on immigration reform, reportedly telling people privately that he would support some sort of legal status for undocumented immigrants, but soon after the comments were made public, his spokeswoman said "we strongly dispute this account." He's since maintained that he rejected so-called "amnesty," or the ability for some undocumented immigrants to stay in the country and perhaps earn legal status of some kind.

And a well-known conservative Heritage Foundation scholar who supports an immigration overhaul recently recanted his account of a private phone call with the Wisconsin governor in which Walker allegedly said, "I'm not going nativist, I'm pro-immigration."

During his time as governor, Walker repealed in-state tuition for undocumented students, mandated immigration background checks in all 72 Wisconsin counties, and supported a lawsuit to rollback on President Obama's executive action on immigration that would have provided deportation relief and work authorization for upwards of five millions of immigrants.

Obama's executive actions are currently halted from moving forward after a Texas judge issued an injunction in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

February. Jose would have likely qualified for the Deferred Action for Parents of Americans (DAPA) program, which would have shielded parents of U.S. citizens and legal permanent residents from deportation. In the meantime, even undocumented immigrants without serious offenses are still at risk of deportation and separation from their families.

Last December, Walker requested Wisconsin Attorney General J.B. Van Hollen join the multi-state lawsuit led by Texas. At the time, Walker condemned the president's executive actions for exceeding "the limits of his administrative powers."

But in the past, Walker twice signed resolutions backing programs that would have granted legal status to undocumented immigrants as a county executive in Milwaukee County. And in 2013, Walker endorsed legal status for undocumented immigrants.

Jose Flores is one of about 85,000 undocumented immigrants living in Wisconsin, a 2012 Pew Hispanic Center report found. But he is also one of 25,000 undocumented immigrants in Wisconsin who are potentially eligible for the president's expanded deferred action program.

A Center for American Progress report estimated that if undocumented immigrants, like Jose, "are able to receive a temporary work permit, it would lead to a $19 million increase in tax revenues for Wisconsin, over five years."

Rand Paul readying Hill push for guns on military bases and in recruiting stations // WaPo // David Weigel – July 20, 2015

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul is working on legislation to allow soldiers to carry guns on military bases, and could introduce it as soon as this week. That could establish him as a leader among conservatives who say last week's massacre at a Chattanooga, Tennessee recruiting station should change how the military looks at the issue.

"After Major [Nidal] Hasan did the shooting at Fort Hood, we did legislation on arming military on bases," said Paul, in a roundtable with reporters at his Washington, D.C campaign office. "This was a recruiting station, right? Well, I would include recruiting stations. One of the weird things is that we have 15-20 states where you can open carry. So everybody can carry, except for the military? I think that's crazy. The rules that apply to everybody should at least apply to the military."

Paul, who was elected to the Senate a year after Hasan's 2009 killing spree on the Texas military base, has long favored a policy shift that would allow guns on bases. His new bill may go even further than the versions that followed Fort Hood. In 2013, former Rep. Steve Stockman (R-Tex.) sponsored a Safe Military Bases Act, written to allow guns. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.), one of Paul's rivals for the Republican Party's presidential nomination, has used his perch on the Armed Services Committee to ask for hearings on the gun policy.

The killings in Chattanooga have pushed the issue into overdrive. On Monday afternoon, the National Rifle Association called for military recruiters to be armed. In recent days, Republican frontrunners Donald Trump, Jeb Bush, and Scott Walker have all questioned the logic of the gun ban.

"These [members of the military] are people who could have handled guns very easily," said Trump at a Republican fundraiser in Arkansas. "They would have had a good chance if they had a gun."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul's commitment to gun rights has a stronger pedigree than Trump's. He is closely tied to the National Association for Gun Rights, a group that positions itself to the right of the NRA.

"I think guns are a great deterrent anyway," Paul said on Monday. "I've also had bills, for a couple of years now, making it easier to arm pilots. "

In the wake of Chattanooga, Paul has also criticized immigration laws, asking whether they are letting anti-American elements into the country. "I'm very concerned about immigration to this country from countries that have hotbeds of jihadism and hotbeds of this Islamism," he told Breitbart News reporter Matthew Boyle last week. Paul expanded on those comments Monday, recalling how he had wanted "Rubio's legislation" – i.e., the stillborn 2013 immigration reform bill – to add screening for potential terrorists.

"We wrote a letter to Harry Reid, saying we should slow the bill down, and have a discussion about putting the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System in," said Paul. "It gave extra scrutiny to countries that had radical elements that were professing a desire to harm Americans or America. I don't think it has to say one religion or not, but I think you find out that most of the anti-American movements around the country do seem to be coming from predominately Islamic countries."

Paul's call for reform of NSEERS put the PATRIOT Act's biggest Republican critic in the rare position of endorsing an anti-terror policy enacted by George W. Bush.

"This program was in existence for a decade, and I think we should have more scrutiny," he said. "If a third of [a country's] population is in civil war, and saying 'death to America,' maybe we should ask them a few more questions before they visit. Same goes for student visas."

CRUZ

Claire McCaskill: 'Cruz following Trump around like a lost puppy' // Politico // Eliza Collins – July 20, 2015

Sen. Claire McCaskill thinks Sen. Ted Cruz is behaving like a lost puppy in his dealings with fellow Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump — and not in a cute way.

"There's something unseemly about Cruz following Trump around like a lost puppy, hoping to get his leftovers when he finally flames out," the Missouri Democrat tweeted Monday.

Cruz is one of the only 2016 candidates to avoid criticizing Trump's often inflammatory comments, and some argue that's hurting his chances of getting the GOP nomination.

After Trump said that Mexico was sending "rapists" and other criminals to the U.S., Cruz said he saluted Trump for bringing immigration into the conversation and said that the real estate magnate "has a colorful way of speaking."

The two also met last week at Trump Tower in Manhattan. After the meeting, Cruz called it "a good visit."

"We had a conversation about the race," Cruz said. "He's running, I'm running and we both agreed that we started out as friends and will end as friends."

On Saturday, Trump escalated his feud with John McCain by saying the Arizona senator's time as a prisoner in Vietnam does not make him a war hero.

"He's not a war hero," said Trump. "He was a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

Republicans swiftly condemned the remarks, with most GOP candidates calling Trump's comments unacceptable.

But the Texas senator has remained supportive, and has declined to criticize Trump.

"You know, I recognize that folks in the press love to see Republican-on-Republican violence, and so you want me to say something bad about Donald Trump, or bad about John McCain or bad about anyone else," Cruz said Saturday. "I'm not going to do it."

Cruz: Iran Deal Likely To Force Next President To Take "Direct Military Action" // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – July 20, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz said on Saturday that the deal to restrict Iran's nuclear program and lift economic sanctions on the country would likely force the next president to take "direct military action" to prevent a nuclear catastrophe that "could cost the lives of tens of millions of Americans."

The Texas senator said in an interview with the Trail Talk podcast over the weekend that it was "very likely that a new president" would be told, in January 2017, that Iran was "on the verge of acquiring nuclear weapons." Cruz said the deal rendered economic sanctions "no longer an effective tool," and therefore the new president would be presented with two choices: "acquiesce" or attack.

He said that the "unacceptably high" odds of Iran using a nuclear weapon if it acquired one made it so that President Obama had essentially forced his successor into taking the military option.

"I think it is likely the next president will be advised in January '17, you have two and only two choices," Cruz said. "Either you acquiesce to Iran acquiring a nuclear weapon or direct military action must be used to take it out. I think that's unfortunate but that's what President Obama is forcing."

Cruz added that Iran could launch a nuclear warhead from a ship off the Atlantic Coast, setting off an "electromagnetic pulse," which would "take down the electrical grid for the entire Eastern seaboard." Such a disaster, he said, could leave tens of millions of people "unable to get food and water."

"The projections are that tens of millions of Americans would die, as they were unable to get food and water and the basic foodstuffs of life," Cruz said. "That's the threat President Obama's nuclear deal provides and anyone who is remotely qualified to be commander in chief needs to be prepared to do whatever is necessary prevent a threat that could cost the lives of tens of millions of Americans."

CRUZ: "If Congress does not stop this deal, I think it will be the single greatest challenge a new president in January '17 will confront because it is very likely that a new president when he or she sits down in the Oval Office for the first security briefing, will be told that Iran is on the verge of acquiring nuclear weapons and because President Obama unraveled the international consensus on sanctions, sanctions will no longer be an effective tool.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Because even if you wanted to reimpose sanctions, it would take months, even years, if ever, to bring foreign countries back together in an effective sanctions regime, which means that tool, President Obama's effectively taken away from the next president. I think it is likely the next president will be advised in January '17, you have two and only two choices: either you acquiesce to Iran acquiring a nuclear weapon or direct military action must be used to take it out. I think that's unfortunate but that's what President Obama is forcing."

QUESTION: "And President Cruz would entertain a direct military?"

CRUZ: "Under no circumstances would I allow Iran to acquire nuclear weapons. And I believe any responsible commander in chief should be prepared to do whatever is necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons because if they acquired those weapons, the odds are unacceptably high that they would use them in the skies of Tel Aviv or New York or Los Angeles. That getting this decision wrong could result in the deaths of millions of Americans and in fact it's even worse than that. One of the greatest threats of an Iranian nuke is if they had one nuclear warhead and they put it on a ship anywhere off the Atlantic seaboard and they fired it on a missile straight up in the air into the atmosphere and detonated a nuclear weapon, it would set off what's known as an electromagnetic pulse—an EMP, which would take down the electrical grid for the entire Eastern seaboard. The projections are that tens of millions of Americans would die, as they were unable to get food and water and the basic foodstuffs of life. That's the threat President Obama's nuclear deal provides and anyone who is remotely qualified to be Commander in Chief needs to be prepared to do whatever is necessary prevent a threat that could cost the lives of tens of millions of Americans."

Ted Cruz takes aim at Congress' Obamacare 'exemption' // Washington Times // Tom Howell – July 20, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz, a vocal conservative running for president, will push to expose fellow members of Congress for "exempting" themselves from Obamacare this week, adding sparks to an already-fraught debate over a highway bill that needs to pass by July 31.

Mr. Cruz, Texas Republican, will try to force votes on an amendment that would cancel the subsidy lawmakers collect to help cover their insurance costs when they buy plans on an Obamacare exchange.

It's a thorny issue for his colleagues, many of whom defend the subsidy as the equivalent of the arrangements most businesses have with their employees. But Mr. Cruz and a cadre of fellow senators argue that Obamacare is different, and lawmakers have given themselves a sweetheart deal no other exchange customers enjoy.

"Members of Congress retain their illegal exemptions from Obamacare, and it's time to end the Washington favors that have gone on for far too long," Mr. Cruz said.

The wrinkle is that the fight would happen on an unrelated bill to renew the federal highway fund, which would otherwise expire at the end of the month, shutting down road projects across the country.

Considered a must-pass bill, the highway legislation is already attracting the interest of lawmakers who want to tack their own priorities onto it.

In addition to Mr. Cruz's Obamacare fight, some senators have said they'll force a vote to revive the Export-Import bank. Still others, including Mr. Cruz, want to have a fight over federal funding for Planned Parenthood.

His Obamacare exemption push may be one of the thorniest, though.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Under Obamacare, members of Congress and their official staffers lost their generous federal health plans and are instead required to buy insurance on the exchanges. But the administration's Office of Personnel Management decided in 2013 that lawmakers and staffers who use the D.C. small-business exchange can still get their employer subsidies to cover premiums.

Regular Americans who buy plans through the exchange are restricted from having employers contribute to their premiums.

The disconnect plays into Mr. Cruz's claims there is a "Washington cartel" of lawmakers and lobbyists who put their own interests first. It's also the type of elbow-throwing that's won him support from conservative quarters and scorn from centrist GOP colleagues who said his anti-Obamacare strategy led them into a 16-day shutdown in fall 2013.

"He never is going to win the most popular legislator award so it makes more sense for him to play to outside constituencies and go after unpopular perks," said Darrell West, director of governance studies at the Brookings Institution. "Anything that challenges special privileges is going to be popular with voters."

Earlier this year, Mr. Cruz signaled he might actually buy an Obamacare plan because his wife, Heidi, decided to take an unpaid leave of absence from Goldman Sachs Group Inc. in Houston, as the senator runs for president. But instead, his family decided to purchase an off-exchange plan on the open market from Texas Blue Cross and Blue Shield.

Other lawmakers have bought coverage in exchanges in their home states, shunning the subsidy. And still others have insurance unrelated to their jobs.

The issue is a sensitive one, since it involves lawmakers' personal finances and health decisions.

For years Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, led a one-man crusade to expose lawmakers who take the employer subsidy.

But Mr. Vitter is a senior member of the Environment and Public Works Committee that wrote the highway bill, and is reluctant to see it slowed by unrelated fights. Instead, he will reintroduce standalone legislation Tuesday that prohibits lawmakers from getting the employer subsidy.

"The Washington Obamacare exemption represents a level of arrogance from Congress and D.C.'s elite that fundamentally undermines our nation's government of the people, by the people, and for the people," Mr. Vitter said.

Each of the GOP senators running for president — Mr. Cruz, Marco Rubio of Florida, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina — voted earlier this year for a non-binding amendment to the budget to stop the subsidy.

"Members of Congress shouldn't get a benefit while hardworking Americans have to pay full freight for their health insurance," Cruz campaign spokesman Brian Phillip said. "It's an issue of fundamental fairness and Americans deserve to know where the candidates for any federal office, Congress or the presidency, stand on it."

Congress needs to pass a highway funding bill before the end of the month, when the federal government will no longer be able reimburse states for their road projects. The House passed a short-term extension of the highway trust fund through Dec. 18 to buy time to negotiate a six-year deal this fall.

Democratic senator: Cruz scrounging for Trump's 'leftovers' // The Hill // Jordain Carney – July 20, 2015

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) gave Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) a Twitter smack-down on Monday after he refused to disavow fellow presidential candidate Donald Trump's criticism of Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) time spent as a prisoner of war in Vietnam.

"There's something unseemly about Cruz following Trump around like a lost puppy, hoping to get his leftovers when he finally flames out," the Missouri Democrat tweeted on Monday.

She made her remarks after Trump sparked a firestorm among Republicans when he mocked McCain, saying that "he was a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

But Cruz refused to weigh in on the rhetorical battle between Trump and the Arizona Republican, saying that "folks in the press love to see Republican-on-Republican violence."

"You want me to say something about Donald Trump or bad about John McCain or bad about anyone else," he added, according to The Washington Post. "I'm not going to do it."

Trump has recently surged in the polls, including leading a national Fox News poll released late last week. Cruz, meanwhile, has struggled to gain momentum after launching his presidential bid weeks ahead of his competitors.

Monday's tweet isn't the first time McCaskill has commented on Trump's remarks. The Missouri senator weighed in over the weekend, calling his comments on McCain, and prisoners of war more generally, "disgusting."

In a separate tweet she pressured the Republican National Committee, which released a statement on Saturday afternoon, to disavow Trump's remarks, adding "will Cruz agree with Trump on this one too?"

Cruz and Vitter to Target Congressional Health Care // Roll Call // Bridget Bowman – July 20, 2015

Sen. David Vitter's crusade against congressional health care benefits will continue this week, this time with help from a presidential hopeful.

The Lousisiana Republican is expected to introduce "No Exemptions" legislation to combat the employer contribution for lawmakers, and Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, is expected to copy the language and try to insert it as an amendment into the highway funding bill the Senate is set to consider this week.

Cruz and Vitter have vigorously opposed the government contribution to congressional health care under the Affordable Care Act, calling it a "Washington exemption." Lawmakers and their staffs were able to maintain that contribution as the result of a 2013 Office of Personnel Management ruling that House and Senate employees could participate in the D.C. Small Business Health Option Program, rather than enroll on the individual exchanges.

"The very people who wrote the law — Harry Reid and the Senate Democrats — wanted out of it. And this Administration was only too happy to oblige," Cruz said in a statement Monday. "Today, the taxpayers subsidize their platinum plans while millions of Americans across this country have lost their jobs, have been forced into part-time work, have lost their health insurance, have lost their doctors, and are facing skyrocketing premiums," Cruz continued. "Yet members of Congress retain their illegal exemptions from Obamacare, and it's time to end the Washington favors that have gone on for far too long."

Cruz offering the amendment to the long-term transportation bill would be a move sure to bring more contention to the process.

Another GOP presidential hopeful, Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, has already signaled he wants an amendment vote this week to block federal dollars from flowing to Planned Parenthood, and the must-pass measure is also lining up as the vehicle for reviving the Export-Import Bank.

Aside from presidential politics, there may be a good reason for Cruz to take charge this time.

Unlike the many times Vitter sought to get votes on amendments related to what he calls the "Washington exemption" from the reach of the Affordable Care Act, the highway bill is a measure on which the Louisiana Republican has played a significant role. He's a senior member of the Environment and Public Works Committee and chairman of the subpanel with federal-aid highways in its jurisdiction.

But Vitter made no reference to potentially complicating the highway bill in a statement Monday. Instead, he touted a 73-page report on his investigation into "Congress' fraudulent Obamacare subsidy."

Vitter contends Congress should not have been allowed to enroll in the small business exchange, since it is, by definition, not a small business under D.C. law since Congress employs more than 50 people. The question of Congress' characterization as a small business in the exchange was the subject of a recent taxpayer lawsuit, but the suit was dismissed when a D.C. Superior Court judge ruled congressional staff could enroll in the exchange.

Still, Vitter is looking for answers, even after a failed attempt to subpoena the D.C. government over the issue. He listed a series of questions at the end of his report, including which members of Congress met with the White House to discuss the OPM rule.

Cruz Plans Slew of Highway Bill Amendments // Free Beacon // Lachlan Markay – July 20, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R., Texas) plans to offer numerous amendments to a federal highway funding bill reauthorizing an export finance agency that the GOP presidential hopeful has pledged to kill, his staff confirmed on Monday.

The seven amendments are vast in scope. Two deal with Obamacare (one would repeal the law entirely). Two pertain to illegal immigration. Others focus on the recently negotiated nuclear deal with Iran, an Internet access tax, national firearm laws, and federal funding for Planned Parenthood.

The amendments threaten to roil an already contentious debate over funding for the national highway system, which is expected to include provisions reauthorizing funding for the U.S. Export-Import Bank, an agency that finances the purchase of U.S. exports by foreign governments and corporations.

Authorization for Ex-Im funding expired at the end of June, though the agency will continue disbursing approved commitments through September. Proponents of the agency are hoping to reauthorize it before then, and are eyeing the highway bill as the means to do so.

Opponents hope that funding for national infrastructure is too important for Ex-Im critics to oppose. But Cruz said last week that he is "willing to use any and all procedural tools to stop" Ex-Im reauthorization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz's amendments all hit on popular conservative issues. In addition to repealing Obamacare, they would remove federal funding for Planned Parenthood, prohibit illegal immigrants granted deportation relief under an executive order from working on federally funded highway projects, place a permanent moratorium on federal internet access taxes, and block a nuclear deal with Iran unless the Islamic Republic recognizes the state of Israel and releases American hostages currently imprisoned there.

Cruz will also sign onto an amendment introduced by Sen. Tom Cotton (R., Okla.) that would bar cities that refuse to enforce U.S. immigration laws—so-called "sanctuary cities"—from receiving federal law enforcement grants.

If passed by the Senate, those measures could test Democratic support for the highway bill. But Cruz says the amendments are standalone policy efforts, not simply an attempt to impede legislation containing Ex-Im reauthorization.

"Each of these amendments addresses a critical policy issue that deserves Congress' full attention," Cruz said in an emailed statement on Monday. "I fully intend to take this opportunity to stand against the Washington Cartel and to stand for liberty and our Constitutional rights."

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) has signaled that he will allow amendments on the highway bill when it is considered in the Senate this week. That will likely give Cruz an opportunity to offer his proposals.

However, that is also the avenue that Ex-Im supporters will use to link the legislation to the agency's reauthorization—a fact that drew conservative criticism of McConnell on Monday.

Some of Cruz's conservative colleagues have joined him in pledging procedural efforts to block the bill if Ex-Im funding is attached.

"I think those of us who oppose it will continue to use any and all procedural tools at our disposal in order to oppose it," Sen. Mike Lee (R., Utah) said at a press conference last week.

It is not clear that a filibuster would prevent the bill's passage. A symbolic procedural vote on the agency's funding last month received 65 votes in the Senate, including 22 from Republicans, suggesting that a highway bill could muster the 60 votes necessary to end debate on the measure even with Ex-Im reauthorization attached.

That would bring the Senate's version of the legislation back to the House, which last week approved a stopgap highway funding measure with no accompanying Ex-Im provision.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R., Wis.), the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, urged the Senate to pass that version of the legislation "without any unrelated measures." Instead, the upper chamber will vote on a multi-year authorization bill that could contain significant language outside of the scope of highway funding.

Dan Holler, the communications director of the conservative group Heritage Action for America, praised House leaders for urging consideration of a bill free of Ex-Im language, though he noted that his group opposed the House measure.

"It is incumbent upon [Republican leaders]—and anybody who opposes Washington's corrupt practice of favoritism—to ensure Ex-Im remains dead," Holler said in a statement last week.

Update: A previous version of this story stated that Cruz's amendment would place a moratorium on Internet sales taxes, not access taxes as is the case.

Claire McCaskill savages Ted Cruz in one brutal tweet: "A lost puppy hoping to get his leftovers" // Salon // Sophia Tesfaye – July 20, 2015

"I'm not going to do it."

Republican Presidential candidate Ted Cruz refuses to join the rest of the GOP field in condemning Donald Trump's recent remarks making light of Sen. McCain's time as a prisoner of war and now the Texas senator's weak-kneed approach to the GOP frontrunner is drawing scrutiny.

"You know I recognize that folks in the press love to see Republican-on-Republican violence" Cruz lamented this weekend, blaming the media for manufacturing a controversy. "So you want me to say something bad about Donald Trump, or bad about John McCain or bad about anyone else," he said before adding, "I'm not going to do it."

Speaking with Iowa voters over the weekend, Trump said of John McCain's service during the Vietnam War, "He's a war hero because he was captured … I like people that weren't captured."

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Sen. Lindsey Graham joined with the Republican National Committee in rebuking Trump, some calling from his exit from the presidential race and declaring no room for such comments in the GOP. But instead of denouncing Trump's attack, Cruz simply tweeted his belief that McCain is "an American hero":

Well, Missouri Democratic Senator Claire McCaskill found Cruz's refusal to lay an easy jab against a rival peculiar, tweeting that Cruz's behavior towards Trump was "unseemly" and comparing their relationship to that of a "lost puppy" following a man "hoping to get his leftovers when he finally flames out":

McCaskill's observation may be on point. Last week, Trump confirmed a meeting between the two rivals, a move clearly orchestrated by the Cruz campaign:

TRUMP: Ted Cruz called me, and – I don't know why I'm meeting him, to be honest. But I do have respect for him. I respect the fact that, along with a couple of others, he came out and he came out very strongly and agreed with what I said on illegal immigration. And he came out very strongly and he came out early. And I respect that. I like him. He called me, he wanted to meet, and we are going to meet. What it's about, I have absolutely no idea.

It is apparent that Trump is a fan of Trump fans and for now, Cruz looks to be a Trump fan but Cruz's willingness to embrace Trump is even more curious given that earlier this year, Trump said Cruz faced a particular "hurdle that nobody else seems to have at this moment":

He was born in Canada, if you know, and when we all studied our history lessons, you're supposed to be born in this country, so I just don't know how the courts would rule on it. But it's an additional hurdle that he has that no one else seems to have.

CHRISTIE

First look: Debut ad from pro-Chris Christie super PAC highlights opposition to Iran deal // WaPo // James Hohmann – July 20, 2015

The first ad from the super PAC supporting Chris Christie focuses on the New Jersey governor's opposition to the Iran deal.

America Leads will put $1.1 million behind the spot in New Hampshire between Tuesday and Aug. 6, including an ad buy on Boston TV and a strong digital component.

The 30-second commercial shows Christie at a town hall meeting in Sandown, New Hampshire.

"This president is allowing Iran, the largest state sponsor of terrorism in the world, to have a glide path towards a nuclear weapon," the Republican tells the crowd. "A strong American military is not built to wage war; it is built to prevent war. I am the only candidate who has actually been responsible for fighting terrorism and has prosecuted terrorists and put them in jail. And if I become president, we're going to protect the homeland, not lower our defenses against them."

The group, led by former Republican Governors Association executive director Phil Cox, reported raising $11 million last week.

America Leads has also reserved $2.8 million worth of airtime during the three months leading up to next February's New Hampshire primary.

This is part of a broader strategy to "let Christie be Christie" and go positive from the start. With a cameraman at every town hall, the super PAC is developing a library of footage of the governor taking on every issue out there so that when an issue moves to the forefront, like Iran, they can quickly get up on the air with Christie in his own voice saying where he stands.

"Christie's persona and authenticity lend itself to this kind of approach," a strategist for the group explained.

Super PAC backing Christie launches first ad // Politico // Adam Lerner – July 20, 2015

The super PAC supporting Chris Christie's presidential bid has launched a new television ad and its message is clear: The New Jersey governor is the GOP field's strongest opponent of the Iranian nuclear deal.

In the ad, dubbed "Glide Path," a pro-Christie sign emblazoned with the phrase "Telling It Like It Is" appears on screen, and the New Jersey Republican begins warning a town hall audience, "This is a dangerous, dangerous world right now."

"This president is allowing Iran, the largest state sponsor of terrorism in the world, to have a glide path towards a nuclear weapon," Christie says.

Christie continues to assert that he is "the only candidate who has actually been responsible for fighting terrorism and has prosecuted terrorists and put them in jail," referring to his six years as U.S. attorney for the District of New Jersey in the wake of the 9/11 attacks.

America Leads, the super PAC that created the ad and plans to run more in the future, has already reserved $2.8 million in air time from November to February in New Hampshire, according to the Bergen County Record, which says the group raised $11 million through June 30 and has $10.7 million in cash on hand. The ad's footage comes from a June 30 town hall event in Sandown, New Hampshire, after the preliminary outlines of the deal were announced, but before the Obama administration released the final agreement's language.

Last week the White House announced that it had reached a deal with Iran and five other world powers to severely restrict the country's nuclear program, although a portion of the country's nuclear infrastructure will remain intact. Hillary Clinton quickly came out in support of the deal, while every single prominent Republican presidential candidate has joined with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in denouncing it.

N.J. union chief says he won't negotiate pension reforms with Chris Christie // Politico // Ryan Hutchins – July 20, 2015

The head of New Jersey largest public employee union said Monday he will not negotiate any pension reforms with Governor Chris Christie, a Republican who rose to national prominence on claims he had "fixed" the state's pension system.

Four years later, Christie finds himself unable to make scheduled payments into the retirement system and saying, as a spokeswoman put it on Monday, that the system remains "broken and unaffordable." But Wendell Steinhauer, president of the New Jersey Education Association, said he and his members "will not concede one inch to this governor."

"He's dishonest, unreliable and hopelessly incapable of good-faith negotiations," Steinhauer said in a fiery, six-paragraph statement. "He's consistently lied about his pension funding intentions, and he's yet to live up to the promises he's already made. The ball is in his court to fund the pensions according to the law he signed. We will not negotiate against ourselves."

After a lengthy and bitter battle with unions, Christie signed a reform package into law in 2011 that boosted contributions from public employees and slashed cost-of-living adjustments, but said the state would start making annual contributions to the fund. Christie hailed the deal for years, even talking about it in his 2012 keynote speech at the Republican National Convention.

But the fiscal situation in New Jersey did not turn out as expected, and this year, Christie found himself unable to keep up with the payments. As he prepared to launch his presidential campaign, the governor won a state Supreme Court case last month that allowed him to skip a $1.57 billion pension payment and balance the budget.

Spokeswoman Nicole Sizemore said Monday the teacher's union needs to recognize the reality the state is facing.

"The simple fact is this: the average NJEA member contributes $186,000 to their pension and health benefit costs over 30 years and takes out $2.5 million in benefits," Sizemore said. "The math does not work and all the name calling in the world by NJEA leadership won't change that fact."

The union said it will continue to talk to State Senate President Steve Sweeney and Assembly Speaker Vincent Prieto, as well as other Democratic leaders in the Legislature, on potential changes. Prieto met with the heads of several public workers unions last week to discuss potential changes that would increase payments into the plan over five years, according to one source, but wasn't ready to discuss the issue publicly yet.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Christie said last week that he wouldn't accept any changes to the system that don't include concession from the unions, saying, "if all it does is to stretch out the time requirement to make the same payment for the same bloated system, then it's no solution."

Chris Christie's Defining Mistake: Winning in a Landslide // HuffPo // Nicholas Sheppard – July 20, 2015

For an ambitious, surging politician, Chris Christie's desire to run for a second term as Governor, and to win in a landslide, would have been irresistible -- but in retrospect it may have been a defining mistake. He would be positioning himself far more viably as a presidential hopeful now if he had taken the counter-intuitive, but ultimately more shrewd decision to step down after a single, successful term.

New Jersey elections for Governor are on odd years. Christie's re-election was in November of 2013. If he hadn't run, the timing would have been perfect: a two-year intermission between standing down, in January of 2014, and the general election of 2016, a period not long enough out of circulation to be thought of as losing relevance, especially relative to Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush; yet a period long enough for him to have occupied a political medium of bi-partisan goodwill, not on the same scale, but still evocative of Rudy Giuliani in the mid 2000s after he stepped down as mayor at the end of 2001 having shown strong and competent leadership during a massive crisis, and transcending partisanship as a tough moderate from a blue state.

Christie's single term would have encapsulated everything he needed: a first half boldly and brazenly conservative, to the extent he was contemplated as a possible Republican Vice-presidential nominee in 2012; and a second half defined by transcendent bi-partisanship, visibly summed up by a fulsome welcome of the president in the aftermath of Super Storm Sandy. In retrospect, he had all the necessary credentials and the compelling story he needed by the end of a single term, burnished further by a brash, no-nonsense career as a prosecutor. Given this context, in terms of risk vs reward, a second term was undoubtedly inviting, but not strictly necessary. It may well turn out to be his undoing.

Straightaway, when he chose to run for re-election, there were problems: he was criticized for spending an additional $12-25 million of state money to hold a special election for the Senate three weeks earlier, instead of simply holding the special election on the general election day, when popular mayor Cory Booker might have attracted more votes for Barbara Buono, his opponent in the Governor's race.

The Fort Lee lane closures occurred before the 2013 election; but they were motivated by it: as retribution against Fort Lee's Mayor for not endorsing Christie in the Governor's race. Media outlets began reporting on the incriminating exchanges, between Christie's aides, in January of 2014, just days after his inauguration for a second term. The issue has lingered: In May of this year, a Monmouth University poll found that 50 percent of New Jersey's adults believed Chris Christie was personally involved in the scandal. According to a recent Business Insider poll of polls, Christie's net favorability peaked in January 2013 - the moment he would have stepped down had he chosen not to run. 51% of Americans had a favorable opinion, and just 23% had an unfavorable opinion at that time.

During Hurricane Sandy, he projected strong leadership, and by the time of the re-election, he was able to argue that his administration had managed the recovery and overseen much of the relief effort. Not long after his re-election, however, allegations were already starting to emerge that much of the federal house aid money allocated to Hurricane Sandy victims were going to areas of New Jersey that weren't particularly impacted by the storm. By March of this year, pockets of hecklers from New Jersey were starting to dog Christie on the trail in Iowa. Had he not stood for re-election, he would not be having to answer for a year and a half of impatience and disaffection.

In November of 2014 he vetoed a bill that would have banned the use of gestation crates in New Jersey. It passed both houses easily, and 9 out of 10 New Jersey voters wanted Christie to sign it. The implication was that Christie wanted to be seen as supporting the status quo on agriculture in Iowa, where the hog industry is worth $7 billion. Had he stepped down as Governor a year earlier, he would not have had to give the impression he was putting his national ambitions before his constituents.

Then there was the settlement, in March this year, with Exxon. The state Senate passed a resolution condemning the deal, which settled Exxon's liability for pollution at two refinery sites for $225 million. The figure caused an uproar because the state's lawyers had been seeking as much as $8.9 billion at trial. If Christie had left this to a successor, he would not have taken flak for it.

Christie had already endured several credit downgrades under his watch. Nearly a year after his re-election, however, things got far worse, with a cumulative effect that has impacted severely on his image of competence. New Jersey was downgraded by Fitch, then a month later by Standard and Poor's, then again, in April this year, by Moody's. If he hadn't run for re-election, his fiscal reputation - a key factor in a presidential run - would not be severely compromised.

His high polling numbers from early 2013, the moment he would have stepped down from office had he not run for re-election, have since flipped upside-down, with polling this month showing him 27% favorable and 55% unfavorable. A Fairleigh-Dickinson Public Mind poll released last month had him with an approval rating of 30%.

In terms of his presidential ambitions, Christie has gained almost nothing from his second term. Rather, it has left him compromised, it has lowered his stocks, and forced him into a difficult and often unsuccessful balancing act, trying to make an impression in Iowa and New Hampshire, without giving his constituents the impression his attention is divided. Had he not run, he could be dictating the degree of public exposure, working full time on donors and organization, be relatively scandal free, and be positioning himself as a nominee with the vigor and effectiveness of Kasich or Walker, but with the national profile and mainstream appeal of Bush. Instead, he is languishing, both as a Governor, and in early Republican presidential polling.

Christie: No special way illegal immigrants to get US citizenship // Breitbart // Charlie Sperling – July 20, 2015

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie denounced the idea of special treatment for illegal immigrants who are currently living in the United States, accusing Hillary Clinton of “pandering” to them just to get votes.

“There should be no special way for anybody to be able to get citizenship any different than any other foreigner,” he said during an interview on CNN’s New Day this morning.

Christie suggested that Clinton was going out of her way to promise citizenship for illegal immigrants to win the support of more American Hispanics.

“I think, you know, Secretary Clinton talks about path to citizenship for people who are here illegally – she’s just pandering,” he said.

Christie distanced himself from comments he made in 2010 encouraging members of Congress and President Obama to find a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants.

He explained in the years since his comments, he understood as Governor of New Jersey that the first priority for illegal immigrants was work, not citizenship.

He argued that there should be stiffer prosecution for businesses who were profiting by exploiting illegal laborers.

"Those people need to be penalized for that," he said. "And that will be the way to stop the flow from wherever they're coming from – south of the border or elsewhere, into this country illegally."

PERRY

On Military Service and on Border Security, Trump Offers Only Hot Air // National Review // Rick Perry – July 20, 2015

Being president of the United States is serious business, not a reality TV show.

This is especially true for the next president, who will have a big job ahead after the failures of the Obama administration. Our challenges are too complex — and the future of our country too important — to let egos, inflated rhetoric, and emotion take the place of thoughtful discussion.

I made the case recently for why GOP policies are the best to create opportunity across the country for families of all backgrounds. I've held up my home state's reforms in economic, education, and sentencing policies as examples of conservative governance that have made life better for minorities in Texas compared with other places around the country. And I've been honest about our party's shortcomings — including my own — in engaging all Americans in our conversations about the future of this nation.

But we can't do that if we're pitting black against white against brown; rich against poor; women against men. Playing identity politics takes a page right out of the Democrats' playbook, and we Republicans are better than that.

That's why rhetoric such as the kind employed by Donald Trump is damaging — it's damaging to our party, and most important, damaging to the United States of America. I believe strongly that Mr. Trump's philosophy is not conservatism, but rather a toxic mix of demagoguery and nonsense.

Mr. Trump's absurdity reached a new low over the weekend, when he spit in the eye of every American prisoner of war, particularly Senator John McCain. But frankly, we should expect no better from a man who couldn't be bothered to answer the call to serve his nation when it needed him most.

Mr. Trump's absurdity reached a new low over the weekend, when he spit in the eye of every American prisoner of war, particularly Senator John McCain.

As a veteran and the son of a veteran, I find Mr. Trump's brand of vitriol particularly offensive, and I have no confidence that he could adeptly lead our nation's armed forces. His comments over the weekend should completely and immediately disqualify him from seeking our nation's highest office.

Our nation's warriors have been let down and left behind by the bureaucratic bungling of the Veterans Administration. They deserve a leader who will stand up for them, not one who ridicules the deadly circumstances they willingly put themselves in when they volunteer to protect our nation.

Then there is the issue of border security — a challenge Mr. Trump claims to have single-handedly identified and suddenly become expert in. But Mr. Trump's ridiculous and irresponsible assertion that Texas has not done enough to secure the border betrays his fundamental misunderstanding of this issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And even though Mr. Trump may spend a lot of time talking about border security today, his interest doesn't predate his entrance in the presidential field. We heard no outcry from Mr. Trump when Jocelyn Johnson's husband, Rodney, was gunned down in 2006 in a sanctuary city by an individual who had previously been deported. Mr. Trump was similarly silent last summer, when we saw an unprecedented flood of unaccompanied children crossing the border because of President Obama's dangerous amnesty policies. Likewise last year, not a word from Mr. Trump when Border Patrol agent Javier Vega Jr. was shot and killed in front of his wife, two children, and parents by — again — individuals who had been arrested and deported multiple times.

If Mr. Trump plans to "tell it like it is," then he should tell the facts. Border security is a federal responsibility. Period. But when it became clear that Washington, D.C., wouldn't act, I told President Obama that if he didn't secure the border, Texas would.

As the former governor of Texas, a state with a 1,200-mile border with Mexico, I had to live and govern under the shadow of the federal government's decades-long failure to secure our borders. And rather than sit idly by while Washington, D.C., left our communities vulnerable to a porous border, I acted.

During my time in office, I oversaw the dedication of nearly $1 billion to border-security efforts. I've overseen surge operations with our state law enforcement, the creation of Texas Ranger Recon teams, and I even deployed the Texas National Guard to the border region last summer. I signed a bill strengthening penalties for those who engage in human trafficking — a bipartisan effort to put an end to the scourge of a modern-day slave trade that is enabled by our unsecured border.

I also signed an executive order mandating the use of E-Verify for all state employees and contractors. By doing this, we ensured that people like Mr. Trump — who has a history of using illegal-immigrant labor for his construction projects (including his new hotel currently under construction in Washington, D.C.) — do not use taxpayer resources on illegal-immigrant labor.

That is real, tangible action. Make no mistake: Contrary to what Mr. Trump seems to believe, Texas never should have had to do any of this, but we stepped in when the federal government failed.

When it comes down to it, Mr. Trump and President Obama have similar records on border security. Neither seems to understand that it's the federal government's responsibility to secure our borders. Neither has taken the time to visit the border. Neither has paid any attention to the issue until it's become politically convenient. And most significantly, neither has put forward any thoughtful solutions to secure the border.

Rather than thanking Texas for stepping into a gap it shouldn't have to fill, Mr. Trump has made clear that he believes the states should fend for themselves on border security. Rather than praising the men and women of the Texas Department of Public Safety, Texas National Guard, and Texas game wardens, Mr. Trump ridicules their tireless work to protect our communities. Not only is this wrong, but it perpetuates the same failed policies that have left our southern border porous and vulnerable.

As I've said before, this will be a "show me, don't tell me" election. Our nation needs a thoughtful, experienced leader with the character, resolve, and will to rebuild what this nation has lost over the past six years.

Mr. Trump has done nothing to prove that he is the man for the job.

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham and Friends Join to Denounce Iran Deal // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Surrounded by two of the “three amigos” — as former Gen. David H. Petraeus called them — Senator Lindsey Graham appeared with Senator John McCain and former Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in New York on Monday to denounce the deal to contain Iran’s nuclear program.

Mr. Graham, a Republican presidential hopeful from South Carolina who is one of the most hawkish voices in his party, repeatedly invoked the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, just over three miles from the Women’s National Republican Club in Midtown Manhattan, where the “No Nukes for Iran” forum was held.

“My friends, what we will see is a nuclearized Middle East,” said Mr. Graham of the deal’s implications, arguing it would extend well beyond Iran. “They view New York as a symbol of America. This is the place they would choose to hit us again if they could.”

He mentioned Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic presidential contender and former senator from New York, and used a well-worn line that she “could have gotten a better deal than this.” The crowd of mostly older voters greeted the line with silence.

“To the American people, I will do everything I can to make sure that there is never another 9/11,” Mr. Graham said of the attacks that killed more than 3,000 people. Referring to the terrorists who carried out that attack, he said: “They could not get the weapons to kill three million of us. If they could, they would.”

Lindsey Graham: Donald Trump is a ‘jackass’ // Politico // Eliza Collins – July 20, 2015

Sen. Lindsey Graham thinks real-estate mogul Donald Trump is a “jackass” and his comments about Sen. John McCain were the beginning of the end of his candidacy.

“He’s bringing his name down and he’s not helping the process and he shouldn’t be commander in chief,” Graham said.

The South Carolina senator was speaking on CNN’s “Out Front” on Monday, responding to Trump’s Saturday comment that McCain was not an American hero because he was taken prisoner by North Vietnamese forces.

“He’s not a war hero,” said Trump. “He was a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren’t captured.”

Graham called Trump’s comments out of sync with the Republican Party, which he called “the party of the military.”

He also bemoaned the media’s focus on Trump instead of national security issues, which Graham has made the main focus of his long-shot presidential run.

“The world is literally falling apart … and all we're talking about is Donald Trump,” Graham said.

A spokesman for Trump said on CNN that Graham’s comments were a political move by someone who is floundering in the polls.

Lindsey Graham and his Two Amigos Kick Off 'No Nukes for Iran' Tour // Bloomberg // Emily Greenhouse –

July 20, 2015

The amigos are back for a sequel.

For more than ten years, Senators Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, John McCain of Arizona, and Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut traveled together —from Iraq to Afghanistan, Germany to Bhutan. Dubbed the "three amigos" by General David Patreaus, together they helped shape American foreign policy, and on Monday they reunited to try and do so again.

Graham, who now is running for president, brought along Lieberman (who is no longer in Congress), and McCain, two hawkish confrères who both have had their time on national tickets, to help bolster his own bid and quash President Obama's deal with Iran.

“Do you think these four hostages would still be in Iran if Ronald Reagan we're president?”

Sitting between his two old friends beneath gold curtains and crystal chandeliers, a sign behind the amigos declared "No Nukes for Iran," the name of a multi-state tour headlined by the Republican candidate.

Graham articulated his strong objection to the deal made by world leaders last week in Vienna that would grant Tehran relief from international sanctions in exchange for Iran’s curbing its nuclear program. “I believe with all my heart and soul that Iran wants a nuclear weapon—a nuclear power plant—and that they’ll get them if somebody doesn’t stop them,” the South Carolina senator said. “The last line of defense is the United States Congress and the power of the next president to protect us and the world at large.”

He was speaking in the ballroom of Manhattan’s Women’s National Republican Club, whose grand staircase features a vaguely seductive portrait of woman labeled only “Mrs. Ronald Reagan.”

The stated aim of Graham’s tour, which will last for sixty days, is to urge members of Congress to vote against a “bad deal” by a president he has called “incompetent.” (Congress has a 60-day period to review the deal before it comes to a vote.) Of course, the national exposure can’t hurt his long-shot quest to win his party's presidential nomination.

The tour will take him to states including Minnesota, Massachusetts, Indiana, Colorado, Florida, Pennsylvania, and Nevada. But Graham launched it in New York, he told his enthusiastic audience, because it is “the most diverse city on the planet,” a city that “represents America.” Graham also conjured the terrorist attacks on 9/11, saying, “this is the place they would choose to hit us if they could.”

Graham stressed that he did not want to see war, and he reiterated a belief that he has stated before, that, were she president, Hillary Rodham Clinton could have struck up a better deal. (“I want to say something bipartisan,” he prefaced.) He also spoke positively of the strength and vigor of Senator Chuck Schumer, a Democrat of New York.

But also Graham reminded the audience that this year marked the anniversary of the end of World War II, and portrayed Obama's deal as a threat to the Jewish state of Israel. “Seventy years ago this year we liberated the camps,” he said, adding, “To our friends in Israel, I join you in saying never again. To the American people I say, I will make sure that there is never another 9/11.” Later, he warned, “Don't put Israel in this box. Don't make it feel that she—that Israel—has to go it alone.”

An observant Jew, Lieberman is himself a major proponent of Israel, and called the vote on whether to approve the Iran deal “the most important opinion that any member of congress will ever cast.”

“This is a mortal threat to our values,” Lieberman argued.

Both Graham and Lieberman also took jabs at real estate magnate Donald Trump over his ongoing feud with McCain over the question of the latter's heroism as a prisoner of war in Vietnam. “Anybody that suggests that John McCain and his fellow prisoners of war are somehow lacking in the title of being called ‘American hero,’ you shouldn’t be our commander-in-chief because you don’t know our military,” Graham said.

Referring to Trump by name, Lieberman called his remarks “un-American,” as McCain looked down modestly as the crowd clapped.

This was a way to defend their friend, but also for one candidate to criticize a rival. The campaigning continued when both Lieberman and McCain articulated what a good president Graham might be, and then both exited and left the stage to their friend to answer questions.

During the Q & A, Graham repeatedly spoke of the need for a president who could “leverage to get a better deal.”

“Do you think these four hostages would still be in Iran if Ronald Reagan we're president?” Graham asked.

And then, with barely a pause, he answered, “I don't think so either.”

Lindsey Graham wages war against Iran deal // MSNBC // Amanda Sakuma – July 20, 2015

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham is building on his long-shot Republican presidential campaign to pressure Congress to reject the historic nuclear deal between world leaders and Iran.

Appearing alongside Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Independent Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut during a town hall event in New York, the Graham said he hopes to see the American public voice opposition to the agreement.

“I believe with all my heart and soul that Iran wants a nuclear weapon – a nuclear power plant – and that they’ll get them if somebody doesn’t stop them,” Graham said. “The last line of defense is the United States Congress and the power of the next president to protect us and the world at large.”

World leaders struck the historic deal in Vienna last week, culminating years of negotiations that will ultimately require Iran to scale its nuclear program in exchange for harsh economic sanctions on the country being lifted.

The event was a part of a national tour — spanning Indiana, Colorado, Florida, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Nevada, Minnesota, and others — for Graham to campaign on his reputation as a foreign policy hawk and gin up public support against the deal.

Americans broadly approve a nuclear deal with Iran by a 2-to-1 margin, according to the latest poll conducted last month by NBC News/Wall Street Journal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A number of Republicans in Congress, however, remain skeptical of the deal's details and question whether Iran will hold up its end of the bargain. Congress has a 60-day period to review the agreement and ultimately vote on whether to accept the terms.

"How this debate ends and how this vote goes is very much in the air," Graham said. "I would say there is a better than 50-50 chance that we can reject the deal with the understanding that the next president will have power to negotiate a better deal."

In a rare show of bipartisan praise in the midst of a presidential election season, Graham tipped his hat to Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton, saying the former secretary of state could have negotiated better than her successor. "I think Hillary Clinton could have gotten a better deal than this," Graham said.

Despite his prominent national profile in Congress, Graham has fallen behind the pack in a several national polls. But he opened the event by taking aim at the unlikely Republican leading the pack: billionaire and real estate mogul Donald Trump.

Trump made personal attacks against McCain during a Republican cattle call event in Iowa over the weekend, saying repeatedly that the Arizona senator was "not a war hero" despite being captured and tortured during the Vietnam War. McCain responded during an exclusive interview on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" by saying the real estate mogul owes an apology to military families affected by captivity during conflict. At Monday's event, Graham defended his friend and Senate colleague, declining to name names. "If anybody that suggests that John McCain and his fellow POWs are somehow lacking in the title of being called 'American hero,' you shouldn't be our commander-in-chief because you don't know our military," Graham said.

GOP presidential candidate warns of another attack on New York City if the Iran deal goes through //
Business Insider // Maxwell Tani – July 20, 2015

US Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-South Carolina) is warning that world powers' nuclear deal with Iran could lead to another attack on the United States.

Speaking at an event in New York City on Monday, Graham cautioned of the dangers of the recently announced nuclear deal with Iran. Graham, a GOP presidential candidate, ended his remarks with a stark alert for New Yorkers.

"Where do you think they'd like to come most outside of Washington? Right where we're sitting," Graham said.

"New York City represents America. This is the place that they'd choose to hit us again if they could," Graham added.

Flanked by Sen. John McCain (R-Arizona) and former Sen Joe Lieberman (D-Connecticut), Graham struck an almost-apocalyptic tone when discussing the deal. He frequently drew parallels between Iranian Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei and Adolf Hitler, claiming that the deal posed an enormous threat to Israel and to the US and that it would lead to a nuclear-arms race in the Middle East.

"A yes vote takes all the leverage off the table, locks in the deal, and makes a conflict in the Middle East much more likely," Graham said. "... The Sunni Arabs are not going to sit on the sidelines and wait for the Iranian Shiite Persians to get a nuclear weapon."

Though the Republican presidential field is universally opposed to the deal, Graham — who is currently one of the lowest candidates in the polls — is making his opposition to the Iranian deal a bigger part of his campaign. He is planning a slew of stops over the next 60 days — or until Congress votes on the deal — on a "no nukes for Iran" tour.

Speaking to reporters after the town hall on Monday, Graham said that he agreed with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's (R) comments that it is "very possible" that a new president would be forced to take military action against Iran on the first day of his or her presidency.

"The military option should be on the table for any president, at any time because the consequences of a nuclear breakout for Iran are just enormous to our national security," Graham told Business Insider in response to questions about Walker's comments.

Both Graham and Walker are taking much more hard-line stances than Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), who said over the weekend that it would be naive not to consult with allies and key Cabinet members appointed and confirmed before proceeding to possible military options on Iran.

At the even on Monday, Graham took a dig at one of his rivals: Sen. Rand Paul (R-Kentucky).

"I'm going to say something bipartisan: Hillary Clinton could've done a better deal than this," Graham said, who later repeated the phrase and added that "almost anybody could have, except maybe Rand Paul."

Graham rattled off numerous provisions in the deal that he found dangerous, including the eventual end of an arms embargo on Iran and the need for inspectors to give Iran 24 days' notice before inspecting at certain nuclear cites.

"Do you mind if we come by in three weeks?" Graham asked sarcastically.

Graham said that his goal for now is to rally support for Democratic members of Congress who appear to be hesitant to endorse the deal, at least for now. The South Carolina senator pleaded with traditional Israeli allies in the Democratic caucus — including Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-New York) and Sen. Bob Menendez (D-New Jersey) — to rally Democrats to oppose the deal.

Opponents need to meet at key 67-senator threshold to overcome a likely presidential veto if they vote down the deal. If they cannot get two-thirds of the House and the Senate to overturn the president's veto, the deal will automatically go through.

“The last line of defense is the United States Congress and the power of the next president to protect us and the world at large,” Graham said.

Though he admitted that Republicans do not have the votes yet, Graham remained optimistic that he could convince his Senate colleagues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think we could get there," Graham said.

The South Carolina senator said that his solution would be to start over on a new deal, without ending the arms embargo and with an "anytime, anywhere" mandate for inspection. Graham said he'd punish any Russian, French, and German company that sold arms to Iran.

"A better deal could be easily had only with leverage," Graham said. "If you vote no to this deal, you're giving the next president leverage to get a better deal."

SANTORUM

'They Are So Afraid': Santorum Says GOP Leadership Botching Planned Parenthood Response // Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – July 20, 2015

Rick Santorum is accusing the Republican congressional leadership of failing to adequately respond to the video of a Planned Parenthood employee discussing how fetal body parts are sold after abortions.

“This is why I sort of scratch my head at our leadership,” the Republican presidential candidate said Monday during a conversation with several reporters at a Capitol Hill restaurant. “Because they are so afraid of these issues.”

Speaker of the House John Boehner called for congressional hearings into the matter last week, but Santorum argues Congress should be moving faster to go after Planned Parenthood. Legislation targeting the organization should have already been voted on, he said.

“I would have had a vote on the floor of the Senate, if I was the Senate leader, to defund Planned Parenthood and have a debate on it,” he said. “As well as have hearings to see if there’s any criminal activity or criminal investigation that should pursued.”

Santorum, a former senator from Pennsylvania, suggested Republican leaders are pressured by some in the party not to emphasize pro-life issues, worried about the politics of it.

“You have a group of members and a group of donors who will climb down your throat if they do,” he said. “They just want to avoid these issues at all cost.”

“I don’t understand it,” Santorum added. “I don’t understand why we can’t point out the dehumanization that’s going on in this country. Because that’s what it is. It’s dehumanization.”

Santorum said Republicans are missing a big opportunity to go on offense against the pro-abortion lobby.

“For me, it’s an opportunity to expose the cruelty of abortion, as well as the hypocrisy of the people who are denying the reality of what occurs during abortion,” he said.

Also during Monday’s discussion, Santorum was asked about rival presidential candidate Donald Trump and the situation he finds himself in over his negative comments about Arizona Sen. John McCain’s service during Vietnam.

But Santorum said it was actually something else Trump said in Iowa over the weekend that has evangelicals suspicious of the businessman.

While discussing his Christian faith Saturday, Trump said he is religious but gave an awkward answer when asked if he's ever asked for forgiveness from God. "I am not sure I have. I just go on and try to do a better job from there," Trump said.

Santorum, who was also in Iowa last weekend, said he went to a church the next day in Oskaloosa, where a pastor expressed concern over Trump's comments.

The senator didn't directly criticize Trump directly over his statements on his faith.

"People have their own relationship with the Lord…I'm not judging anybody on their own faith walk," he said.

But Santorum contrasted himself with Trump. "My faith walk is very different," he said. "I apologize continually throughout the day — ask forgiveness for some of the things I think and occasionally some of the things I say and do."

With all the attention on Trump, Santorum said he tries not to take the bait from the media to dump all over him. When he disagrees with a rival, Santorum says he tries to be "critical of what they say" but not be "critical of the person."

"It provides fodder to the other side, and you're playing to the press….The media wants blood out of Republicans," he said.

Santorum considers breaking up big banks // Washington Examiner // Ariel Cohen – July 20, 2015

A presidential candidate criticized big banks and Wall Street Monday, but it wasn't Bernie Sanders or any of the other Democrats.

Republican White House hopeful Rick Santorum said that he has "real concerns about too big to fail," while speaking with reporters in Washington, D.C.

"I have real concerns about the size of the banks and think that while I've looked at various ideas as how to break up these financial institutions, I would certainly be open to ideas that would reduce systemic risk," Santorum said.

In contrast with what he sees as a the big-government solutions of Sanders, Hillary Clinton and Martin O'Malley, Santorum proposed that the federal government could create regulations and laws that would lead to banks deciding on their own terms to break up.

O'Malley has made reforming Wall Street a key component of his platform, often stating that those responsible for the 2008 fiscal crash on Wall Street are "criminals." Sanders has repeatedly called for the re-installation of Glass-Steagall. Clinton has said "too big to fail is too big."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Santorum is one conservative Republican who hasn't ducked these issues, though he doesn't agree with everything Washington has done in the name of regulating Wall Street.

"I would be more oriented towards clearly Dodd Frank is a disaster and needs to be redone," Santorum said. "The institutionalization of too big to fail is something that has to be unwound, including unwinding some of these large institutions."

Santorum: Repeal Obamacare, Defund Planned Parenthood // Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – July 20, 2015

Rick Santorum is keeping expectations low for his second presidential campaign. Asked if he would need to win the Iowa caucuses to stay in the race, the former senator said it “depends.”

“If I finish third and half a percent behind first, I think I feel pretty good. If I finish third and I’m ten points out, well, that’s a different story,” he told a small group of reporters in a Washington restaurant Monday afternoon.

That’s quite an admission from Santorum, who actually won the 2012 Iowa caucuses by a razor-thin margin over Mitt Romney. Initial media reports were that Romney had won, and it took 18 days before the state of Iowa confirmed Santorum’s victory, and the bounce he might have received from winning on caucus day didn’t quite materialize. Even so, he would go on to win ten more states to place second to Romney. On paper, that record might suggest Santorum would have been an obvious “next in line” candidate for 2016.

But so far, the Pennsylvania Republican’s been more of an afterthought. According to the Real Clear Politics average of national polls, he’s at two percent support. It’s nowhere close to a sure thing Santorum will make it into the top-ten pool for the first Fox News debate August 6. (He called the Republican National Committee’s debate requirements “arbitrary.”) And in Iowa, the state that kept Santorum alive for the long haul in 2012, he’s polling at an average of 4.3 points, putting him in ninth place.

Meanwhile, Santorum, who served two terms in the U.S. House and two in the Senate before losing his seat in 2006, is resolute about his chances in 2016. “We’re in this thing to win it. If I didn’t think I could win it I wouldn’t run,” he said.

For the Iowa voters he’s met this time around, Santorum says there are some differences in what issues these Republicans are concerned about. They’re more interested in talking about national security and immigration than they were in 2012. There’s less anxiety, too, about health care, and he said many Republicans are “convinced that they’re stuck with Obamacare.”

“They’re not,” Santorum said. “You give me 50 United States senators and a Republican House, and we can de facto repeal Obamacare through reconciliation. Take all the money out and make it impotent. And then replace it with a plan that provides federal support for everybody to be able to go out and get the plan they want. And then put patients and doctors back in charge of the health-care system. That’s the answer.”

A staunch opponent of abortion—he was the chief Senate sponsor of the partial-birth abortion ban—Santorum was critical of the response from congressional leadership of a recent video showing a high-ranking Planned Parenthood official casually discussing the selling of body parts from aborted infants. House speaker John Boehner has called for committee-led investigations into the organization, but Santorum says the Republican Congress should have already voted to strip Planned Parenthood of its federal funding.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is why I sort of scratch my head at our leadership. They are so afraid about these issues that even when you have an issue that is probably an 80 to 90 percent issue in America, they won't talk about that, because you have a group of members, a group of donors, who will climb down your throat if you do. And they just want to avoid these issues at all costs. They don't recognize that these issues don't go away. They don't go away, and they're important to people," he said.

Santorum has called on the GOP to adopt a more populist agenda on economics, even writing a book in 2013 called Blue Collar Conservatives. I asked him how healthy blue-collar conservatism is in the party. "I think you see more Republicans sound like me," Santorum said. "Four years ago, if you think about it, was there anyone else in the race that really had a focus on a populist economic message, on workers, and being more critical of corporate America?"

There wasn't. This time there are, with candidates like Scott Walker, Mike Huckabee, Carly Fiorina, Ted Cruz, and Donald Trump all sounding a populist tone on some or many issues: trade, immigration, corporate welfare, entitlements, and government bureaucracy. Santorum's 2012 run may have helped give populism a new lease on life within the Republican party. But so far, that lease hasn't been extended to Santorum himself.

Huckabee campaign video comments on racial tension, America has a 'sin not skin' problem // Breitbart // Alex Swoler – July 20, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Gov. Mike Huckabee released a new online ad titled "Sin Not Skin,making its first debut with Breitbart News.

The paid online campaign ad began running in Iowa and South Carolina. It features Huckabee's remarks on racial tension while he spoke at the Family Leader Summit in Ames, Iowa on Saturday.

The transcript of the ad is as follows:

We don't have a skin problem in America, we have a sin problem in America. That is the root and the heart and the cause of racial strife and it cannot be reconciled by the government stepping in and making pronouncements. There is a prescription…2nd Chronicles 7:14….'If My people, who are called by My name, will humble themselves and pray, and seek My face and turn from their wicked ways' – those are the conditions – then He says 'He will hear from Heaven, He will forgive our sins, and He will heal our land.' I think people forget God will heal this land, but He won't do it if we don't meet the conditions for Him to heal it.

Huckabee gave similar remarks when he appeared at an Africa American Church in South Carolina on Sunday.

The video is part of push by the Huckabee campaign to engage African American voters. Huckabee won roughly 48 percent of the black vote in Arkansas, a CNN exit poll suggests.

Jindal: Obama quick to push gun control after Charleston massacre, silent on radical Islam after Tennessee terror attack // Breitbart – July 20, 2015

On Breitbart News Saturday, Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal slammed President Barack Obama for reflexively politicizing the tragic Charleston massacre to push for more gun control while remaining silent about radical Islamic terrorism after Muhammad Youssuf Abdulazeez murdered five servicemen in Tennessee last week.

“You remember after the horrific shooting in Charleston, this president had no problems going out quickly and saying, well here’s an opportunity to talk about gun control… within 24 hours,” Jindal told host and Breitbart News Editor-in-Chief Alex Marlow on Sirius XM Patriot channel 125. “When we see these attacks in Fort Hood, when we see these attacks in Garland, Texas, when we see these attacks in Tennessee, where’s the same clarity in going after radical Islamic terrorism?”

The 2016 GOP presidential candidate said Obama’s reaction to “this terrorist attack” was “disheartening,” especially because “everyday Americans get it–we’re at war with radical Islamic terrorism.’

“I wish we had a Commander-in-Chief who was honest enough to tell us that,” Jindal said, adding that “you have to be deaf, blind, and dumb to ignore what everything that we know is telling us.”

Jindal noted that the Obama administration is “still calling Fort Hood” an act of “workplace violence,” which he said was “nonsense.” He said if you “look at what happened in Garland, Texas… it is clear that Islam has a problem, and that problem is radical Islam.”

“It is clear these terrorists want to bring this fight to us. They’re not content to stay in Syria and Iraq. It’s clear that leading from behind has not worked,” Jindal said. “The reality is that we are at war with them, they are at war with us… whether our president wants to admit it or not.”

Jindal, who issued an executive order on Friday to arm National Guardsmen at military facilities in his state, said “it is ridiculous” that military personnel are not armed because “it’s like sending a fireman without a hose.”

“Why are we creating a gun-free zone where the terrorists are armed?” he asked. “I am glad law enforcement did have a gun–they were able to kill this terrorist.”

Jindal challenged Obama to have the moral clarity to demand from Muslim critics to say that those committing heinous acts of terror are going “straight to hell” instead of being martyrs who are rewarded in the afterlife. As he has been doing on the campaign trail, Jindal pressed Islamic leaders to also “explicitly embrace the same freedoms for others with different religious and political beliefs from themselves that they demand if they want those freedoms for themselves.” Jindal stressed that Americans cannot allow radical Islamists to “use our freedoms to undermine the freedoms of other people.” Jindal said he may be labelled a “racist” or “anti-Muslim” for his views by the left, but insisted that Americans are just getting “sick and tired” of having to be politically correct on terrorism.

He criticized Obama for not having a clear strategy to defeat Islamic terrorism and pointed out that Obama first said Al Qaeda had been defeated, then said ISIS was a “JV team,” then said he did not have a long-term strategy to confront radical Islam before finally saying that “it’s a generational conflict.” Jindal said the Obama administration needs “to take the political handcuffs off the military” in the fight against radical Islam.

“I don’t want our military in a fair fight,” he said. “I want our military to dominate any potential fight.”

After the Tennessee massacre, Jindal led a nearly two-minute prayer before a campaign event in Iowa, and Jindal reflected on that moment, saying it was “a tough day for every American” and he was praying for the “resilience and resolve to take on evil.”

"It was like a member of our own family had died. Without praying for their families," Jindal said. "I want God to comfort and bring the peace and the love and grace that only He can bring to the parents, siblings, children, spouses that lost a loved one. These are amazing men and women that put on the nation's uniform and run towards danger not away from it so we can be safe".

Bobby Jindal: An abortion "patient" is the "unborn baby," not the woman having the abortion // Salon // Jenny Krutner – July 20, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful and Lousiana Gov. Bobby Jindal quickly outed himself last week as someone who buys into the claims of a heavily edited anti-Planned Parenthood video that began circulating last week, which accuses the organization of illegally selling donated fetal tissue (known to some conservatives as "baby parts").

Speaking with talk radio host Steve Deace on Friday, Jindal — who launched an investigation of his state's Planned Parenthood affiliates after the video was released — called once again for Congress to defund the healthcare provider (which, don't you worry, it's already tried/trying to do). He also tossed in a very bizarre conception of how abortion (a medical procedure involving a patient) goes down.

"They try to defend themselves by saying this is health care and patient-centered," Jindal said. "Abortions are not health care, and this is not about the patient. The patient in this case is that unborn baby. They've got no concern for the unborn baby, and you can see that in the video."

The GOP presidential candidate went on to say there is "no reason" for taxpayers to continue to fund or support Planned Parenthood — because surely all those other services the organization provides, such as cancer screenings and contraception, aren't worth keeping around.

indal talks family, religion, government at Madison County Fair // The Des Moines Register // Katherine Klingseis – July 20, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal used a few family stories to illustrate his plans for America at a presidential campaign stop at the Madison County Fair on Sunday.

"My parents, they have chased, they have caught, they have lived the American dream," Jindal said. "I want my children and one day my grandchildren to be able to live the American dream. That's really what this election is about."

Jindal and his wife, Supriya Jolly, mingled with fairgoers at the event's GOP booth. Jindal gave a brief speech and had a question-and-answer session with the crowd.

During his speech, Jindal hit on his campaign's four objectives: securing America's borders, replacing Obamacare, rebuilding America's defenses and restoring the country's standing in the world, and shrinking the government. The crowd of about 30 people clapped after each talking point Jindal listed.

"We're going to shrink the size of the government and actually grow the private sector for our economy so our kids can join the middle class by getting an education, by getting a good-paying job," Jindal said.

Jindal told attendees stories about his wife and their three children. In one of these stories, Jindal used his son's frustration with some math homework to illustrate what he says are the flaws of the Common Core State Standards Initiative.

Jindal also discussed his support of religious freedom. He told the crowd he is against abortion and he believes marriage should be between one man and one woman.

The Madison County Fair stop came a day after Jindal received multiple standing ovations while speaking at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames. Jindal told The Register that the crowd's reaction echoed the response his campaign has received at town hall meetings.

"I think the reason our message resonates is people see I've got a proven track record in Louisiana of shrinking the government, fighting for religious liberty and we are unafraid to stand up to save the American dream for our children and grandchildren," Jindal said Sunday.

TRUMP

Veterans' Groups Take Their Shots at Donald Trump as He Backs Off a Bit on McCain // NYT // Jeremy Peters – July 20, 2015

Of the many offenses Senator John McCain has committed in the eyes of his most ardent conservative critics — supporting an immigration overhaul, for example, or more recently calling some of them "crazies" — a poor record on veterans' issues is not one that has ever come up.

That left Donald J. Trump with few defenders after the attacks he leveled at Mr. McCain over the weekend, and facing a barrage of condemnation himself on Monday over his own commitment to veterans' causes as well as the propriety of attacking a former prisoner of war who is honored as a hero.

Mr. Trump, a businessman who is running an outsider's campaign for the Republican nomination for president, first said that Mr. McCain was "not a war hero" because he was captured after bailing out of his Navy jet during the Vietnam War. Then he said that as a senator Mr. McCain had failed to lead on military and veterans' issues, while he has championed their cause.

Mr. Trump did soften his words somewhat late on Monday when he told Bill O'Reilly of Fox News that he has respect for Mr. McCain and said, "Certainly if there was a misunderstanding, I would totally take that back."

What Donald Trump Would Need to Do to Win

But veterans' groups said Mr. Trump was in no position to criticize anyone, and denied that he is the longtime ally he claims to be.

"Donald Trump is not a leader in veterans' philanthropy, unless he's donated a lot of money that nobody knows about," said Paul Rieckhoff, founder and chief executive of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America. "We were founded in New York. We are headquartered in New York. I've been here 10 years, and I don't think I've ever even seen Donald Trump."

Mr. Trump's attacks were all the more misguided, veterans' advocates said, because Mr. McCain has an extensive record of being helpful and involved. He has played a leading role in passing numerous pieces of legislation that aim to improve veterans' health care.

In just the last year, Mr. McCain was a key player in negotiations with Senator Bernie Sanders, a Vermont independent who was then chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee, to pass a broad-based overhaul of the Department of Veterans Affairs after the disclosure that staff members had been manipulating wait times to make it appear that patients were receiving care faster than they were.

Mr. McCain was also a lead sponsor of the Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act — one of the first pieces of legislation that became law after Republicans took over Congress this year.

Mr. McCain's office said Monday that it was currently processing 600 veterans-related cases and had dedicated five of its 10 case workers to working on Veterans Affairs complaints full time.

For his part, Mr. McCain, who is now chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, demurred on Monday when asked if Mr. Trump should apologize to him. Rather, he said, Mr. Trump should apologize to the men and women who have been captured in war and whose service Mr. Trump appeared to belittle.

"I think he may owe an apology to the families and those that have sacrificed in conflict and those who have undergone the prison experience in serving their country," a reserved Mr. McCain said in his first comments on the matter on the MSNBC program "Morning Joe."

"There are so many men and some women who have served and sacrificed who happened to have been held prisoner — to denigrate that service I think is offensive to most of our veterans," Mr. McCain added.

Mr. McCain's friend Senator Lindsey Graham, who is also seeking the Republican presidential nomination, was more direct. "To anybody who suggests that John and his fellow P.O.W.s are somehow lacking in the title of being called American hero, you shouldn't be our commander in chief because you don't know our military," he said without mentioning Mr. Trump's name.

Why Mr. Trump would single out veterans' issues and Vietnam as a line of attack — when his own record on the subject is not extensively documented, and he avoided serving in Vietnam by receiving a medical deferment — is unclear. Mr. Trump and his campaign advisers have pointed to a few examples of Mr. Trump's advocacy decades ago, including his donation of over $1 million to build a Vietnam veterans memorial in New York in the 1980s and his underwriting of a parade honoring veterans in 1995.

Writing in USA Today, Mr. Trump said on Monday, "It was one of the biggest parades in the history of New York City, and I was very proud to have made it possible."

His campaign also noted that he had put on various benefits for organizations like the Wounded Warriors Project and had hosted active-duty soldiers and veterans at his golf courses.

But a review of publicly available records of Mr. Trump's charitable contributions shows that relatively little of his money has gone to programs that support veterans. While he has donated millions of dollars to charities like the United Way and the American Heart Association, records show that he gave at least $20,000 and possibly as much as $50,000 to the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund in 2003 and 2004. He donated in later years for unspecified amounts.

Even some of Mr. Trump's allies said that they would not quibble with Mr. McCain's record. "Don't get me wrong, I think John McCain is strong on veterans' issues," said Joel Arends, chairman of Veterans for a Strong America, which defended Mr. Trump over the weekend in a statement that his campaign issued in a news release.

"The problem is not John McCain's record. The problem is how do we run government and is government going to be responsive to men and women who've laid their lives on the line for this country," Mr. Arends said, adding that he believed Mr. Trump had hit a nerve by identifying the inefficiencies and breakdowns in veterans' services.

Some advocates said they were hoping that the glare of media attention that Mr. Trump has turned on them would be of benefit. "I've gotten more media calls today than I probably have in the last 11 years," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "But this is a bigger conversation than whether or not Trump said something stupid."

Donald Trump Continues to Have Strong Support in Iowa // NYT // Alan Rappeport – July 20, 2015

Donald J. Trump has caused a big stir by criticizing Senator John McCain's war record, but so far his polling strength appears to be intact.

A new survey of likely Republican caucusgoers in Iowa by Monmouth University found that Mr. Trump's support has been holding steady in the state despite attacks from his rivals. Mr. Trump drew nearly universal backlash from the Republican Party establishment for suggesting that Mr. McCain is not a war hero.

In Iowa, however, he retained support of 13 percent of the state's Republicans. That trails only Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who leads the pack with 22 percent. Ben Carson, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida and Senator Ted Cruz of Texas round out the top five in the poll, which was conducted from Thursday to Sunday.

"Trump has outmaneuvered the rest of the field to earn the second spot despite his controversial statements over the weekend," said Patrick Murray, director of the Monmouth University Polling Institute in New Jersey.

Mr. Trump often points to his strong performance in national and state polls as evidence of his credibility as a candidate. But the true impact of his comments will likely not be known for several days, as voters fully digest them and assess their significance.

The survey found little difference in reaction to Mr. Trump before and after his remarks on Saturday. His support was strong among those who consider themselves members of the Tea Party, voters who are very conservative, and evangelical Christians.

While some skeptics about Mr. Trump's candidacy point out that his lifestyle and inconsistent views on social issues make him out of step with the party, Monmouth's poll indicates that social issues appear to be less important among Iowa Republicans this year. Former Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, who have traditionally performed well in Iowa, are failing to gain traction this time around.

Monmouth's poll of 425 likely Republican voters has a margin of error of 4.5 percent.

Rush Limbaugh Rallies Listeners to Donald Trump's Defense // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 20, 2015

The conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh, who has a substantial following among grass-roots Republicans, came to the defense of Donald J. Trump on Monday as prominent leaders in the party stepped up their criticism of Mr. Trump's pointed comments about Senator John McCain.

Such a defense is not entirely surprising, since Mr. Limbaugh's distaste for the Republican establishment is deep and well documented. But the supportive words from Mr. Limbaugh may provide Mr. Trump with the inoculation he needs to survive the scorn of the party's elders long enough to be included in the presidential debates.

Mr. Trump is not following the typical protocol for public figures who are scorned by the establishment, Mr. Limbaugh said.

"The American people haven't seen something like this in a long time," the radio host said, speaking to the unique nature of the emerging 2016 Republican presidential contest, in which harnessing anger and money may be crucial ingredients for success. "They have not seen an embattled public figure stand up for himself, double down and tell everybody to go to hell."

"Trump can survive this, Trump is surviving this," Mr. Limbaugh said at the start of his three-hour program on Monday, two days after Mr. Trump took issue with the description of Mr. McCain, a former Vietnam prisoner-of-war, as a "war hero." "This is a great, great teachable moment here, this whole thing with Trump and McCain."

Last week, Mr. Limbaugh expressed aggravation with Mr. McCain, who has never been a favorite of the Republican base, for saying that Mr. Trump was riling up "the crazies" in the party with his comments about illegal immigrants from Mexico.

Mr. Limbaugh described the dust-up as an over-hyped effort from "the drive-by media." He returned to the topic in the show's second hour, pointing out that Democrats have taken shots at Mr. McCain's service — including Senator Al Franken of Minnesota, years before he was elected to the Senate.

"When leftists attack McCain, they're perfectly warranted, because they're nice people," Mr. Limbaugh said. "Here comes Trump, and you would think that nobody has ever said anything like this before about the revered and respected John McCain."

Pointing out how many people are calling now for Mr. Trump to exit the race for president, Mr. Limbaugh said: "There's just one problem — Trump is not following the rules that targets are supposed to follow. Targets are supposed to immediately grovel, apologize."

"Guiding all of this," Mr. Limbaugh said, "is the guiding presumption that the majority of the American people are as outraged as the media are."

Why is Trump surging? Blame the media. // WaPo // John Sides – July 20, 2015

Donald Trump's surge to the front of the GOP presidential polls has occasioned not a little media attention and endless speculation as to why. You can disregard most of that speculation. The answer is simple: Trump is surging in the polls because the news media has consistently focused on him since he announced his candidacy on June 16.

Below is a graph that I made with UCLA political scientist Lynn Vavreck using social analytic tools provided by Crimson Hexagon. These tools are devised to gather and reveal the volume and tone of media coverage on major news sites. Vavreck and I are analyzing the news coverage of presidential candidates as part of our joint work on the 2016 election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The graph shows you how much coverage Trump got in the week before he announced his candidacy, and in the 30 days after. For comparison, there is a line for the other Republican candidates who have announced their candidacy in the past 2 months: Jeb Bush, Chris Christie, Ted Cruz, Rick Perry, Rick Santorum, and Scott Walker.

The graph shows two important things. First, Trump's announcement generated a much larger spike in media coverage than these other candidates received. The day before he announced his candidacy, Trump received 4 percent of the media coverage devoted to these candidates. The day after, he received 31 percent.

Second, the news media's attention to Trump hasn't faded away, as is typical. He has consistently attracted 20-30 percent of the news coverage of these candidates. Only Jeb Bush comes close. In the month since Trump's announcement, Trump has received 21 percent of the news coverage. Bush has received 20 percent.

Has this attention to Trump driven his poll numbers? Almost certainly. Think about it this way: voters don't change their minds without new information. No one wakes up on June 17 and randomly decides on their own that Donald Trump should be the Republican nominee for president. People's minds change because they are hearing information that they haven't heard before.

In this case, people are being bombarded with news stories about Trump. When the news media suddenly focuses on a candidate that hasn't previously received much coverage, Vavreck and I refer to this as the "discovery" phase of that candidate's campaign. The resulting spike in news coverage then drives the poll numbers.

In our book on the 2012 presidential election, "The Gamble," Vavreck and I documented this pattern over and over in 2011—for Perry, Herman Cain, and Newt Gingrich. In 2015, we've already seen similar, smaller surges for Cruz and Rubio after they announced their candidacies.

You can see the same pattern by closely examining Trump's news coverage and the national polls:

Trump's poll numbers increase only after the first spike in news coverage. Here is an apples-to-apples comparison. In a YouGov/Economist poll conducted from June 13-15—right before Trump's announcement—Trump polled at 2 percent. In a YouGov poll from June 20-22, he polled at 11 percent.

His numbers have only increased since then. This is completely expected: Trump has received a larger-than-usual spate of media coverage and so, as Nate Cohn showed Sunday, his polling bump is larger and more durable too.

Now, it's tempting to think that each surge is somehow the result of each candidate's idiosyncratic appeal to Republican voters. This is what commentators often assume about Trump.

But a simpler explanation is this: when a pollster interrupts people's lives and asks them about a presidential primary that doesn't formally begin for months, a significant number of people will mention whichever candidate happens to be in the news these days. It's basically a version of what's called the "availability heuristic." And for any causal consumer of news, Trump is very available these days.

But, as Cohn noted (and see also Andrew Prokop), this discovery phase doesn't last. It's followed by what Vavreck and I call "scrutiny"—in particular, scrutiny from the news media, aided and abetted by the competing candidates. (Hillary Clinton knows all about this.) This scrutiny tends to produce much less favorable coverage and, for many candidates, a permanent decline in the candidate's poll numbers. In the primary, this is often fatal for that candidate's campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Trump's case, his remarks about John McCain have finally elicited strong criticisms from the other GOP contenders. Now the question is whether Trump will feel the full scrutiny of the press—which, as political scientist Matthew Dickinson argues, necessitates more than simply enabling Trump to traffic in controversy. Dickinson suggests this:

Instead, journalists should take his candidacy seriously by pressing him on the details of his policy pronouncements, and helping the public understand the differences between the public and private sector. The sooner the media begins evaluating The Donald on the details of his policies and his governing expertise, rather than on his deliberately provocative comments designed to mobilize a disaffected public, the sooner The Donald's political bubble is likely to burst.

In other words, the media giveth, and the media can taketh away. This is what underlies the seemingly unpredictable Republican presidential primary of 2015.

Poll: Trump surges to big lead in GOP presidential race // WaPo // Dan Balz – July 20, 2015

Businessman Donald Trump surged into the lead for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, with almost twice the support of his closest rival, just as he ignited a new controversy after making disparaging remarks about Sen. John McCain's Vietnam War service, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Support for Trump fell sharply on the one night that voters were surveyed following those comments. Telephone interviewing for the poll began Thursday, and most calls were completed before the news about the remarks was widely reported.

Although the sample size for the final day was small, the decline was statistically significant. Still, it is difficult to predict what could happen to Trump's support in the coming days and weeks as the controversy plays out.

Even with the drop in support on the final night of the survey, Trump was the favorite of 24 percent of registered Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. That is the highest percentage and biggest lead recorded by any GOP candidate this year in Post-ABC News polls and marks a sixfold increase in his support since late May, shortly before he formally joined the race.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who announced his candidacy a week ago, is in second place, at 13 percent, followed by former Florida governor Jeb Bush, at 12 percent. Walker's support is strongest among those who describe themselves as "very conservative."

The next seven, ranging in support from 8 percent to 3 percent, are: former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.), retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.), Sen. Ted Cruz (Tex.), former Texas governor Rick Perry and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

The rankings are more important than early national surveys in previous campaigns because only the top 10 candidates, based on an average of the most recent national polls, will qualify for the first Republican debates. The first debate will be held Aug. 6 in Cleveland. Fox News Channel is the sponsor of that event and established the rules for qualification.

The bottom six candidates in the Post-ABC News survey are Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who plans to announce his candidacy Tuesday, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former New York governor George Pataki, former senator Rick Santorum (Pa.), businesswoman Carly Fiorina and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.). Their support ranges from 2 percent to less than 1 percent.

The Republican race remains highly fluid and continues to change with each survey. Four months ago, Bush was at 21 percent, and that support has dropped significantly. Others who have faced erosion include Cruz, who was at 12 percent shortly after he announced his candidacy this spring and is at 4 percent now. Paul was at 11 percent two months ago and is at 6 percent in the new survey. Christie also has dropped steadily, from 14 percent in January to 3 percent.

In the contest for the Democratic nomination, former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton maintains a wide lead, with 68 percent of registered Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents saying they would vote for her today in a caucus or primary. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who is drawing big and enthusiastic crowds in many states, is in second, at 16 percent. Support for Sanders has grown with each Post-ABC News poll this year.

Trailing the top two candidates are former senator Jim Webb (Va.), at 5 percent, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, at 2 percent, and former Rhode Island governor Lincoln D. Chafee, at 1 percent.

When Vice President Biden is included as a choice, Clinton is at 63 percent, Sanders at 14 percent and Biden is at 12 percent. Biden is not a declared candidate but has not said definitively that he will not run.

Clinton, who has highlighted the possibility of becoming the first female president in U.S. history, is far more popular among Democratic women than men, by almost 20 points. About 9 in 10 of her supporters say they are enthusiastic about her candidacy.

Part of Clinton's strength is that she is considered ideologically acceptable to a broad swath of the Democratic Party. Nearly 7 in 10 say she is "about right" ideologically. Only 40 percent say the same about Sanders, in part because nearly as many say they don't know enough about him to have an opinion.

Sanders is more popular among liberal Democrats than those who are moderate or conservative. He is significantly more popular among college graduates than those without a college degree. Although his message attacks what he calls the "billionaire class" and focuses on wealth and income inequality, he has more support among Democrats earning more than $50,000 than among those who make less than that.

The poll also tested attitudes about President Obama, who has recorded a series of victories over the past six weeks. They include Supreme Court decisions legalizing same-sex marriage and upholding the Affordable Care Act, a hard-fought win in Congress on trade policy (with significant GOP support) and last week's agreement with Iran designed to check that country's path to developing a nuclear weapon.

Those successes have not changed Obama's overall approval rating, however. The new survey shows that 45 percent approve of the way he is handling his job and 50 percent disapprove, almost identical to the poll in late May.

Just 35 percent say they approve of how he is handling the situation with Iran, while 52 percent disapprove. He receives better marks on the economy, with 47 percent saying they approve and 48 percent saying they disapprove. His ratings on the economy are unchanged from the last poll.

Trump has dominated campaign news since he announced his candidacy. His comments about illegal immigrants have drawn strong responses, pro and con. He said that the Mexican government is sending across the U.S.-Mexican border criminals, drug dealers and rapists, but that some of them are "nice" people.

Through nonstop media interviews and some high-profile appearances, including a big rally in Phoenix on July 11, he has drowned out his opponents. His rivals were tentative in taking issue with his immigration comments but pounced over the weekend when he went after McCain (R-Ariz.), a former prisoner of war, who drew the ire of Trump when he said the Phoenix rally had drawn out the “crazies” in the GOP.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump has struck a chord with at least a part of the Republican electorate. He does far better among those who are not college graduates than among those who are.

His support among men and women is about the same, and he performs somewhat better among GOP moderates than among those who say they are “very conservative.”

His views on immigration are not widely shared. Just 16 percent of Americans say that undocumented immigrants from Mexico are mainly “undesirable people like criminals,” while 74 percent say they are mainly “honest people trying to get ahead.”

Even in the Republican Party, Trump’s characterizations reflect a minority view. Among Republicans, 66 percent say undocumented immigrants from Mexico are mainly honest, while 19 percent say they are mainly undesirable.

There is clear resistance to his candidacy within the party. A majority (54 percent) say his views do not reflect the core values of the Republican Party.

If Trump were to receive the GOP nomination, 62 percent of Americans say they definitely would not consider voting for him. In contrast, just over 4 in 10 say they would definitely not consider voting for Clinton, Bush or Sanders.

Trump, however, could become a factor if he were to leave the GOP race and run for president as an independent. The survey shows that in a hypothetical three-way race, Clinton is at 46 percent, Bush is at 30 percent and Trump is at 20 percent among registered voters.

Trump takes more support away from Bush than Clinton in such a contest. In a head-to-head matchup, Clinton tops Bush by 50 percent to 44 percent among registered voters.

At this point, big majorities in each party say they are satisfied with their choices in the presidential race, with Democrats slightly more so. But compared to this time four years ago, Republicans are noticeably more satisfied with their field of candidates today.

The Post-ABC News poll was conducted July 16-19 among a random national sample of 1,002 adults, including landline and cellphone respondents. Overall results have a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points. Full results of the poll and detailed methodology are available here.

Breaking Down the GOP Silence on Trump’s Immigration Rhetoric // WSJ // Dan Schnur – July 20, 2015

John McCain is a war hero. The overwhelming majority of immigrants from Mexico are not rapists. And it’s time for Donald Trump to go home.

None of these sentences should be particularly difficult for a Republican presidential candidate to say out loud. But while the contenders for the GOP nomination (appropriately) rushed to Sen. McCain’s defense this weekend, the question remains: Why did they hesitate to forcefully criticize Mr. Trump during the weeks he was attacking immigrants rather than war veterans?

Hillary Clinton noted this disparity, albeit before inaccurately conflating Mr. Trump's statements on immigration policy with the rest of the Republican field. But Mrs. Clinton's misrepresentation of Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, Lindsey Graham, and others on this issue was made easier by the lack of strength, speed, and clarity of their rejections of Mr. Trump's message.

It was Rick Perry who finally denounced Mr. Trump with force and anger: He called the real estate mogul's statements "a toxic mix of demagoguery and nonsense." But even Mr. Perry's condemnation came weeks after Mr. Trump joined the race, a stark contrast with the speed with which Republican candidates rejected Mr. Trump's insult of Sen. McCain.

There is no question that veterans are a much more integral part of the GOP coalition than Latinos. But the Republican Party is struggling to gain support among minority voters, and the frail and faint nature of GOP candidates' repudiation of Mr. Trump's rhetoric was an important missed opportunity. For the other immigration hard-liners in the 2016 field, Mr. Trump has merely expressed their position in harsher and more inflammatory language. For those candidates who support a path to citizenship or other legal status, simply differentiating themselves from Mr. Trump without excoriating him was insufficient.

A sizable portion of the Republican base virulently opposes immigration reform, so Mr. Bush and Mr. Rubio have been forced to tread carefully on this issue (much as Mrs. Clinton has tried to tiptoe through the ongoing debate over trade). And for Mr. Bush, the prospect of a Trump independent candidacy next fall is likely to bring back memories of the damage that Ross Perot did to his father's candidacy in the 1992 campaign.

Armchair quarterbacks and romantics like myself yearn for candidates to stand up to the most extreme elements in their party, the way Bill Clinton and George W. Bush did in their first presidential campaigns. Mr. Clinton's denunciation of rap singer Sister Souljah, who had publicly speculated about the mass murder of white Americans, is regarded as a particularly evocative moment in political history.

But Sister Souljah was not a billionaire running for president. And Mr. Clinton's goal of separating himself from Jesse Jackson was not nearly as risky as it will be for Mr. Bush and Mr. Rubio to state their positions in the face of much more formidable opposition from their party's base.

This challenge is about to get even harder. In two weeks, Mr. Bush and Mr. Rubio could be on a debate stage with Mr. Trump. Navigating around him to the GOP nomination requires an approach that lies somewhere between accommodation and self-immolation.

Trump's self-paid presidential run means he's not going away // AP // Julie Bykowicz – July 20, 2015

Donald Trump faced an avalanche of fresh criticism Monday for questioning Sen. John McCain's heroism. But he's getting no pressure at all from the one community that could push a candidate out of the 2016 presidential race: political donors.

The billionaire businessman is paying for his own campaign, and that means Republicans may have him around far longer than some party leaders would like.

"Nobody leaves a race because they get tired, or because they think they don't have the votes. They leave the race because they run out of money," said Frank Luntz, a GOP pollster. "Donald Trump will never run out of money, and that makes him incredibly powerful."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, Republican operatives suggest that Trump enjoys a rare freedom.

Because he doesn't need tens of millions of dollars from wealthy donors — a notoriously risk-averse crowd — the standard rules of politics simply don't apply. He can afford, literally, to continue dropping the verbal bombs that have defined his presidential campaign since the day he joined the 2016 contest in June.

At his formal announcement last month, Trump said illegal immigrants from Mexico are prisoners and rapists. Then, at a conservative summit in Iowa last weekend, he dismissed McCain's reputation as a war hero, saying of the Arizona senator who was once a prisoner in Vietnam, "I like people who weren't captured."

Critics began piling on Trump immediately, and new voices emerged on Monday, from veterans groups, Republican colleagues and President Barack Obama's spokesman, who defended McCain and called on Trump to apologize.

Paul Rieckhoff, founder of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, said Monday that Trump's "asinine comments" were "an insult to everyone who has ever worn the uniform — and to all Americans."

White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest said veterans "are entitled to an apology."

A candidate reliant on campaign contributions probably would be feeling the pain by now.

Yet the self-funded Trump has shown little sign of backing down. He leveled new criticism against the McCain on Monday, saying the senator had made America "less safe" through his votes in Congress. The real estate executive also lashed out at fellow GOP presidential aspirants who have criticized his remarks, calling them "failed politicians."

Trump said he did not need "to be lectured by any of them."

"If he were dependent on donors for his campaign, he would find the vast majority of donors would be looking for other candidates at this point," said Fred Malek, who has raised money for Republican presidential hopefuls for four decades.

Presidential competitors in both parties, and the outside groups supporting them, have already raised about $400 million for the 2016 White House contest, the majority of the money coming from donors who face no limits on their contributions.

Trump hasn't solicited a dime. Reports filed last week with federal regulators show he loaned his campaign $1.8 million. His campaign has never held a fundraising dinner where attendees pay the legal maximum of $2,700 to attend, and he has never sent email asking for others to chip in $25. Both are hallmarks of a traditional presidential candidate.

"I don't need anybody's money. It's nice," Trump proclaimed during his presidential announcement June 16 in New York City. "I'm using my own money. I'm not using the lobbyists. I'm not using donors. I don't care. I'm really rich."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump filed details of his personal wealth with federal regulators last week that declare a net worth in excess of $10 billion.

"Being a billionaire means you're the master of your own domain," Luntz said.

He would know: Luntz once worked for Texas businessman H. Ross Perot, perhaps the best-known presidential candidate who paid his own way. In 1992, Perot ran as an independent candidate, using almost $64 million of his fortune to get his name on ballots across the country.

This year, with Republican Party pressure building, Luntz wonders if Trump will break off and go the Perot third-party route.

"You may be able to look back on this day as the beginning" of that campaign, he said. "You make up your own rules."

On the other hand, a self-financed candidate can also be his or her own worst enemy, said Ed Rollins, Perot's onetime campaign manager.

Rollins predicted Trump would follow the same path as his former boss: off a cliff.

Perot was polling ahead of the major-party candidates in June before the election but ended up not winning a single state in November.

"He first promised to spend whatever it took to win, and we presented him with a budget of about $450 million," Rollins said. "He balked at that. He argued over every item. The Ross Perots, the Donald Trumps, they don't want to be told what to do."

No, media, Donald Trump isn't done // Politico // Dylan Byers – July 20, 2015

Did you read the news this weekend? Donald Trump's candidacy is done. Over. Dead. Kaput.

In the more august pages of The New York Times, Nate Cohn declared the event "a turning point," and "a shift that will probably mark the moment when Trump’s candidacy went from boom to bust."

Boom to Bust! Trump, who had rocketed to the top of a crowded Republican field, besting Jeb Bush in the most recent Fox News and USA Today/Suffolk University polls, had just rung his campaign's death knell, the articles suggested.

On Monday, the Times' political team took a more measured tone: "It remains to be seen whether Mr. Trump’s standing in public opinion surveys will suffer from the episode with Mr. McCain," one article stated.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With good reason: Later the same day, Monmouth University released a survey showing that Trump's standing with Iowa voters -- second only to Scott Walker -- remained unchanged: "The poll did not find any significant change in support for Trump in interviews conducted after his comments about John McCain's military service," Monmouth said.

Public opinion can be slow to change, and it is certainly possible that days of negative headlines could influence voter sentiment heavily. But the rush to declare Trump's candidacy dead -- especially when journalists on the ground were reporting that many attendees "were not nearly as offended" as party officials -- is premature at best.

The next national survey for the Republican field is set to be released early Monday evening. Like the Monmouth poll, it will likely include data from both before and after Trump's remarks about McCain. A strong showing from Trump won't be proof that he's weathered the storm, any more than the media's gut reaction was proof that he wouldn't. But it should serve as a reminder to exercise caution before acting as coroner.

UPDATE (5:17 p.m.): An ABC News/Washington Post poll published at 5 p.m. ET on Monday had Trump leading the Republican field with a whopping 24 percent, far ahead of Scott Walker (13%) and Jeb Bush (12%).

However, the poll was conducted between Thursday and Sunday, and the poll notes that "Trump's support was conspicuously lower Sunday than in the three previous days." Specifically: "Trump's support was 28 percent in this survey's first three nights of polling. While the sample size of registered leaned Republicans on Sunday is quite small, he dropped to the single digits that day."

The Sunday sample size was indeed quite small: Just 82 Republicans and Republican-leaning independents, only 65 of whom who reported being registered to vote. So, once again: Caution.

Trump's Waterloo? Don't count on it // Politico // Ben Schreckinger & Danile Strauss – July 20, 2015

When Donald Trump derided John McCain's war hero status on Saturday and set off a media firestorm, many in the Republican establishment thought he had finally self-destructed. They can keep dreaming.

Trump's partisans are disappointed. But they're disappointed in McCain, the media and the party establishment, not Trump.

Interviews with his supporters in New Hampshire and the first drips of polling data suggest the mogul's core constituency has no intention of abandoning him over the dust-up.

"I don't like McCain anyways, to be perfectly frank with you," said Jerry DeLemus, a Marine Corps veteran and Republican activist in New Hampshire. DeLemus said he was a supporter of Texas Sen. Ted Cruz before formally signing on to support Trump on Sunday.

He said Trump's comments the day before — "He's not a war hero," said Trump of McCain at a gathering of religious conservatives in Iowa, adding, "He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured" — do nothing to shake his support and that it's McCain who should have to answer for his treatment of veterans.

"You think about [McCain] calling all the supporters of Trump 'crazies,'" said DeLemus. "How many of those guys are veterans? Trump didn't insult veterans. He went after McCain."

DeLemus called the party establishment's outrage "disingenuous," given its support for the dubious claims made by the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a group that claimed Kerry did not deserve his military accolades, which include the Silver Star, the Bronze Star and three Purple Heart medals, when he ran for president against George W. Bush in 2004.

"For the mainstream media to take Mr. Trump's comments out of context are very unfortunate and clearly in an effort to try to torpedo his candidacy," said Lou Gargiulo, Trump's Rockingham County, New Hampshire, co-chairman, who served in the Army. "He has spoken about the plight of veterans and as a veteran myself, I find people taking those comments out of context very unfortunate."

"People are out there looking for an opening to try to rip Donald Trump down, and we don't want to lose sight of what's most important," said New Hampshire state Rep. Steve Stepanek, who has endorsed Trump.

Early indications from Iowa polling are also showing that for Trump's supporters, his comments only burnish the brash, blunt image that drew them to the businessman in the first place.

In a Monmouth poll conducted from Thursday through Sunday, Trump registered 13 percent support among likely Republican caucus-goers surveyed on Thursday and Friday, before Trump derided McCain on Saturday morning. His support among likely caucus-goers surveyed on Saturday and Sunday was also 13 percent, putting him second only to Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and 5 points ahead of the third-place candidate, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson.

While two days of Iowa polling represent a limited sample size, and many respondents may not have processed Trump's remarks by the time they registered their preference, the poll gives no indication that Trump's supporters are peeling away.

That doesn't mean there isn't any fallout.

A national ABC News/Washington Post poll conducted during the same period did show Trump's support dropping off significantly on Sunday night, though that sample consisted of fewer than 200 voters and the poll's overall results still showed Trump surging to a commanding national lead with 24 percent support, 11 points ahead of his nearest rival, Scott Walker.

"It doesn't have me worried at all," said Trump's campaign manager, Corey Lewandowski, of the Sunday night drop-off. Nor does a call from former Texas Gov. Rick Perry for Trump to drop out of the race because of the comments. "We don't respond to Rick Perry," he said.

Trump has also caught the scorn of veterans groups, including the Military Officers Association of America, which have called on Trump to apologize. Richard Weidman, executive director for policy and government affairs of Vietnam Veterans for America, said the mogul's comments were especially "outrageous" because he received five deferments that allowed him to avoid serving in the war.

For his part, McCain on Monday morning said that while he doesn't need an apology from Trump, other veterans deserve one.

But even Trump's detractors who are also veterans are skeptical he has done himself any harm.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think Donald Trump is way off-base here and he's a bit of an embarrassment to the political process," said Brandon Friedman, an Iraq and Afghanistan veteran and CEO of the McPherson Square Group, a strategic communications firm that often works on veterans affairs.

"For normal politicians, this would obviously be very damaging," said Friedman, a Democrat who also served in the Obama administration as a deputy assistant secretary at the Department of Housing and Urban Development. "But Donald Trump is kind of a force."

He added, "Under normal circumstances, if veterans groups mobilized and really rallied their constituents, you would see Trump's poll numbers drop. … But I think it's very hard to predict right now how this is going to go."

Jonathan Freeman, an Iraq and Afghanistan veteran from Iowa who served as the deputy veterans outreach coordinator for Obama's 2008 campaign, said Trump's attack on McCain's service "befuddles the mind." But he also said that Trump's follow-up attack, during which he refused to apologize for his comments in a press availability on Saturday and instead went after McCain's record on veterans issues, resonates with many former service members. "As of 2008, [McCain] had not actually done that much for veterans."

And Democrats are taking Republicans' fast-and-furious condemnation of Trump as an opportunity to remind voters of the party's support — in particular, Jeb Bush's support — for the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth.

"Enough with the slanderous attacks," Bush tweeted in response to Trump on Saturday. "@SenJohnMcCain and all our veterans - particularly POWs have earned our respect and admiration."

But in January 2005, Democrats quickly pointed out, the former Florida governor praised the campaign to impugn Kerry's record of service.

"Thank you for your personal support of my brother in his re-election," Bush wrote to the late George Day, who worked on behalf of the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and also shared a prison cell with McCain in Vietnam. "I know you will be joining other Swifties — POWs in Orlando soon. Please let them know that I am personally appreciative of their service to our nation. As someone who truly understands the risk of standing up for something, I simply cannot express in words how much I value their willingness to stand up against John Kerry."

Trump, who remains unapologetic, appears to believe he can shift the focus of the debate rather than retract his comments. "This story is no longer about John McCain, it's about our horribly treated vets. Illegals are treated better than our wonderful veterans," he tweeted on Monday.

Trump has also touted his contributions to veterans' causes, saying he gave over $1 million for the building of a Vietnam veterans memorial in New York and another $1 million for a parade to honor veterans in New York in 1995. "A Trump administration will provide premium universal access health care for our veterans," he said in a statement. "They will be able to get the best care anytime and anywhere."

Donald Trump's no-apology tour // Politico // Nick Gass – July 20, 2015

For all the words coming out of Donald Trump's mouth since he declared his run for the White House, there have been two words missing: I'm sorry.

He's even doubling down on his comments about Sen. John McCain's time as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, comments that had many saying this is it, now he's crossed the line.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He’s not a war hero. He was a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren’t captured,” Trump said during his appearance at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames, Iowa.

In the past 24 hours, Trump again tried to flip the script, telling NBC’s Matt Lauer that the media is distorting his words and saying in a USA Today op-ed that his critics should be the ones feeling shame for their willingness to lecture him.

The outrage has been swift. Jeb Bush called on him to stop the “slanderous attacks.” Rick Perry said he should withdraw from the race. Marco Rubio said the comments should disqualify him for the presidency.

Even Secretary of State John Kerry, focused on the landmark Iran deal and the warming ties with Cuba, was moved to issue a statement: “If anyone doesn’t know that John McCain is a war hero, it only proves they know nothing about war and even less about heroism.”

McCain is showing self-restraint. Appearing on MSNBC’s Morning Joe on Monday morning, the five-term senator who spent more than five years in the “Hanoi Hilton” as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, said Trump does not owe him those two words.

But he said others deserve an apology.

“I think he may owe an apology to the families of those who have sacrificed in conflict and those who have undergone the prison experience of serving their country,” McCain said.

“I’m not a hero, but those who were my senior ranking officers, people like Col. Bud Day, a congressional Medal of Honor winner, and those that have inspired us to do things that we otherwise wouldn’t have been capable of doing. Those are the people that I think he owes an apology to,” McCain said.

Trump doesn’t appear close to offering one, and in general, apologies don’t seem to come easily for Trump. When asked at the Iowa summit over the weekend about whether he has ever asked God for forgiveness for his actions, Trump replied, “I am not sure I have. I just go on and try to do a better job from there. I don’t think so,” he said.

And in the Monday morning interview with Lauer, Trump again blasted McCain for what he called the “terrible job” he has done for veterans, and continued his double-speak style of explaining himself.

“We talk about John McCain, and I think it’s great. He is a very brave man and all of that, but we don’t talk about the people who weren’t captured, and that’s what I was trying to refer to, and I think I did. And by the way, if you see the news conference right afterwards, a few minutes afterwards, everything was perfect,” Trump said, referring to a press availability after the event in Iowa.

“I never even thought this would be an issue,” Trump added. “My opponents have brought it up. These are guys who have zeros in the polls.”

Trump’s comments about McCain poured gallons of gasoline on an already raging fire within the Republican party on what do about the real estate mogul and the collateral damage he’s creating.

The fire started on Day One. In his announcement speech on June 16, during the rambling hour-long discourse, Trump made big and lasting headlines by saying the U.S. has become a dumping ground for Mexican immigrants who are rapists and drug peddlers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Trump doubled down, and tripled down, and quadrupled down, and so forth, on the comments, Republicans have failed to find a unified response.

Some third-tier candidates, desperate for a bump in the polls that could help get them in the first debate on Aug. 6, have exploited the comments with shame-on-you smackdowns to grab some of the spotlight for themselves.

Others have held their tongue. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, who is arguably being hurt most by Trump's recent ownership of uncompromising, anti-establishment rhetoric, has declined to criticize him, and even met up with Trump while in New York on Friday.

The Republican National Committee, meanwhile, has deployed a combination of direct engagement and public condemnations to rein in Trump, with little success.

RNC Chairman Reince Priebus reportedly called Trump a couple weeks ago to tell him to "tone it down" — a phone call that Trump later spun into an atta-boy.

On Saturday RNC spokesman Sean Spicer issued a written statement, denouncing Trump's latest remarks.

"Senator McCain is an American hero because he served his country and sacrificed more than most can imagine. Period. There is no place in our party or our country for comments that disparage those who have served honorably," Spicer said.

But Trump's not ready to back down.

"He's terrible," Trump said on Monday morning about McCain. "And he's doing a horrible job with the vets."

Palin calls both McCain and Trump heroes // CNN // Jake Tapper – July 20, 2015

Asked about the dispute between Donald Trump and Sen. John McCain, R-Arizona -- the candidate at the top of the ticket when she was 2008 Republican vice presidential nominee -- former Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin Monday afternoon called both men heroes.

"I have the good fortune of knowing both John McCain and Donald Trump well," Palin told CNN in an email. "Both men have more in common than the today's media hype would have you believe. Both blazed trails in their careers and love our great nation."

Palin, who attached a photograph of McCain returning from Vietnam to her email, wrote, "Sen. McCain dedicated his life to serving our country, and in my humble opinion the sacrifices made by all ethical service members are heroic -- putting it all on the line to defend freedom IS heroic -- and Donald Trump is a hero in another arena."

"Trump is the candidate giving voice to untold millions of fed-up Americans witnessing a purposeful destruction of our economy and the equal opportunity for success that made America exceptional," Palin said. "We're watching career politicians throw away our kids' future through bankrupting public budgets and ripping open our porous borders which, obvious to all us non-politicians, puts us at great risk."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Seeming to take issue with some of the language used by McCain in the past to describe attendees at Trump rallies and some of the Senate tea party members, Palin added, "Everywhere I go, hard-working patriotic Americans -- not 'crazies' or 'wacko birds' -- ask me to pass on to Mr. Trump encouragement to keep educating the masses about true ramifications of illegal immigration, and in general the real state of our union."

Palin concluded by recommending both Trump and McCain "resolve the media driven wedge between them."

"We can keep the debate focused on significant issues at hand," she said. "I leave politics of personal destruction to those on the Left and lazy media lapdogs who's only take away from any debate is any salacious slip-up, as if they've never wanted to restate something they've publicly uttered."

"I'll fight the exhausting, divisive strategy that's taken hold under the current crop of politicians who refuse to allow our United States to unite. Both Mr. Trump and Sen. McCain can contribute their gifts and talents to join that fight to work together, because the Left is headed the other direction and under that desired division we will fall," she said.

Donald Trump writes op-ed slamming McCain, Sanders // CNN // Deena Zaru – July 20, 2015

After a weekend full of backlash for his comments saying former POW Sen. John McCain is "not a war hero," Donald Trump put his defiance in writing.

In an op-ed for USA Today published Sunday, Trump writes that the Arizona Republican "has failed the state of Arizona and the country."

Trump renewed his attacks on McCain and writes "The reality is that John McCain the politician has made America less safe, sent our brave soldiers into wrong-headed foreign adventures, covered up for President Obama with the VA scandal and has spent most of his time in the Senate pushing amnesty."

Trump also wants Republican presidential candidates who blasted him for his comments on McCain to know that he doesn't care.

"A number of my competitors for the Republican nomination have no business running for president. I do not need to be lectured by any of them," Trump writes. "Many are failed politicians or people who would be unable to succeed in the private sector. Some, however, I have great respect for."

Trump could be referring to Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, who recently met with Trump and has declined to denounce his comments on McCain.

Trump criticizes Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders, who is a former Chairman of the Senate Veteran's Affairs Committee. Sanders was the head of the committee during the Veteran's Affairs scandal last year which led to the resignation of Secretary Eric Shinseki.

"Thanks to McCain and his Senate colleague Bernie Sanders, their legislation to cover up the VA scandal, in which 1,000+ veterans died waiting for medical care, made sure no one has been punished, charged, jailed, fined or held responsible," Trump writes.

Donald Trump Hits New High in Poll of Republicans // TIME // Sarah Begley – jUly 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican voters favor Donald Trump over any other GOP contender for the 2016 presidential race, according to a new poll by the Washington Post and ABC News.

The poll shows a new high of 24% of registered Republicans and Republican-leaning registered voters saying they would vote for Trump if their state primary were being held today. That is nearly twice as much support in the poll as his runner up, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, whom 13% support.

(Trump's previous high was 18 percent in a Fox News poll conducted July 13-15.)

The last day of the poll coincided with Trump's controversial statement that Sen. John McCain is "not a war hero," so it's not clear yet if those remarks have hurt his standing with voters, although many Republicans have criticized Trump over them. There was some statistically significant drop-off in support for him on that day, however.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush placed third in the poll, with 12% saying they would vote for him, followed by former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee with 8%.

On the left, Hillary Clinton is completely dominant with 63% of Democrats and Democratic-leaning registered voters saying they would choose her; Sen. Bernie Sanders comes in second place at 14%, closely trailed by Vice President Joe Biden (who has not declared himself as a candidate) at 12%.

The poll of 1,002 adults was conducted with cell phone and landline respondents from July 16-19. It has a margin of error of 3.5 percentage points.

Donald Trump Is The World's Greatest Troll // FiveThirtyEight // Nate Silver – July 20, 2015

"A troll," according to one definition, "is a person who sows discord ... by starting arguments or upsetting people ... with the deliberate intent of provoking readers into an emotional response or of otherwise disrupting normal on-topic discussion."

The goal of the troll is to provoke a reaction by any means necessary. Trolls thrive in communities that are open and democratic (they wouldn't be invited into a discussion otherwise) and which operate in presumed good faith (there need to be some standards of decorum to offend). Presidential nomination contests are highly susceptible to trolling, therefore. Access is fairly open: There's no longer much of a filter between the campaigns, the media and the public. And it's comically easy to provoke a reaction. How many times between now and next November will we hear that a candidate's statement is "offensive," whether or not it really is?

Trolls operate on the principle that negative attention is better than none. In fact, the troll may feed off the negative attention, claiming it makes him a victim and proves that everyone is out to get him.

Sound like any presidential candidates you know?

There's a notion that Donald Trump's recent rise in Republican polls is a media-driven creation. That explanation isn't entirely wrong, but it's incomplete. It skims over the complex interactions between the media, the public and the candidates, which can produce booms and busts of attention. And it ignores how skilled trolls like Trump can exploit the process to their benefit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Let's look at some data. In the chart below, I've tracked how media coverage has been divided among the Republican candidates over roughly the past month (the data covers June 14 through July 12), according to article counts on Google News. In turn, I've shown the share of Google searches for each candidate over the same period. The data was provided to FiveThirtyEight by Google but should closely match what you'll get by searching on Google Trends or Google News yourself.

Even before his imbecilic comments about Sen. John McCain this weekend, which came too recently to be included in this data, Trump was receiving far more media attention than any other Republican. Based on Google News, 46 percent of the media coverage of the GOP campaign over the past month was directed toward Trump, more than for Jeb Bush (13 percent), Chris Christie (9 percent), Scott Walker (8 percent), Bobby Jindal (6 percent), Ted Cruz (4 percent) and Marco Rubio (4 percent) combined.

And yet, the public is perhaps even more obsessed with Trump. Among the GOP candidates, he represented 62 percent of the Google search traffic over the past month, having been searched for more than six times as often as second-place Bush.

So if the press were going purely by public demand, there might be even more Trump coverage. Instead, the amount of press coverage that each candidate has received has been modulated by the media's perception of how likely each is to win the nomination.

The chart I showed you above contained data on each GOP candidate's chances of winning the nomination, according to the prediction market Betfair.1 Candidates who are perceived as having a credible chance to win the nomination — like Bush, Walker and Rubio — receive proportionally more media attention than public attention. The reverse is true for candidates who are seen by the press as long shots, such as Rand Paul and Ben Carson.2

As is usually the case, however, life gets more complicated when we go from identifying correlations to trying to understand their causes. As we've seen, press coverage is highly correlated with the level of public interest in a candidate and the candidate's perceived chances of winning the nomination. It could be, however, that public attention to a candidate is triggered by media coverage rather than the other way around. Likewise, while the media might be fairly sophisticated at identifying which candidates are more likely to win and provide correspondingly more coverage of them, the media can also produce a self-fulfilling prophecy. Being ignored by the media or labeled as a loser can make it hard for a candidate to attract money, endorsements and other resources that might allow them to make a comeback.

We can aspire to determine causality by comparing the timing of Google News and Google search hits for a candidate. If the press drives public interest in the candidates, spikes in Google News should precede spikes in Google searches. If instead the press is reacting to the public, Google News hits will lag search.

Unfortunately, this isn't so easy to determine. Shifts in public and media attention tend to occur at about the same time — as you can see, for example, in the graphic below, which compares Trump's Google News and Google search traffic from week to week.

But a regression analysis — you can read the gory details in the footnotes3 — suggests that press attention both leads and lags public attention to the candidates. This makes a lot of sense. The public can take cues from the media about which candidates to pay attention to. But the media also gets a lot of feedback from the public. Or to put it more cynically: If Trump-related stories are piling up lots of pageviews and Trump-related TV segments get good ratings, then guess what? You're probably going to see more of them.4

This creates the possibility of a feedback loop. Some event sparks a news story about a candidate, which triggers more public attention, which encourages yet more media attention — and so on. It may help to explain why we've repeatedly seen the so-called "discovery, scrutiny and decline" cycle in the past two primary campaigns for candidates like Trump, Newt Gingrich and Herman Cain — bursts of attention that coincide with spikes in the polls but then fade or even burst after several weeks.

These "bounces" aren't entirely new. Presidential candidates usually get a temporary bounce in support following their party's convention, for example. But the polls in the 2012 Republican campaign were far more volatile than those in any previous nomination race. We're really just getting started in 2016, but it's been pretty wild as well. Bounces that might have happened once in a cycle now seem to occur all the time.

So if these spikes are media-driven, they seem to be driven by some particularly modern features of the media landscape. Social media allows candidates to make news without the filter of the press. It may also encourage groupthink among and between reporters and readers, however. And access to real-time traffic statistics can mean that everyone is writing the same "takes" and chasing the same eyeballs at once. Is the tyranny of the Twitter mob better or worse than the "Boys on the Bus" model of a group of (mostly white, male, upper-middle-class, left-of-center) reporters deigning to determine what's news and what isn't? I don't know, but it's certainly different. And it seems to be producing a higher velocity of movement in the polls and in the tenor of media coverage.

Trolls are skilled at taking advantage of this landscape and making the news cycle feed on its own tail, accelerating the feedback loop and producing particularly large bounces and busts in the polls. In 2012, Gingrich's whole strategy seemed to involve trolling the media, and he went through a couple of boom-and-bust cycles in polls. In 2008, Sarah Palin, though beloved by Republicans, was brilliant at trolling Democrats and the media. She was extremely popular at first, although her popularity was ultimately short-lived.

Trump has taken trolling to the next level by being willing to offend members of his own party. Ordinarily, this would be a counterproductive strategy. In a 16-candidate field, however, you can be in first place with 15 or 20 percent of the vote — even if the other 80 or 85 percent of voters hate your guts.

In the long run — as our experience with past trolls shows — Trump's support will probably fade. Or at least, given his high unfavorable ratings, it will plateau, and other candidates will surpass him as the rest of the field consolidates.

It's much harder to say what will happen to Trump's polling in the near term, however. That's in part because it's hard to say exactly what was driving his support in the first place. Trump wasn't doing especially well with tea party voters or with any other identifiable group of Republicans. My guess is that his support reflected a combination of (i) low-information voters who recognized his name and (ii) voters who share Trump's disdain for the trappings of the political establishment and (iii) voters who were treating him as an inside joke or a protest vote, making him vaguely like an American equivalent of Beppe Grillo. None of them will necessarily be deterred from declaring their support for him because of his comments about McCain. Some of them might even be encouraged.

But what if you want Trump to go away now?

The media isn't going to stop paying attention to Trump. Nor should it, really: His candidacy is a political story and not just "entertainment."5

Republicans are another matter, however. They might rightly be concerned that Trump is tarnishing their brand image or at least meddling with their already-challenging task of choosing a candidate. Other Republicans should resist the temptation to extend the news cycle by firing back at him, however — even when what he says is genuinely offensive.6

After 12 years of writing on the Internet, I've learned that the old adage is true. Don't feed the troll. The only way to kill a troll like Trump is to deprive him of attention.

Has Trump gone too far? // VOX // Jonathan Allen – July 20, 2015

Donald Trump continues to test the tenets of Politics 101. The rule he's breaking this time: Don't get in a scrap with someone who has less to lose than you do.

When the real estate mogul and former TV star vaulted to the top of Republican presidential primary polls, his rivals for the nomination tried to handle him with kid gloves. No one wanted to kindle his already ignited base or risk the optics of getting in a public fight with a character they hoped would buckle under the weight of his own inexperience. That didn't work so well — at least not at first. The Donald kept rising in the polls and is now the leader.

But he's been baited into a fight with 2008 Republican nominee John McCain, and many political analysts — particularly GOP strategists who hope it's true — think this is the beginning of the end of the Trump phenomenon.

McCain, an Arizona senator playing the role of elder statesman, has taken umbrage at Trump's hard-line rhetoric and positioning on unauthorized immigrants, specifically at a recent rally in Phoenix. Trump "fired up the crazies," McCain told the New Yorker's Ryan Lizza last week. He also noted that Hillary Clinton had attended a Trump wedding — "I don't know which wedding it was," he said, pointing to the fact that Trump has been married repeatedly.

When Trump responded, he touched an electrified political third rail of politics by challenging McCain's war record. "He's not a war hero," Trump said in Iowa Saturday. "He's a war hero because he was captured. I like people who weren't captured."

That set off a backlash among Republicans, many of whom were looking for a reason to go after Trump. "America's POWs deserve much better than to have their service questioned by the offensive rantings of Donald Trump," Marco Rubio tweeted.

Trump fell into a traditional political trap by getting in a fight with McCain, overstepping what some considered a line of decency in attacking a war veteran and letting his rivals come to McCain's defense while he refused to apologize. But traditional political rules don't always seem to apply to Trump.

Kevin Madden, a top adviser to 2008 and 2012 presidential candidate Mitt Romney, said Trump's not playing at a strategic level.

"We're overthinking it," he told Vox. "Trump doesn't have any strategy other than to be the ringleader of his own media circus. So when we try to assess his moves tactically, we're overlooking the fact that he's only interested in one thing, which is putting Donald Trump in the middle of the conversation."

But given that Trump's anti-immigration base hates McCain, it's not clear how much he loses by going after the Arizona senator. It will be interesting to see whether this is the tipping point at which Trump starts to fade or another data point in the case that the basic rules of politics don't apply to him.

Donald Trump has his biggest poll lead yet (but he's still not going to win) // VOX // Andrew Prokop – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a new national poll, Donald Trump just got his best result yet — he's surged to an 11-point lead, leaving the rest of his Republican rivals in the dust.

Most of the new Washington Post/ABC News poll was taken before Trump's controversial remarks on John McCain's military service, so any impact those may have on the race aren't yet clear. But the celebrity mogul has now led three of the past four national polls, and his lead in this one is the largest any GOP presidential candidate has held in any national poll tracked by RealClearPolitics this year:

Again, it's important not to get carried away by this result. Trump is not going to win the nomination. Winning 24 percent of Republicans is impressive in a crowded field, but it's still very far away from a majority of the party. Additionally, Trump's polling surge resembles those of past "outsider" candidates known for saying provocative things, like Michele Bachmann, Newt Gingrich, and Herman Cain — candidates who all eventually collapsed. GOP elites will go to the mattresses to stop Trump, who looks toxic in a general election, from being their nominee. Trump's candidacy may collapse well before the first ballots are cast, and even if it survives until then, the party will eventually find a non-Trump alternative to unify around.

Yet one risk inherent to that is that Trump could fund his own third-party candidacy — and this new poll finds that in a three-way race, Hillary Clinton would get 46 percent, Jeb Bush 30 percent, and Trump 20 percent.

Trump's decline could occur sooner, though, and some pundits are speculating that his statement that John McCain isn't really a war hero could repel GOP voters. "Support for Trump fell sharply on the one night that voters were surveyed following those comments," according to the Post's Dan Balz and Peyton Craighill, who added: "Although the sample size for the final day was small, the decline was statistically significant."

And even if Trump does somehow, in some way, defy the odds and end up the GOP nominee, this same poll shows that a clear majority of general election voters — 62 percent — "definitely would not" vote for Trump:

As for Trump's rivals, Scott Walker, with a post-announcement bump, comes in second here with 13 percent support, while Jeb Bush is just behind him with 12 percent. These aren't particularly strong results for the two candidates generally considered to be the most plausible GOP nominees.

But as I wrote last week, the real losers from Trumpmentum are all the other candidates in the race, who are less known and desperately need media attention. From Marco Rubio to Ted Cruz to Chris Christie, the GOP field is so crowded right now, with 15 candidates and two more expected to jump in soon, that the key challenge most contenders face is simply getting anyone to pay attention to them. And that's extremely difficult with Trump in the race, being covered obsessively by the media — and partially justifying that coverage by polling so strongly.

Controversial Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump leads the GOP primary field in a new ABC News/ Washington Post poll, while also garnering enough support as a hypothetical independent candidate in the general election to potentially damage his party's chances.

That's even though a majority of Americans, including most Republicans, say Trump does not represent the Republican Party's core values, and six in 10 overall – including three in 10 in his own party– say they wouldn't consider supporting him for president were he the GOP nominee.

How long the Trump surge lasts is an open question; this poll was conducted Thursday through Sunday, mostly before his controversial criticism Saturday of Sen. John McCain's status as a war hero. And Trump's support was conspicuously lower Sunday than in the three previous days.

Trump's frontrunner status, moreover, reflects the crowded GOP race. He leads the 16-candidate field with 24 percent support among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents who are registered to vote, up sharply from 4 percent in May. While enough for a lead, that also means 76 percent prefer someone else, or none of them.

Scott Walker has 13 percent support, Jeb Bush 12 percent, with the rest in single digits.

Trump's support was 28 percent in this survey's first three nights of polling. While the sample size of registered leaned Republicans on Sunday is quite small, he dropped to the single digits that day.

His improvement overall, compared with an ABC/Post poll in May, occurred largely across the board. Support for Rand Paul dropped by 5 percentage points, for Ted Cruz by 4 and for several other candidates by generally non-significant 1- to 3-point margins.

Among groups, Trump's advanced since May by 7 points among college graduates, but just to 8 percent, underscoring his weakness in this group. But – at least until Sunday – his gains otherwise were broad, up, for example, by 16 points among Republicans, 23 points among GOP-leaning independents and 20 points among moderates and conservatives alike.

He's at least numerically ahead, as a result, across many key groups.

Nativists

There's a nativist element to Trump's support: He's backed by 38 percent of Republicans and GOP-leaning independents who feel that immigrants, overall, mainly weaken U.S. society. That drops to 12 percent among those who say immigrants strengthen this country.

Another, related result underscores a disconnect for Trump with the public overall, one that may pose a challenge for him in the future. Seventy-four percent of Americans see undocumented immigrants from Mexico as "mainly honest people trying to get ahead" as opposed to "mainly undesirable people like criminals." Trump, again controversially, has said such immigrants include drug dealers and rapists, while "some, I assume, are good people."

The question of core values is a potentially difficult one for Trump. Republicans and Republican-leaning independents by a 24-point margin, 56-32 percent, say his views do not reflect the core values of the Republican Party (leaned Democrats agree, by a similar 61-32 percent). And 31 percent of Republicans say they wouldn't consider voting for Trump were he the party's nominee – a large group to lose on his own side. (Just 11 percent of Democrats, by contrast, rule out supporting Hillary Clinton.)

In a general election trial heat, Clinton leads Bush, the GOP fundraising leader, by a slight 50-44 percent among registered voters. But with Trump as an independent candidate that goes to 46-30-20 percent, Clinton-Bush-Trump – with Trump drawing support disproportionately from Bush, turning a 6-point Clinton advantage into 16 points.

Trump's support in this three-way matchup was 21 percent from Thursday to Saturday, vs. 13 percent in Sunday interviews.

These are early days, of course; leaders came and went like flashcards in the 2012 Republican primary contest, and, as noted, potential fallout from Trump's comments on McCain – or his next pronouncements – remains to be seen. But the results underscore the GOP's conundrum in responding to Trump, a billionaire businessman and television celebrity who hasn't ruled out an independent run for the presidency.

Among other results in this poll, produced for ABC by Langer Research Associates:

The Dems

Clinton retains very broad backing for the Democratic nomination, 63 percent, vs. 14 percent for Bernie Sanders and 12 percent for Joe Biden. With Biden out (he hasn't announced a candidacy), most of his support goes to Clinton, boosting her to 68 percent.

That said, Clinton's support is less enthusiastic than it might be – 42 percent of her supporters are very enthusiastic about her candidacy. And while 72 percent of leaned Democrats are satisfied with their choice of candidates, that compares with 83 percent at this point in 2007.

Sixty-nine percent of Democrats and Democratic leaning independents call Clinton "about right" ideologically, as opposed to too liberal or too conservative. That falls to 40 percent for Sanders – not because he's seen as too liberal, but because nearly four in 10 don't know enough about him to say. Also, despite Sanders' more liberal image, Clinton wins 64 percent support from liberals.

She also does 19 points better among women than men in support for the nomination, and 15 points better among nonwhites than whites.

More GOP

Republican candidates do less well in their base than Clinton in hers on being seen as "about right" ideologically – 46 percent for Bush, 45 percent for Marco Rubio, 44 percent for Trump, 38 percent for Walker and 35 percent for Ted Cruz.

Twenty-two percent call Bush "too liberal" and 17 percent say the same about Trump. Walker, Cruz and Rubio, like Sanders, have high undecided numbers on the question.

As shown in the table above (online readers, see the pdf), Bush is notably weak among very conservative leaned Republicans, with just 6 percent support – a persistent difficulty for him.

General

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A general election match-up between Clinton and Bush is a bit better for her now (50-44 percent, as noted) than in May, 47-44 percent. That relies, in part, on a 19-point advantage for Clinton among moderates. (She has 21 percent support among conservatives; Barack Obama won 17 percent of that group in 2012). Clinton also does 10 points better among women than men (as did Obama) and far better among under-30s (71 percent support) than their elders, especially seniors (40 percent). And she has 78 percent support among nonwhites vs. Bush, compared with 39 percent of whites – margins again similar to Obama's in 2012.

Bringing Trump into the mix as an independent reduces Bush's support in his better groups, including Republicans (-27 points for Bush with Trump added), conservatives (-23) and whites (-19).

Another result marks the mood confronting both political parties: Asked which better represents their own values, a substantial 23 percent of Americans volunteer that neither does (of the rest, 38 percent pick the Democrats, 31 percent the Republicans). And in a challenging finding for candidates trying to find a lever, the public fractures on what attributes matter most to them – a strong leader (24 percent, peaking among Republicans), one who's honest and trustworthy (also 24 percent), one who shares their values (20 percent) or who understands their problems (17 percent, peaking among Democrats). Two other items finish lower on the list – having the best experience (10 percent) or the best chance to win (3 percent).

And the pres

As to the president (not the chief focus of this survey, clearly), Obama continues to encounter difficulties in his popularity overall. While 45 percent of Americans approve of his job performance, more, 50 percent, disapprove, essentially unchanged from 45-49 percent in May. Despite recent economic gains he manages just an even split on handling the economy, also unchanged. Views of the president remain highly polarized.

Methodology

This ABC News/Washington Post poll was conducted by landline and cellular telephone July 16-19, 2015, in English and Spanish, among a random national sample of 1,002 adults, including 815 registered voters. Results have a margin of sampling error of 3.5 points for the full sample, and 4.0 for registered voters, including design effect. Partisan divisions are 30-21-39 percent, Democrats-Republicans-independents.

Interviews were conducted Sunday among 200 respondents overall, including 82 Republicans and Republican-leaning independents and 65 leaned Republicans who reported being registered to vote. ABC customarily reports results for groups at or near 100 respondents, but may make characterizations of results in smaller groups. Sunday results on Trump support characterized in this analysis were essentially identical regardless of registration.

The survey was produced for ABC News by Langer Research Associates of New York, N.Y., with sampling, data collection and tabulation by Abt-SRBI of New York, N.Y.

Des Moines Register calls on Donald Trump to drop out // MSNBC // Adam Howard – July 20, 2015

The Des Moines Register, arguably the most influential publication in the early primary state of Iowa, called on Donald Trump to drop out of the 2016 presidential race in an op-ed published on their website late Monday.

The op-ed comes amid a firestorm of controversy generated by Trump's comments about Sen. John McCain's war record at the Family Leadership Summit on Saturday. Trump initially said McCain was "not a war hero" during a

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q&A. Although he later clarified that McCain, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam for over five years, was "perhaps" a hero, Trump has stubbornly refused to apologize for his statements.

In the scathing piece penned by the Register's editorial board, Trump is accused of being more "focused on promoting himself, and his brand, than in addressing the problems facing the nation."

"If he were merely a self-absorbed, B-list celebrity, his unchecked ego could be tolerated as a source of mild amusement. But he now wants to become president, which means that he aspires to be the leader of the free world and the keeper of our nuclear launch codes," the op-ed reads. "That is problematic, because Trump, by every indication, seems wholly unqualified to sit in the White House. If he had not already disqualified himself through his attempts to demonize immigrants as rapists and drug dealers, he certainly did so by questioning the war record of John McCain, the Republican senator from Arizona."

The piece goes on to commend McCain's service in Vietnam and to call Trump's critique of the senator "disgraceful."

"The best way Donald Trump can serve his country is by apologizing to McCain and terminating this ill-conceived campaign," the op-ed concludes. Previously, Trump's GOP rival, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry called on Trump to quit the race. And he has been criticized by nearly every other 2016 candidate for his attacks on McCain.

Still, the real estate mogul appears to be unmoved, claiming that "nobody" at the summit was insulted by his comments and that the entire story has been promoted by his Republican peers who trail him in the polls. He has also faulted McCain personally for starting the feud. The Arizona senator had dismissed Trump supporters as "crazies" in the past.

In his own op-ed published Sunday, Trump defended his record on veterans and said he will not be lectured by "failed politicians." During an appearance Monday night on Fox News' "The O'Reilly Factor," Trump said "I have respect for Sen. McCain, I used to like him a lot. I supported him. I raised a lot of money for his campaign against President Obama. And certainly if there was a misunderstanding I would totally take that back, but hopefully I said it correctly and certainly, shortly thereafter I said it correctly ... I would like him however to do something with the 15,000 people that were in Phoenix about illegal immigration."

Several polls have shown Trump emerging as a frontrunner among GOP voters nationwide, and he has ranked second to Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker in some recent polls out of Iowa.

On several talk show appearances since Saturday, Trump has repeatedly claimed that he is not a "fan" of McCain because he has done "nothing" to help U.S. veterans. McCain said on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" Monday that he doesn't need an apology from the polarizing candidate but that he does "owe" a mea culpa to the families of other prisoners or war.

"There are so many men, and some women, who served and sacrificed and happened to be held prisoner and somehow to denigrate that, in any way, their service I think is offensive," McCain said.

"A great honor of my life was to serve in the company of heroes. I'm not a hero," he added.

KASICH

Long Before His Candidacy, John Kasich Made It to the White House // NYT // Sheryl Stolberg – July 20, 2015

Like the 15 other Republicans running for president, Gov. John R. Kasich of Ohio – who is expected to announce his candidacy on Tuesday – knows it takes guts, and even a little chutzpah, to make it to the White House. It's a lesson he learned 45 years ago when, as an 18-year-old freshman at Ohio State University, he begged President Richard M. Nixon to let him visit.

"I think that you, as far as I can judge, are not only a great president but an even greater person," Mr. Kasich wrote, in neat cursive, in a letter dated Dec. 2, 1970. The letter, on file with Mr. Kasich's papers at the Westerville Public Library in Ohio, was hand-delivered by the president of Ohio State, Novice Fawcett.

"Would it be possible," the young Mr. Kasich continued, "for me to come to the White House to talk and see you sometime in the future? I would immediately pass up a Rose Bowl trip to see you. My parents would permit me to fly down anytime, and I know my grades wouldn't suffer."

Mr. Kasich went on to predict, correctly, "a big Nixon victory in '72."

Flattery worked; Mr. Nixon wrote back and on Dec. 22, 1970, the young Mr. Kasich spent 20 minutes with Mr. Nixon in the Oval Office, according to a White House schedule.

"I don't really remember that visit," Mr. Kasich said Friday when asked in an interview what they talked about.

But the governor (and aspiring White House occupant) does recall one thing about his time in the Oval Office: "I remember them telling me I was going to get, like five minutes," he said. "And I thought that was a ridiculously short time."

What Ohio Gov. John Kasich is doing to public education in his state // WaPo // Valerie Strauss – July 20, 2015

With two-term Ohio Gov. John Kasich joining the crowd of candidates for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, it's a good time to look at the public education mess that has developed in his state under his leadership.

Kasich has pushed key tenets of corporate school reform:

*expanding charter schools — even though the state's charter sector is the most troubled in the country *increasing the number of school vouchers that use public money to pay for tuition at private schools, the vast majority of them religious — even though state officials say that fewer than one-third of those available were used by families this past school year)

*performance pay for teachers — even though such schemes have been shown over many years not to be useful in education *evaluating educators by student standardized test scores in math and reading — even though assessment experts have warned that using test scores in this way is not reliable or valid.

Meanwhile, the Ohio Education Department in Kasich's administration is in turmoil. David Hansen, his administration's chief for school choice and charter schools resigned over this past weekend after admitting that he had unilaterally withheld failing scores of charter schools in state evaluations of the schools' sponsor organizations so they wouldn't look so bad. (Hansen's wife, incidentally, is Kasich's chief of staff, who is taking a leave from that post to work on his campaign.) There are growing calls now for the resignation of the Kasich-backed state superintendent of education, Richard Ross.

Under his watch, funding for traditional public schools — which enroll 90 percent of Ohio's students — declined by some half a billion dollars, while funding for charter schools has increased at least 27 percent, with charters now receiving more public funds from the state per student than traditional public schools, according to the advocacy group Innovation Ohio. This despite the fact that many charters are rated lower than traditional public schools. Meanwhile, local governments have been forced to pass levies to raise millions of dollars in operating money for traditional public schools because of state budget cuts.

If Kasich's goal for his reform efforts was to close the achievement gap, it hasn't worked. The achievement gap in Ohio — when calculated by the Kasich-approved assessment method of using student standardized test scores in math and reading — is bigger than the national average, according to a new White House report. According to the report, Ohio has the country's ninth-largest reading gap between its highest- and lowest-performing schools, as well as the second-largest achievement gap in math, and the fourth largest gap in high school graduation rates.

If the goal of his reform efforts has been to expand "school choice" then he has succeeded — but not in any way that he would want to trumpet on his upcoming campaign. Ohio charters, which in 2013-14 educated more than 120,000 students, or 7 percent of the total public school enrollment in the state, as, according to this recent story in the Akron Beacon Journal, misspends tax dollars more than any other public sector in Ohio.

The newspaper reviewed 4,263 audits released last year by the state, and said that Ohio charter schools appear to have misspent public money "nearly four times more often than any other type of taxpayer-funded agency." It says that "since 2001, state auditors have uncovered $27.3 million improperly spent by charter schools, many run by for-profit companies, enrolling thousands of children and producing academic results that rival the worst in the nation."

The amount of misspending could be far higher, it says. Though Kasich promised in December 2014 to overhaul the charter sector and require more oversight, strong legislative efforts have gone pretty much nowhere so far.

Meanwhile, school vouchers — the vast majority of them for religious schools — have at least doubled in number under Kasich's administration; Ohio spent $99 million in public funds to pay for private school tuition in 2010, a year before Kasich became governor, and it was more than $200 million in the last school year. As Innovation Ohio noted, Kasich initially said he supported vouchers to help children from poor families escape awful schools, but now, middle-class students from great districts can get vouchers too. The advocacy groups says, "And since voucher money is deducted from the amount public school districts would otherwise receive, the end result is that taxpayers are now subsidizing religious and private school educations at the direct expense of the traditional public schools attended by their own children."

If Kasich's goal was to curb union power and reduce public oversight of public schools, then he has succeeded. Last week, he signed a controversial bill that "drastically changes how the state can step in to run 'failing' school districts," according to the Plain Dealer, "by creating a new CEO position, allowing mayors to appoint school board members and giving the CEO power to override parts of union contracts." The measure, the newspaper wrote, was introduced in the House and Senate, which held hearings on it, and approved it — all in one day. Aside from what can only be called a secretive process to get the bill approved, critics say it strips power away from voter-elected school boards.

The Plain Dealer is now reporting that Ross helped push that plan — which was hatched to allow official intervention in the troubled Youngstown district but will also affect others — without telling members of the state school board, which hired him … "even as the board planned, took and discussed a trip to Youngstown to review how an existing improvement plan was working."

And if Kasich's goal is to work deliberately with people in the education world, he needs some lessons in how to get along. Earlier this year, he said he would "take an ax" and slash funding of Ohio's public universities and colleges if they didn't cut costs themselves. The Columbus Dispatch quoted him as saying:

"I reserve the right … to say that within the course of the next year, if they do not enact these changes … I think you just start cutting funding and tell them to deal with it," Kasich said after meeting privately for an hour with presidents of two- and four-year colleges and universities in his cabinet room.

Kasich, incidentally, supports the Common Core State Standards and has criticized Republicans who turned against it, saying they were playing politics. He did support the Ohio legislature's recent decision to dump the federally funded Common Core test known as PARCC, after schools administered it in the 2014-15 school year and faced numerous problems with the online exams.

That is Kasich's public education record. In some crowds, it may be a great record to run on. To public school advocates, not so much.

John Kasich's anger management // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – July 20, 2015

John Kasich has a résumé seemingly tailor-made for a serious run for the Republican nomination: blue-collar upbringing, congressional budget hawk, Fox News commentator, investment banker, successful two-term governor of Ohio.

But there's just one problem, according to interviews with dozens of those who've worked in politics alongside him at various points over the past several decades: his short fuse.

There was the friend who excitedly called Kasich to tell him he was about to announce a campaign for statewide office, only to get a letdown of a reply: "How stupid are you?"

There was the wealthy conservative donor he raised his voice to during a Koch brothers-sponsored conference, prompting a walkout.

There was the BP employee who, in the middle of a meeting, found himself the target of Kasich's derision. "You know why oil and gas companies have a bad reputation?" the governor barked at him. "Because they deserve it."

There was the professor who wrote Kasich, then a young state senator, a letter of complaint about his education policies. "When you learn to write a civil letter," the brash lawmaker fired back, "I will respond accordingly."

Kasich, 63, is far from the only politician to face questions about his temperament. During his presidency, Bill Clinton was known to have lashed out at those who worked in the White House. Chris Christie's outbursts have become a trademark of sorts, proudly displayed in clips on the New Jersey governor's YouTube channel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the tales of angry tantrums have dogged Kasich throughout his long career, from the state Legislature, to the halls of Congress, to the governorship. So much so that even the famously volatile Sen. John McCain once said of Kasich: “He has a hair-trigger temper.”

And as the governor — who will formally declare his presidential bid during a Tuesday appearance at The Ohio State University — steps into the glare of the national spotlight, it seems certain that the questions about his bedside manner will only intensify.

Kasich’s advisers say his bluntness will appeal to frustrated voters looking for a tell-it-like-it-is candidate who has sharp elbows and authenticity.

“Even when voters disagree with him, they respect his willingness to speak truthfully about his views,” said Chris Schrimpf, a Kasich spokesman. “Many wind up thanking him for being so refreshing.”

Those who know Kasich insist that he doesn’t really have anger problems but is, rather, deeply intense — a pol who spurns the polished style that most of his colleagues embrace. He’s an acquired taste, they contend — the kind of person who gives a better second impression than a first. Yet as the primary season takes on a greater intensity, and as every word a candidate utters is put under a microscope, his temperament also presents a danger.

“There’s no question that John is very direct. He doesn’t waste anyone’s time. I find it refreshing. For other people, they can’t deal with that kind of directness,” said former Rep. Doug Ose, a California Republican who served with Kasich. “It depends on what your cup of tea is.”

Kasich’s “directness” dates back to the earliest days of his political career, when he demonstrated a willingness to confront constituents who criticized him.

“I received your curt, one-sentence letter,” Kasich wrote in an August 1981 missive to Larry Reutzel, a Boardman, Ohio, resident who’d promised to oppose the state senator’s reelection if he voted for a piece of legislation dealing with the state’s medical board. “I suggest you learn a little diplomacy before writing any more letters to members of the Legislature.”

The stories have kept coming since Kasich was first elected governor in 2010.

Matt Mayer, a conservative activist in Ohio, can recall an incident from 2011. He was walking down the street with a friend when they ran into Kasich and his entourage. Only months earlier, Mayer, who was working at a think tank called The Buckeye Institute, had released a report calling the state’s government bloated and inefficient.

Spotting the two, the governor ignored Mayer but pulled aside his friend, telling him something out of earshot. The friend walked back over. “I’m supposed to tell you the report’s wrong,” the friend said.

To the governor’s detractors, run-ins like those underscore his inability to accommodate the views of others. “When you criticize Kasich, you’re sort of dead to him,” said Mayer. “That’s the way it works.”

His defenders, though, highlight his direct style and willingness to engage with those who disagree. “If you’re not prepared to go head to head with him, it can be tough,” said former Rep. Pete Hoekstra, a Michigan Republican who served alongside Kasich.

Powerful interests aren't immune to the fire. In May 2013, the governor found himself clashing with the petroleum industry, which was battling his proposal for a tax hike on oil and gas. At a gathering of business professionals near Youngstown, his anger boiled over.

"Oil companies are liars and they are going to be screwed," he told a BP public relations staffer named Curtis Thomas, according to one person who'd obtained a transcript of the meeting. Kasich warned that an even higher tax than the one he proposed could go before voters. "Then you'll be crying to me."

"You said you wanted to be a good partner, but what do you do?" the governor asked. "You fight me. Do you think I want to work with people like that?"

Even Republican Party donors, a class that is accustomed to being courted and stroked by presidential hopefuls, have felt the venom. Last year, while appearing at a conference sponsored by the billionaire industrialists Charles and David Koch, Kasich collided with Randy Kendrick, the wife of Arizona Diamondbacks owner Ken Kendrick, who questioned him about why he'd said that his push for Medicaid expansion was what God wanted. "I don't know about you, lady," Kasich said as he pointed at Kendrick, his voice rising. "But when I get to the pearly gates, I'm going to have an answer for what I've done for the poor."

The exchange took many in the audience aback; about 20 people sitting in the crowd walked out. Two governors also on stage with Kasich, Nikki Haley of South Carolina and Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, told him they disagreed with his remarks.

Earlier this year, he clashed with another powerful donor, who during a private meeting pressed Kasich on whether he was entering the race too late. "You don't know what you're talking about," Kasich snapped at the donor, who wished to remain anonymous.

His blowups have not simply been behind the scenes. In January 2011, while speaking at at the Ohio Environmental Protection Agency, Kasich told a story about a police officer pulling him over on a highway for driving too close to an emergency vehicle. The police officer, the governor said several times, was an "idiot." Kasich would later meet with the officer to apologize.

Kasich's style, his friends say, is the product of his blue-collar upbringing in McKees Rocks, Pennsylvania, a hard-luck industrial town just outside of Pittsburgh where Kasich's father worked as a mailman.

"I never knew Kasich to have anger issues," said former Speaker Newt Gingrich, who spent more than a decade with Kasich in the House. "He has intensity, urgency and passion issues."

The Ohio Republican is particularly driven, the former speaker said, by a desire to correct the government's failures. "He doesn't see public policy as some abstract intellectual thing, but rather as an emotional, right and wrong process that can help or hurt people."

During a news conference in Washington, D.C., earlier this month, Kasich brushed aside a question about whether his temperament would hamper his presidential bid by pointing to his record of electoral success. Last year, he won a second term as governor by a landslide.

"I think people want someone is who direct," he said. "That's where I think they are on this."

While Kasich can be combative and prone to challenging the views of those around him, he can be equally reflective. Dave Hobson, a former Ohio congressman, recalled one flare-up at the Monocle, a popular Capitol Hill bar, during the 1990s. Kasich was in a heated argument with a fellow lawmaker about a policy issue. “He’d really gone at it. It was loud,” Hobson said. “I moved away from the table.”

A short while later, Kasich approached Hobson. It had occurred to him that he’d been on the wrong side of the argument.

“He got me, didn’t he?” the congressman asked.

Others talk about a caring side. A few years ago, Hoekstra called his former colleague to tell him that he was about leave the private sector to embark on a 2012 Senate bid.

“Hoekstra, how stupid are you?” Kasich snapped. “Why would you want to do that?” It was the kind of conversation, Hoekstra recalled, “that made you want to hold the phone 3 or 4 inches away from your head.” The governor spent “3 or 4 minutes” telling the former congressman why he was making a mistake.

The next time they spoke, though, Kasich was of a very different mindset. What, he wanted to know, could he do to help?

“He can be intimidating, but he’s always there to support the people that he’s dealing with,” said Hoekstra. “I have never seen an ounce of meanness.”

At times of great stress, and when political stakes are particularly high, Kasich can exhibit a surprising coolness. At one point during his tenure on the House Committee, Kasich found himself in an office with Floyd Spence, the longtime South Carolina congressman. Kasich was leading the charge to terminate funding for the B-2 bomber, an expensive aircraft that had been found to have design flaws. Spence, a member of the Armed Services Committee, was none too happy about it.

At one point in the meeting, according to one staffer present, Spence called Kasich a traitor.

Rather than lash out — as many were expecting him to do — the Ohio congressman was placid.

“Floyd,” he said calmly. “I’m sorry you feel that way.”

For all his fire, Kasich’s friends say, he doesn’t lack self-awareness.

Hobson said he recently ran into his former colleague, who made him a promise about his temper.

Does John Kasich have a shot? // CNN // Julian Zelizer – July 20, 2015

Just when it seemed as if every possible Republican was already in the primary contest for the 2016 party nomination, the field is getting even bigger.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This week, Ohio Gov. John Kasich will announce his candidacy. He is a pretty serious contestant. Unlike some of the others in the GOP cast of characters, his resume is impressive and he can boast of a record that seems rather formidable on paper.

Kasich has extensive experience in many levels of government as well as the private sector (though this will be a controversial part of his record, given that he worked for Lehman Brothers before its collapse).

Kasich has long-standing ties to the conservative movement that produced the historic Republican takeover of Congress in 1994. He is a budget hawk who has taken on the unions that so many in the GOP dislike.

Yet, as the governor of one of the most important swing states in the nation, Kasich has displayed a streak of pragmatism on issues such as the expansion of Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act, which can appeal to independents who are seeking someone who can move Washington beyond the partisan gridlock.

He has offered tough responses to conservatives who have criticized his work for the poor, grounding his decisions in his devotion to religion. The governor has an affable and straightforward personality, saying what he thinks, which can be appealing in an age of scripted politics. He is the kind of "blue collar" Republican who could avoid the "one percenter" attacks that dragged down Mitt Romney in 2012.

Nor does Gov. Kasich face the kind of scandals, at least thus far, that have bogged down candidates like New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

But Kasich enters the race with a number of pretty big obstacles working against him. The most important is money. One of the big reasons that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is so difficult to knock down is the extensive network of campaign donors that he and his family have nurtured over the years.

A few days ago, the media reported that Bush and his Super PAC had raised a stunning $114 million, more than all the other Republican candidates put together. Like it or not, money matters when it comes to campaigns.

While individual Super PACs do have the ability to propel lesser voices into the media spotlight, the fact is that to win the nomination, vast amounts of money will be necessary for the kind of advertising blitz that it takes to blanket major primary states, especially when primaries are bundled together.

While Kasich will be able to raise some serious money and make a run for it in Iowa and New Hampshire, he will need to make some dramatic gains if he wants to catch up to Bush and some of the other candidates, such as Marco Rubio and Scott Walker, in the money competition.

Bush has done very well in rounding up support from party leaders who by all indications are still tilting his way. Last month, Bush announced the names of an impressive roster of Republican leaders in Iowa who pledged their support.

Appealing and talented candidates have often suffered in the presidential nomination process. Former Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman, who many people thought had all the right stuff, did horribly in 2012 as he faced the formidable campaign infrastructure of Mitt Romney.

The number of candidates who are in play poses a big problem for Kasich and all the other second- and third-tier candidates -- regardless of their skill. The large number of people the media has to cover diminishes the air time for any individual candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The complexity of the pragmatic agenda Kasich seeks to pursue might quickly be lost in the sound bites that now last for a few seconds.

In the immediate future, he might not even be able to participate in the Republican debates. The large number of candidates who are running has resulted in the decision to limit the spots in the debate to those candidates who are ahead in the national polls. This will squeeze lesser known candidates, and those who have entered late, such as Gov. Kasich.

The reality is that someone like real estate mogul Donald Trump, willing to say or do almost anything to get on the air, has a better chance of participating in the debate even if he is far less impressive as a presidential candidate than Kasich.

Kasich's virtue, his unwillingness to bend to the expedient political incentives, will be a liability in the primary process. He will be tempted to abandon the political style he has practiced in recent years.

As we have seen, many of the candidates, including the so-called moderates, are already playing to the primary voters who tend to lean to the right of the political spectrum. In early April, Jeb Bush praised Indiana Gov. Mike Pence's controversial religious freedom bill, though he backed off after being criticized.

Gov. Scott Walker shifted to the right on immigration and gay marriage. If Kasich sticks to his guns and refuses to play their game, he will certainly run into problems in states like South Carolina, where primary voters have little appetite for the center. In a less crowded field, this might be fine. But given all the other challenges he faces, this will create difficulties.

It is true that, as Jeff Greenfield argued in Politico, there have been a number of cases in primaries, such as Reagan's challenge to Gerald Ford in 1976 or Ted Kennedy's challenge to Jimmy Carter in 1980, and more recently Howard Dean's strong showing in 2004 or Newt Gingrich and Rick Santorum's showing early in 2012, to remind us that primaries can be open-ended. Yet in all of those instances the "mainstream" candidate ultimately did win.

The irony is that Kasich might be one of the strongest candidates that the Republicans have on the ticket. But this primary season will leave little oxygen for him to move his way up to the top. It's probably time for both parties to start thinking through the fundamentals of their primary process to make sure that the strongest candidates are able to get the kind of hearing that they deserve from primary voters.

John Kasich is the most interesting GOP presidential contender // VOX // Andrew Prokop – July 20, 2015

n April 2013, Gov. John Kasich of Ohio spoke at a gathering of wealthy conservative donors hosted by the Koch brothers in Palm Springs. Around 20 people in the audience stood up and walked out on him.

At the time, Kasich was battling his own party over whether to accept Obamacare's Medicaid expansion. Since the federal government had promised to shoulder the vast majority of its cost, a few Republican governors in other states had started to sign on, for pragmatic reasons.

But none had done so quite like Kasich. Again and again, the Ohioan made an argument rarely heard from a Republican politician — that Medicaid had to be expanded to help the poor. Not only was it the smart and right thing to do, Kasich said, it was the Christian thing to do. And then he went further, suggesting that supporters of limited government had to do more to help the less fortunate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So as Kasich spoke on a panel during the Palm Springs conference, a donor — Randy Kendrick, wife of the wealthy owner of the Arizona Diamondbacks — pushed back. "A lady was yelling at me, saying, 'You're using God against your people,'" Kasich later recounted.

Irritated, the governor refused to backpedal. "I don't know about you, lady. But when I get to the pearly gates, I'm going to have an answer for what I've done for the poor," he said, according to Politico's Alex Isenstadt.

That's when audience members started walking out, while the other governors on the panel — Bobby Jindal and Nikki Haley — rushed to emphasize their disagreement with Kasich. The governor later told the Wall Street Journal's Neil King Jr. that the incident was "unforgettable," adding, "I really shouldn't speak about it, other than to say, 'God bless people who go to those events.'"

Kasich told the New York Times that his own party was waging a "war on the poor"

The consensus of the modern GOP is that trying to help the poor through government spending is ineffective or even counterproductive. Republicans simply don't argue that more government spending is a good way to help people — that's viewed as something liberals say. "It's the sort of straw man that I think President Obama would be impressed by," says Jason Hart, an Ohioan reporter for the conservative site Watchdog.org.

So Kasich's enthusiastic adoption of moral and religious rhetoric to promote a key plank of Obamacare was extremely unusual — and he took it quite seriously. He said that year that his "most important mission" was to convince conservatives that "when some of us are doing better, it is essential that we begin to figure out how to help people who are not doing better." His own party, he told the New York Times, was waging a "war on the poor."

As he's prepared for a presidential campaign — which he'll officially announce Tuesday — he hasn't backed off, instead arguing that his views are the truly conservative ones. "Read Matthew 25," Kasich said on Fox News a few months back. "Did you feed the hungry? Did you clothe the naked? If we're doing things like that, to me that is conservatism." He then bristled: "And you know what? I have a right to define conservatism as much as somebody sitting up in the stands down in Washington trying to tell us what we ought to do."

It's an agenda that's made Kasich — whose team didn't respond to requests for comment for this article — quite popular in Ohio. And his landslide reelection last year in one of the most important presidential swing states has made some think he could be a strong GOP presidential nominee.

But to supporters of government spending reductions, from the Koch brothers to Tea Party activists, rhetoric like Kasich's is quite dangerous. Because if you argue so passionately that federal spending programs really help people, those programs become quite hard to cut.

As a congressman, John Kasich was a lot like Paul Ryan

There was little about Kasich's decades-long political career that suggested he'd boast such fervor for expanding Medicaid. Instead, he's only slowly transformed himself from the very face of Republican budget cutting — the Paul Ryan of his day — to someone who argues that supporters of limited government aren't doing enough to help the poor.

Kasich first rose to national prominence because he produced detailed spending reform plans that Washington deemed serious. When he joined the House Budget Committee in 1989 as a junior member, he immediately began drafting and releasing his own budget each year, complete with far more dramatic spending cuts than those proposed by the Bush White House budget. He built up so much credibility that, like the similarly young and energetic Paul Ryan, he leapfrogged several more senior colleagues to become the Budget Committee chair after the GOP retook the House in 1994. He was 42 years old — the youngest committee chair in the chamber.

Kasich named his dog after a budget-cutting bill he had co-written

By all accounts, Kasich was obsessively committed to the task of slashing government spending. The Associated Press called him "a divorced workaholic" who "subsists mostly on pizza and instant noodle soup," and Cox News Service wrote that he had "little personal life." When a spending cut bill he authored with Democratic Rep. Timothy Penny became famous in DC as the "Penny-Kasich" proposal, Kasich named his dog after it. But unlike Paul Ryan, whose political persona is unfailingly cheerful and polite, Kasich has always had a harsher edge. Words like "headstrong," "brash," and "argumentative," fill profiles of him. (He hasn't softened up as governor, where his prickliness has become the stuff of legend.)

As part of Kasich's effort to cut spending, he challenged some of Washington's entrenched interest groups — from defense hawks to protectors of farm subsidies and corporate tax breaks. He achieved only mixed success on those fronts, and his proposals for ambitious reforms of entitlements — like block-granting Medicaid — didn't get off the ground at all. But eventually, he helped broker the 1997 balanced budget agreement between President Clinton and congressional Republicans. The budget didn't stay balanced long, but it's an achievement Kasich still touts today.

Still, the ambitious young congressman wanted to rise even further. He announced in 1999 that he'd explore a presidential campaign, and spent months on the trail in early primary states. Once there, however, he concluded that his obsessive focus on budget cutting was misplaced, and that a Republican candidate needed a message with broader appeal to get elected. "The public is not yelling for spending cuts," he told the Associated Press. He tried to mention his faith and religious convictions more often, so he wouldn't be viewed as only a stingy accountant.

It didn't work. George W. Bush raised far more money, and firmly entrenched himself as the frontrunner in the polls. Kasich concluded he couldn't win, and quit the race that July. Term-limited out of his budget chairmanship, he also decided not to run for another term in the House. Recently remarried and expecting his first child, Kasich was ready for a break from politics. He said, modestly, "I accomplished everything I ever set out to accomplish in the House of Representatives."

But as he endorsed Bush, Kasich couldn't resist expressing some envy in response to Bush's campaign message. "This business of compassionate conservative," he said. "I wish I'd thought it up."

In March 2011, his third month as governor, Kasich signed a major bill to roll back public sector workers' collective bargaining rights.

But by the time Kasich finally returned to politics in 2010 — after an interim working at Lehman Brothers, as well as hosting a Fox News show — the Tea Party was in ascendance, and far-right economic policies were back in vogue. Since Ohio's economy was badly damaged by the recession, Kasich decided to take on the incumbent Gov. Ted Strickland. During the campaign, Kasich pointed to his own anti-tax, anti-spending record, saying, "I think I was in the Tea Party before there was a Tea Party."

He won, and when he was sworn in the next January, it looked like he was ready to govern from the right. Near the top of his agenda was a bill to roll back collective bargaining for public employees, like Scott Walker's platform in Wisconsin. "We're not going after anybody's rights," Kasich said at a press conference. "What we're doing is we're balancing, restoring some power with taxpayers." As hundreds of protesters flooded into the statehouse, Kasich lobbied reluctant state senators to back the bill and helped it pass, as reported by Henry Gomez of the Northeast Ohio Media Group in "Kasich 5.0," the definitive profile series on the governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"No one has tried this level of reform, that I'm aware of in the country, including Wisconsin," Kasich bragged

On March 31, 2011, Kasich signed the reforms into law — and in many ways, the final package went further than Walker's. While Ohio public employees could still bargain over wages, they could no longer bargain over health care or pensions. "Ohio's law also gives city councils and school boards a free hand to unilaterally impose their side's final contract offer when management and union fail to reach a settlement," the New York Times's Steven Greenhouse wrote. And the bill applied to police and firefighters, who were exempted from Walker's law. "No one has tried this level of reform, that I'm aware of in the country, including Wisconsin," Kasich bragged.

The backlash was swift and severe. Kasich's approval-disapproval rating plummeted to 30-46. And unlike in Wisconsin, the union countermobilization in Ohio was actually successful. In the Badger State, there was no way unions could get the law itself put up for a statewide vote of approval or disapproval. But Ohio's constitution allowed them to do so, if enough signatures were gathered — a task they soon accomplished. Though Kasich campaigned in favor of the law, when the state's voters cast their ballots in November 2011 he lost overwhelmingly, 61 to 38.

Kasich's signature first-year achievement had been wiped out. "It's time to pause," he said at a news conference. "The people have spoken clearly." Asked what they said, the governor responded: "They might have said it was too much too soon."

Kasich embraced Medicaid expansion with a convert's zeal

Over a year later, when Kasich announced that he'd expand Medicaid, he sounded like a new man. "I'm not a supporter of Obamacare," the governor said when he announced his decision during his 2013 State of the State address. But, he continued, "my personal faith in the lessons I learned from the Good Book" is "very important to me — not just on Sunday, but just about every day."

During his speech, delivered at the Veterans Memorial Civic Center in Lima, Ohio, the governor argued that the working poor, the mentally ill, and the addicted — the people who need help most — would benefit from his decision. "They can't afford health care. What are we going to do, leave them out in the street? Walk away from them, when we have a chance to help them?" He continued: "For those that live in the shadows of life, those who are the least among us, I will not accept the fact that the most vulnerable in our state should be ignored. We can help them."

When the US Supreme Court had effectively made the Medicaid expansion optional for states in 2012, governors across the country were faced with a choice about whether to accept federal dollars to expand Medicaid to everyone whose income was lower than 138 percent of the federal poverty line. In Kasich's case, this number was estimated to include 366,000 Ohioans.

Supporters of the Medicaid expansion argued that it would be the only affordable way for many low-income people to obtain health insurance. That's because Obamacare's design creates a coverage gap — people with incomes below the federal poverty level made too little money to qualify for subsidized private insurance from the exchanges, but didn't qualify for traditional Medicaid.

It was the percentage of the expansion that would be paid for by the feds, though, that was most relevant to many governors concerned with their bottom line. For three years, states would pay nothing at all — and the federal government would pay 90 percent or more of the expansion's cost afterward. Furthermore, states seemed to get nothing out of saying no — if a state refused to participate, its residents' federal tax dollars would still go toward funding the expansion elsewhere.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To many governors and policy wonks across the country — including Kasich — the expansion seemed to be a no-brainer. And the governor believed he could implement it in a free market way. He proposed to apply for a special waiver from the federal government, so Ohio could give the new beneficiaries private — not government — insurance. To him, the right thing to do also appeared to be the smart thing to do.

When his own party resisted, Kasich rammed through the expansion

But within days of Kasich's announcement, Ohio Republicans and Tea Party groups started lining up to oppose his plan. "There is no free money," Josh Mandel, the Republican state treasurer and a conservative favorite, wrote in a letter urging state legislators to vote against the expansion. "In the long term Ohioans will have to repay the debt." Soon, two dozen Tea Party groups in the state wrote a similar missive. "Borrowing taxpayer dollars to pay for an expanded entitlement program does not solve the long term problem of affordable health care," Marianne Gasiecki of the Ohio Tea Party Patriots told the Associated Press.

"People who believe we shouldn’t spend more money than we have were opposed to it"

Nationally, many conservatives had turned against the Medicaid expansion too. Some critics objected that the federal government couldn't be trusted to deliver on its generous funding promises, and that states might be stuck footing more of the bills in future years. Others argued that Medicaid provided inferior insurance that should be reformed rather than expanded — or that federal spending simply shouldn't be expanded at all.

"The Medicaid expansion was supported by all the business groups and the unions," says Hart, the Watchdog.org reporter who has frequently criticized the governor. "So Kasich and his supporters describe the opposition as just ideological — and to an extent, that's true. People who believe in limited government, people who believe we shouldn’t spend more money than we have, were opposed to it. Because we saw it as a bad policy that would increase the spending problem we had at the national level."

Ohio Rising, a Tea Party group, soon launched an ad campaign with "TV, radio, direct mail and online advertising to urge Republican primary voters in key legislative districts to press lawmakers to oppose the expansion plan," as reported by Jackie Borchardt of the Dayton Daily News. "We sincerely believe this is really bad for Ohio and really bad for the long-term financial stability of Ohio," Chris Littleton, the group's head, told her.

The result? By April, House Speaker William Batchelder (R) said 20 members of his caucus "might shoot themselves" rather than vote for Medicaid expansion. He ended up dropping Kasich's Medicaid plan from the budget entirely, and the state Senate decided not to include it either.

But when faced with this opposition, Kasich only grew more obstinate and determined. "I will not give up this fight till we get this done. Period. Exclamation point," he told reporters. "I'm not gonna give this up. I will not. I don’t care how long it takes."

"Reagan was fiscally responsible, but he was also pragmatic and compassionate"

So the governor soon launched a remarkable public pressure campaign aimed at the recalcitrant legislators. At one rally, he said, "You must rally your friends and family to go and see them, and to make it clear that saying ‘no’ is not an option." At another: "Kick them in the shins if they're not going to vote for this." To reporters: "Because people are poor doesn't mean they don't work hard. ... The most important thing for this legislature to think about: Put yourself in somebody else’s shoes. Put yourself in the shoes of a mother and a father with an adult child that's struggling. Walk in somebody else’s moccasins. Understand that poverty is real."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

All this was to no avail — by the fall, it was clear that the legislature wouldn't budge. So Kasich simply moved ahead without them.

In October 2013, the governor announced that he would bypass the full legislature and expand Medicaid through a highly unusual maneuver. He'd go to a state body called the "Controlling Board," which was created to handle adjustments to the state's budgetary flow, and ask them to simply decide to let the federal Medicaid money come in. (This tactic forced him to drop his attempt to use private insurance to cover the new beneficiaries, which would have required legislative approval.)

In an op-ed explaining his decision, Kasich wrapped himself in the banner of a conservative hero: "Reagan was fiscally responsible, but he was also pragmatic and compassionate," he wrote. "When we consider what Reagan would do, let's also remember what he did do — expand Medicaid."

But activists like Tim Phillips — the head of Americans for Prosperity, a free market group founded by and closely tied to the Koch brothers — pushed back hard. "We think it’s pretty outrageous that a governor would then go around the elected representatives of the people and go to an unelected board," Phillips told the Los Angeles Times.

"I am so excited about the fact that we have been able to reach out to many people who had been forgotten"

The Controlling Board, staffed by one appointee from the governor and six others appointed by the legislative leadership (four Republicans and two Democrats), was a convenient — if legally questionable — vehicle for ramming the expansion through. It was typically used for much more minor projects. Yet the votes of Kasich's appointee and the two appointees from Democratic leaders were never in doubt. And when the two appointees from Speaker Batchelder looked like they'd vote no, Batchelder simply replaced them. The final count was 5-2 in favor.

As with many things related to Obamacare, the new policy soon became entangled in legal wrangling. Two conservative groups and six Republican legislators filed a suit arguing that Kasich's maneuver was illegal and overstretched the Controlling Board's authority. But though the case went to Ohio's Supreme Court, the governor's move was upheld. "Obviously, we're pleased with the court's ruling," Kasich's spokesperson Rob Nichols said at the time, "and glad that Ohio can now move forward."

Kasich had won. The expansion was implemented, and by the end of 2014, it had let hundreds of thousands more Ohioans get Medicaid. At the same time, Kasich's popularity rebounded — in one poll, 55 percent of Ohioans approved of his job performance, and only 30 percent disapproved. And while campaigning for reelection in 2014, he was also fortunate enough to have his Democratic challenger implode in scandal. It was a landslide year for Republicans everywhere, but especially for Kasich — he ended up with a massive 31-point victory.

"I am so excited about the fact that we have been able to reach out to many people who had been forgotten," Kasich said in his victory speech. "Whether they're the mentally ill, or whether they're the drug addicted, or whether they're the working poor."

"Nothing good is ever lost," Kasich continued. "Anything you ever do to lift someone else, to give them a chance, to improve their lives, to give them some hope — if it's just one person — it will be recorded in the book of life. And will follow you through eternity."

What Kasich did will certainly follow him through the Republican primaries, where he'll begin his campaign as a serious underdog. This week, he'll be the 16th GOP candidate to enter the race. He's currently ranked around 12th place in national polls, and hasn't yet topped 3 percent in a single one. As a result, he may well fail to qualify for the first debates.

On paper, Kasich appears to present an appealing profile for any Republicans seeking an accomplished but less polarizing alternative to Jeb Bush and Scott Walker. Ohio is a key swing state, and Kasich remains quite popular there, fresh off his landslide win. He also has some financial support: An outside group supporting him has raised $11.5 million so far — not Bush money, but enough for a healthily funded pro-Kasich ad campaign to start airing in New Hampshire, aimed at driving up his numbers in the early primary state that's most crucial to his chances.

"[St. Peter] is going to ask you what you did for the poor. You better have a good answer."

Additionally, Kasich would be one of the only candidates seriously suggesting that the GOP moderate on economic issues. After the 2012 elections, party elites quickly concluded that their problems could be solved by moderating on immigration policy — but commentators like Ross Douthat and David Frum pointed to the GOP economic agenda instead, arguing it was too oriented toward the wealthy. Kasich's approach may not be quite what they had in mind, but if his success in Ohio is any indication, swing voters might like it.

The risk for a candidate like Kasich is that he could end up like Jon Huntsman, the former Utah governor and 2012 presidential candidate who couldn't restrain himself from repeatedly pointing out how wrong he thought the Republican base was about everything. Huntsman's campaign, unsurprisingly, went nowhere. (Two key consultants for the infamously dysfunctional effort have now joined Kasich's team.)

The danger is real, because there's already some serious resentment for Kasich and his tactics among conservatives. If Kasich runs for president, the Washington Examiner's Philip Klein wrote earlier this year, "it will be important for conservative voters to punish him for his expansion of President Obama's healthcare law." Klein continued: "Just like a liberal demagogue, he portrayed those with principled objections to spending more taxpayer money on a failing program as being heartless."

Conservative health wonk Avik Roy concurred. "He’s really calling into question the character and the motivation of those who disagree with him on the Medicaid expansion, pretty much literally saying that you’re going to rot in hell if you didn’t agree," Roy told the Columbus Dispatch in March. "I would say that it’s highly probable that many conservative Christians will be offended [to hear] that they’re not good Christians if they don’t support a massive expansion of government health care." (Roy later took a job with Rick Perry.)

"I think it's pretty offensive, frankly," says Hart, the Watchdog.org reporter. "He's expanding this federal welfare program, taking more money from taxpayers, funneling it through the government, and running it through this pretty ineffective Medicaid program. And he's treating it as if it’s morally and practically the same thing as taking your own money and choosing to give it out in your community where you see a need."

These critics are correct that there's an element of incoherence to Kasich's argument, when viewed in philosophical terms. It seems to not really gel with his overall, decades-long project of slashing government and taxes — and, of course, with his continued advocacy for the repeal of Obamacare. It's also not entirely clear, for instance, whether the moral imperative to help the least fortunate only kicks in if the federal government happens to be footing the bill for your state.

But by acknowledging that Obamacare's Medicaid expansion really does help a great many people, Kasich sees himself as recognizing an obvious fact that other conservatives contort themselves to deny. And he's also contradicting the widely held belief on the right that government can't do anything good.

The pointed sales pitch he described himself making to a legislator in 2013 doubles as his challenge to the GOP as a whole:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I said, "I respect the fact that you believe in small government. I do, too. I also happen to know that you're a person of faith. Now, when you die and get to the meeting with St. Peter, he's probably not going to ask you much about what you did about keeping government small. But he is going to ask you what you did for the poor. You better have a good answer. "

Yet not everyone appears to be buying what Kasich is selling. Charles Koch announced in April that he'd winnowed the burgeoning GOP field to five main contenders. Kasich, unsurprisingly, wasn't among them.

And as for wealthy Koch donor network events like the one Kasich caused such a stir at? He hasn't been invited back.

John Kasich keeps it real, maybe too real // Yahoo // Matt Bai – July 20, 2015

The last time I'd hung out with John Kasich, on a plane ride across Ohio three years earlier, he had offered me life advice from Gandalf the wizard. ("You're a very fine fellow, Mr. Hobbit, but this is a wide world, and you don't think all these things happen by accident.") So it didn't really surprise me when, within two minutes of sliding into our booth at the Frisch's Big Boy diner in Columbus last Friday, he started pressing me to revisit Judaism.

"Do you go to synagogue?" Ohio's governor asked me, while his press aide was off on an ill-advised break to get water for the boss. "Do you read the Torah? Maybe you should. Do you realize how much wisdom there is there for life?"

Feeling oddly shamed, I mumbled something about being busy.

"I just find that it kind of tells us the best way to live our lives, and we get to learn from the mistakes of others and the strengths of others," Kasich went on. He was wearing a light blue golf shirt and had just come from a haircut. "So I don't know why we wouldn't be reading that. What's more important than that book? So you don't read it. So maybe you'll think about it."

Kasich, who will announce his entry into the presidential race Tuesday, offered that he himself had been "slipping away" lately, unable to find the time to read Scripture. (Born Catholic, he converted to an evangelical brand of Protestantism after a drunk driver killed his parents 28 years ago.) Then he paused, and all at once he seemed to relent, as if catching himself in an old and irritating habit.

"Hey, look, man, I'm lost, OK?" he said, gently throwing up his hands. "So that's just the way it goes."

Lost?

"I don't have things figured out. I'm not that great a guy. So who am I to — I'm acting like, 'Well, listen to me, I can tell you.' Well, you know, it's an easy thing to say but harder to do."

I wondered aloud if calling yourself lost, even in the nonsecular sense, was an odd way to embark on a presidential campaign.

"What I'm saying is I'm a flawed man," Kasich told me. "When I say I'm lost, it's because I look and I say — first of all, I'm not running yet, and second, when I say that, I mean that I don't always know the way, in terms of the depths of my life, my heart and my conscience. I try to work on these things and study these things."

He shook his head.

"You know. I was lost, and I guess now I'm found. But it's not an easy road."

Kasich seemed to be enjoying this conversation about his spiritual self-doubt, and I was too. But having talked to some of his friends and advisers, I could almost hear their collective groan. Why does the guy have to do this kind of thing?

If you were going to sit down and sketch, on paper, the ideal Republican candidate for 2016, you might come up with a résumé a lot like Kasich's. The son of a mailman, he was elected to Congress when he was 30 and went on to become the forceful and reform-minded chairman of the powerful House Budget Committee, where he helped negotiate balanced budgets in the 1990s.

After a decade working for Lehman Brothers and hosting his own show on Fox News, Kasich got himself elected to the governorship in 2010 and reelected with 64 percent of the vote last year, having presided over an impressive economic turnaround. As governors like Scott Walker and Chris Christie struggle to explain their unpopularity at home, Kasich, who closed a $6 billion budget gap even while slashing taxes and trying to eliminate the income tax altogether, boasts an approval rating of over 60 percent.

And yet, when the fantasy-baseball crowd of presidential politics shows up on cable TV, the 63-year-old Kasich is never in what they call the top tier. And that's because the popular narrative holds that he may just be too impetuous and too self-involved to be president — in other words, that he's the kind of guy who shows up to an interview and starts proselytizing, just because it's on his mind.

When at last I changed the subject and raised this unflattering narrative with Kasich, he brushed it aside as the stuff of Beltway arrogance.

"A lot of people used to say that I was undisciplined, OK?" he told me. "I mean, come on. How do you balance the budget or fix Ohio or do what I did for the 10 years I was out and be undisciplined? But I'm not real good at being programmed. I don't like to be programmed. I like to be able to be real.

"Keeping it real — who said that?" Kasich asked me. "Whoever said that, I like it."

I've written before that in politics, as in life, your greatest strengths always turn out to be your greatest weaknesses. Just look at the 2016 Republican field.

Jeb Bush is a known quantity with a famous name, but his biggest vulnerability is that all that history links him too firmly to the past. Scott Walker has a black-and-white way of framing issues, but that also means he may struggle to demonstrate much depth. Marco Rubio has the advantage of being young and culturally different. The problem there is that he's young and culturally different.

So it is with Kasich. No one's ever said the guy isn't extraordinarily bright and dynamic, with a working-class authenticity and probing intellect that have always made him politically unpredictable.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As one of Newt Gingrich's chief lieutenants in the '90s, Kasich went after corporate welfare and the B-2 bomber program. As a conservative governor eyeing the presidency, he accepted the president's expansion of Medicaid and has been a vocal champion of set-asides for minority contractors.

Kasich has an instinctive aversion to anything that sounds like talking points or triteness. Curt Steiner, a longtime adviser to Ohio Republicans, described this quality to me as "dissonance," by which he means that Kasich, like a jazz musician, will riff in a way that seems discordant but somehow resonates on a deeper level.

But presidential politics isn't improv. It is thought to require a fair amount of rote repetitiveness and diplomacy (which is why Donald Trump, for all his P.T. Barnum-like panache, will likely flame out before the snow falls in Manchester).

It also requires a good deal of grace, which is something Kasich, with all that working-class authenticity and the latent resentment that sometimes comes with it, often has a hard time holding on to. One of his worst moments as governor came when a video surfaced showing a belligerent Kasich, in a lecture to government employees, referring to a state cop who once pulled him over as an "idiot."

A few weeks ago, the website of the Cleveland Plain Dealer ran this headline over an op-ed by Brent Larkin, its former editorial page editor: "Ohio Gov. John Kasich runs the risk of being perceived as a jerk." You'd have to think they were going for subtlety.

As we sat in Frisch's, a diner Kasich finds so uplifting that he once felt moved to call the owner and leave him a complimentary voicemail, Kasich insisted that the rest of the country was about to meet a politician who had grown more measured with age.

"Initially I was a ball of fire in this job," he said, recalling his early years in the Statehouse. "You just mature. There's no question I'm different than I was. I would hope that, look, when I'm 80 I'm going to be better than I am now."

Kasich said he had learned to be more like the father of his state. It was a telling analogy; Gingrich had suggested to me that having raised twin daughters (they're now 15) had mellowed Kasich considerably over the years, as fatherhood often does.

"My wife told me that one time," Kasich said. "She said, 'You're the father of Ohio. Would you act like it?'"

So would Kasich need to rein himself in during the long slog ahead?

"Look, the people of this state rewarded me unlike they've rewarded anybody," he said. "We can all get better. But you know, you also don't want to take the starch out of John Kasich either, do you? My closest friends, my wife, they will tell me where they think I can improve, and I will listen to them.

"But I'm not going to read a column in a newspaper written by somebody that I don't know, or nobody that's ever spent any real time with me. What do they know? They don't know me!"

Neither did I, or not really. A few minutes later, Kasich abruptly cut me off in the middle of a question. "You know what it is about you?" he said, staring across the table.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I braced myself, expecting some kind of anti-Washington tirade.

“I think you get me,” Kasich declared. “You don’t get all of me. But you get more.”

I started to say I might. Then he leaned forward and cut me off again.

“You know, in Washington, if you’re a congressman down there, do you know how much energy it takes to move that system?” Kasich asked, his voice rising. “Do you know how amazing it is to limit the production of a major defense program? Do you know how hard it is to move the system and balance the frickin’ budget? Do you know what that takes?

“So when people say, ‘He has too much energy’ or ‘He’s too strong’ or whatever — you can’t get anything done otherwise! I was in Congress! President is a little different. Governor is a little different. You call the tune.”

The strange thing here is that whatever impressions linger of Kasich’s temperament are almost certainly lost on actual voters. Most of them won’t remember him from Congress 20 years ago, and in any event they’re going to get an up-close look at the man in the weeks ahead. They can decide for themselves.

But Kasich is getting into the race late (he’s No. 16, if anyone’s bothering to keep track anymore), and the battle for activists and money is intense. Whether the popular governor of Ohio can position himself as a serious contender among party insiders will depend, in part, on whether they believe he’s truly evolved.

Kasich’s team clearly understands the importance of dispelling the old image. Earlier this month, his PAC released what amounts to his first campaign ad, produced by Fred Davis, the renegade adman best known for creating the infamous “demon sheep” spot for Carly Fiorina’s doomed Senate run in California.

The ad opens with a cacophonous mash-up of all the other candidates’ clichéd rhetoric, followed by a female voice asking: “Hey, what about us?” Then there’s Kasich, in a sober dark suit and white shirt and graying noticeably, telling his story in a relaxed, fatherly tone.

It’s easily the best ad of the early presidential season so far — not just because it feels fresher and more authentic than anything else but because it goes right to the heart of Kasich’s challenge. Talking to the camera, he seems calm, confident, in control.

He seems undeniably presidential.

Kasich, as you may recall, ran for president once before, in the run-up to the 2000 election. Although he was 47 at the time, he describes himself then as a “kid,” and that’s probably an accurate summation of what Republican voters thought, too. The party establishment closed ranks around a governor named George W. Bush and blocked off the avenues for just about everyone else, and Kasich ran out of cash.

“I just kept running into the wall and couldn’t crack anything,” Kasich told me. “It was unusual. It was unusual for me in that no matter how hard I worked at it, I didn’t feel like I was making progress.”

I pointed out that he had never waged a losing campaign before then (and hasn’t since). He shook his head impatiently.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“No, I’m talking about life,” he said. “When I keep struggling and keep working at something, I can usually get somewhere. I have to say, and I guess I never really thought about it this way, Matt, but I think it was just the frustration of feeling like I didn’t make any progress.”

You would think the memory of this might give Kasich pause as he surveys the terrain for 2016. Here again, his party’s establishment is enamored of a guy named Bush, with all the fundraising and organizing muscle the name brings with it. To this point, Kasich barely registers in national polls and is very much in danger of being cut out of the first debate next month, while Donald Trump and Ben Carson command the stage. Worse yet, the debate happens to be in Cleveland.

When I raised the specter of this humiliation with Kasich, he tried to sound Zen. “Well, you’re not a fortune teller, are you?” he asked me. “I don’t control that. I worry about things that I can have some impact on. And things I can’t — what am I going to do? Whine?”

In fact, 2015 really isn’t much like 1999. This time, the Bush in the field is leading polls with only a small plurality, and according to an exhaustive analysis by Nicholas Confessore and Sarah Cohen in the New York Times last weekend, the “vast majority” of Republican fundraisers and contributors have thus far been sitting this one out, waiting for the field to take shape.

Kasich may be the last major entrant into the race (Jim Gilmore, the former Virginia governor, is apparently still planning to get in, for some reason), but that also means he won’t feel as played out as some of the contenders who have been hanging around for months already. You could see how voters in Iowa might already be tired of Walker, who’s been up and down so much by now that the media actually billed his announcement speech as a comeback.

And Kasich has not only a strong case to make, in terms of his success in Ohio, but also a style that suits the moment. The most successful candidates of the modern era — Bill Clinton, George W. Bush, Barack Obama — have managed not only to capture the bases of their parties but also to co-opt the reform ethos that seems to resurface with every election. Even as they’re pushed into ideological camps, voters, and especially younger voters, feel less connected to the artifice and predictability of party politics and yearn for something real.

Kasich is probably better situated to exploit that impulse than any other candidate. The trick for him is to somehow walk the line of candor without crossing the boundary into provocation — to come across as the grownup alternative who defies convention and orthodoxy, rather than another quick-tongued challenger starved for attention.

Near the end of our conversation at Frisch’s, I asked Kasich about Hillary Clinton. Republicans — like just about everyone else right now — assume she’ll be the Democratic nominee, and one of the central questions for candidates this fall will be how they intend to beat her after losing two consecutive elections.

“I’ve known her a long time,” Kasich told me. “I think it’s all about a big vision. That’s what it’s all about. Who’s got the bigger vision. Who can connect best and give people the sense that they’re going to be treated fairly, that we’re going to be unified. I mean, I have my views of Hillary, which at some point I will express.”

He started in on a preview of what the Kasich vision will sound like.

“There’s a concern in this country that the American dream is being eroded, that maybe my kids won’t have it as good as I got it from my parents,” Kasich began. For a moment, I assumed he was going to sound like every other Republican candidate who prattles on about the American dream, but then came one of those Kasich riffs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Does the system work? Is the system fair? Is the system crooked? Is anybody looking out for me? Am I all alone? ‘Bowling Alone.’ I never read the book, but I should.

“And I think it’s a person that has the credibility to say, ‘No. Stop it. We can do it. This can work. This is a great country! We’re going to be OK! And here’s some things we’re going to do, and you’re not going to get shafted, and if we have to do some things where we have to sacrifice, no one’s going to be left out. If you know somebody, you’re not going to get special treatment. If you’re the underdog, we love you.’”

I sat there for a moment, trying to imagine the power this message could have, if he could keep from getting sidetracked or petulant. That’s the thing about dissonance: When it’s not jarring to the ear, it can grab you by the throat.

Kasich joins GOP race on Tuesday // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – July 20, 2015

John Kasich on Tuesday will enter the Republican race for the White House needing a burst of momentum to claim a spot in the first GOP debate scheduled on Aug. 6 in the Ohio governor's home state.

Kasich joins the fight with the respect of establishment Republicans and conservative media pundits, who have long seen him as a potential rival to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

But he's little known nationally, and polls have him falling outside the GOP's top 10 — which would keep him off the debate stage in Cleveland next month.

“His central problem is that he has all of Jeb’s weaknesses and lacks some of his strengths,” said Republican strategist Matt Mackowiak.

To do well, Kasich needs to jumpstart his campaign with a successful launch from Ohio State University.

Kasich plans to pitch himself to primary voters as the only candidate in the field with experience on Capitol Hill, in the private sector and as governor. He's putting most of his chips on a solid showing in New Hampshire, where he'll be running in the same mainstream conservative lane as Chris Christie and Bush —who has so far outraised Kasich by about a 10-to-1 margin.

Kasich’s late launch date could be perfectly timed to help propel him into debate contention.

The polling difference between Kasich and the candidates currently in 9th and 10th place are negligible, and his entrance into the race in late July could give him the bump he needs.

“It’s critical for him to get into that debate, just like it’s critical for everyone, so he’ll be looking for a short-term boost from his announcement,” said Republican pollster David Winston, a veteran of Newt Gingrich’s 2012 campaign. “It could come down to how compelling an argument he makes during his launch.”

Fox News is capping the number of participants at 10 based on national polling numbers. Kasich is currently in 12th place, according to the RealClearPolitics average of polls, taking only 1.5 percent support.

So far this year, GOP candidates have seen varying degrees of bounces in the wake of their announcements. Sens.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ted Cruz (Texas) and Marco Rubio (Fla.), as well as Ben Carson, got sizeable bounces in the immediate aftermath of their announcements. Others, like Christie and Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.), got almost no bounce at all.

Kasich's team is downplaying the importance of the debate, arguing that their focus is squarely on the early voting states, and New Hampshire in particular. Spending by New Day for America, the nonprofit group supporting Kasich's presidential bid, backs up that claim.

Rather than pumping money into national television ads, as some candidates are doing to raise their profiles ahead of the debates, New Day for America launched a second round of ads this week that will run in the Granite State.

"That's a much sounder investment of our resources," New Day for America spokesman Chris Schrimpf told The Hill.

Kasich could face some of the same troubles with the base that have dogged Bush. He unapologetically supports Common Core education standards, has said he would be open to supporting a pathway to citizenship for those in the country illegally, and he expanded Medicaid in Ohio under ObamaCare.

At his alma mater, Kasich is expected to hammer home the argument that he's the most experienced candidate in the field, highlighting a decades-long record that has taken him from Washington, to Wall Street to Columbus.

Kasich spent 18 years representing Ohio's 12th district. He rose to chairman of the Budget Committee and points frequently to his role in achieving a balanced federal budget under former President Bill Clinton.

Kasich also spent time on the Armed Services Committee, making him the rare governor running for president who can boast of having substantial foreign policy experience.

Following his time in Congress, Kasich worked for Lehman Brothers, before returning to politics and unseating former Ohio Gov. Ted Strickland (D-Ohio) in 2010. In 2014, Kasich won reelection in a landslide, carrying 86 of the 88 counties in a state that will be critical in determining the outcome of the 2016 election.

"He is uniquely qualified to lead the country," Schrimpf said. "Nobody else can say they balanced the federal budget, have executive experience running a major state, and have the kind of foreign policy experience he has. He's the total package."

Republicans say that Kasich is a natural fit for the Independent and mainstream conservatives primary voters in New Hampshire, and his political team appears poised to all-in there.

New Day for America, which hauled in an impressive $11.5 million in the second quarter, put $1.7 million behind a first round of ads introducing Kasich to New Hampshire voters. The group declined to say how much it put behind a second round of ads launched Tuesday, but called the investment "significant."

Kasich will have the support of former Sen. John E. Sununu, whose family has a towering political presence in New Hampshire.

And following his launch, Kasich will conduct five townhall-style events in New Hampshire over a three-day period. It's a forum Republicans say will showcase Kasich's strength as a charismatic, no-nonsense straight-shooter.

“It’s a style that plays well up here,” said Tom Rath, a GOP strategist in New Hampshire and senior adviser to Mitt Romney's 2012 campaign. “The more I talk to people out here, the more his name comes up. He’s going to get a look.”

But even if Kasich can get out of New Hampshire with a win or a high finish, some in the party remain skeptical that he has broader appeal to Republican primary voters. Like Bush, Kasich has said he won’t back away from positions on education, immigration or healthcare.

“I think he has bigger problems with the conservative base than he realizes,” said Mackowiak.

Team Kasich is betting that his unapologetic and unconventional style will win over skeptical Republicans and bring new Independent voters into the fold.

Rath noted that about one-third of New Hampshire primary voters could be self-described independent voters, giving the electorate a more moderate flavor.

“I think what’s going to appeal to folks, and independents in particular, is that he’s not someone who plays politics,” Schrimpf said. “He’s going to do what’s best for his state or best for the country, not just give you the political answers you want to hear. He’s going to tell the truth, and people respond to someone who doesn’t change with the political winds.”

GOP blasts President Obama’s ‘capitulation’ to U.N. on Iran // Politico // Burgess Everett – July 20, 2015

Influential Republicans and a handful of Democrats howled in protest Monday over President Barack Obama’s decision to seek the United Nations’ blessing for the Iran nuclear deal before Congress has had a chance to weigh in. The move, critics said, appeared designed to box Congress in by signaling that international sanctions on Iran are going away regardless of whether Congress accepts or rejects the deal.

But there were few signs that that bipartisan frustration will translate into new opposition in Congress to the Iran deal as its 60-day review period officially kicked off.

Influential Republicans called it “inappropriate” and an “affront” to Americans that the U.N. Security Council unanimously backed the agreement to scale back Iran’s nuclear ambitions and begin loosening some sanctions before Congress voted; Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) went so far as to dub July 20 “Obama’s Capitulation Monday.” But though top-ranking Democrats had expressed concern leading up to the vote about an end run around Congress, members of the president’s party were mostly quiet following the U.N.’s action.

Though Congress still has the ability to block lifting congressional sanctions on Iran that are a key portion of the deal even after the U.N. resolution, it won’t be in concert with international leaders who signed off on the agreement with Iran. That gives the administration a powerful talking point as its representatives fan out across the Hill this week to soothe jittery lawmakers, particularly undecided Democrats, who are frustrated that the vote for international economic relief for Iran comes two months before a pivotal congressional vote.

Still, “This doesn’t substantively cause any real problems,” said an aide to one undecided Democratic lawmaker, who added that, while criticism from those in charge of the review process is understandable, the timing of the U.N. vote was expected and mostly perfunctory. Indeed, on Monday afternoon House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said she is “pleased that the response thus far from House Democrats has been so positive” to the Iran deal.

But for the most vocal GOP critics, the U.N. action amounted to fresh ammunition to aim back at the White House. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) called the move to present the plan to the council “further evidence of a weak president trying to sell a bad deal,” while Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) charged that the decision is an “affront to the American people.” The Senate’s No. 2 Republican threatened that lawmakers will vote down any deal that “jeopardizes American security and paves the way for a nuclear-armed Iran.”

“The administration is more concerned about jamming this deal through than allowing the scrutiny it deserves,” Cornyn said.

Asked Sunday on “Meet the Press” if this move corners Congress, Kerry responded: “Absolutely not.”

“We specifically, to protect the Congress, put in a 90-day period before [the U.N. resolution] takes effect. So nothing will change,” Kerry said.

House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) joined the criticism and vowed that Congress’ review would be just as vigorous. “This is a bad start for a bad deal,” he said in a statement. “The American people expect their representatives to review this potential agreement and stop Iran’s push for a nuclear weapon, and we will continue our critical work to do just that.”

Congress will need two-thirds of both chambers to block the lifting of sanctions, which Obama has promised to veto.

But moving the agreement through the U.N. before a congressional review has piqued concerns not just of hawkish Republican critics but critical swing Democrats as well, including Senate Foreign Relations Committee ranking member Ben Cardin and House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, both of Maryland.

“We had urged the administration not to take any definitive action in the 60 days,” Cardin said in an interview last week, referring to a letter to the president in which Cardin and Chairman Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) urged Obama not to go to the U.N. before Congress. A delay, Cardin said, would have been “trying to keep this in the spirit of the review.”

But Cardin did not join Corker’s latest critique on Monday, in which the chairman called the U.N. resolution “contrary to the spirit” of the review law, which was overwhelmingly supported in Congress and signed in to law by Obama this spring.

“It is inappropriate to commit the United States to meet certain international obligations without even knowing if Congress and the American people approve or disapprove” of the agreement, Corker said.

House Foreign Affairs Committee ranking member Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) issued a joint statement with Chairman Ed Royce (R-Calif.) Monday that also knocked the maneuver.

“We are disappointed that the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution on Iran this morning before Congress was able to fully review and act on this agreement. We are also greatly concerned that the resolution lifts restrictions on Iran's ballistic missiles in eight years and conventional arms in five years," the duo said in their statement.

Still, in a sign that the political fallout is likely to be minimal, the most vocal criticism was from Republicans, like Rubio, who already were staunchly opposed to the Iran deal.

"History will remember July 20, 2015 as Obama's Capitulation Monday," said Rubio, who has vowed he would undo the deal if he were to be elected as president. "President Obama's nuclear deal with Iran is a dangerous and destabilizing failure, and it is telling that he is seeking Russia and China's seal of approval of his deal before administration officials have even briefed Congress."

Republicans Weren't Always Above Attacking A Veteran's War Record // HuffPo // Igor Bobic – July 20, 2015

Republican Party officials and presidential hopefuls have stood in near universal opposition against Donald Trump's comment that Sen. John McCain, a former prisoner of war in Vietnam, was no hero. But many in the GOP had no trouble questioning the military record of another Vietnam War veteran, Secretary of State John Kerry.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush was one of several 2016 GOP presidential candidates to condemn Trump's "slanderous attacks." He tweeted on Saturday that "all our veterans - particularly POWs have earned our respect and admiration." But Bush didn't object to such attacks in 2005, when he praised Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a group of veterans that had helped torpedo Kerry's 2004 presidential bid by running television ads slurring his service record in Vietnam.

"As someone who truly understands the risk of standing up for something, I simply cannot express in words how much I value their willingness to stand up against John Kerry," Bush wrote in a January 2005 letter to Col. George Day, one of the group's members.

Bush also rejected the notion that the attacks were unfair during a 2004 interview. "I don't think [their allegations] are a smear," he told radio host Sean Hannity. "In fact, what ought to happen is, there ought to be fact checks. Every ad that goes out ought to be looked at by the press in an objective way, and people can make their own determination whether they're accurate or not."

Kerry's opponent in the 2004 White House race was, of course, Jeb's brother George.

A Jeb Bush spokesman told CNN this week that his letter to Day was "not in any way analogous" to Trump's comments regarding McCain.

Kerry earned several awards for his service in Vietnam, including a Silver Star, a Bronze Star with Combat V, and three Purple Hearts. Critics charged that Kerry lied about his war wounds, but such allegations were contradicted by official military records.

The effort to tarnish Kerry's service reached such a feeding frenzy in the weeks before the 2004 election that even the GOP's 1996 presidential nominee, former Kansas Sen. Bob Dole, joined in the fray. Dole, a World War II veteran, went on CNN and directly called into question Kerry's record:

"With three Purple Hearts, he never bled that I know of. And they're all superficial wounds."

Dole apologized for the remark the next day after a personal call from Kerry, saying that before taping the interview, "maybe I should have stayed longer for brunch somewhere."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the apology came perhaps too little, too late, as then-Texas governor and current presidential candidate Rick Perry picked up the baton. Perry, who over the weekend called on Trump to withdraw from the race, said in 2004 that Kerry ought to release his military records because "a lot of questions" remained unanswered.

"When a person like Bob Dole asks the question ... lay your records out. It's pretty hard to argue that about Bob Dole's Purple Heart," Perry said.

A week later, at the Republican National Convention in New York, party delegates mocked Kerry by applying bandages on their faces and various other body parts with Purple Hearts drawn on them. The bandages also read, "It was just a self-inflicted scratch, but you see I got a Purple Heart for it."

At the time, leading GOP officials, including the George W. Bush campaign, sought to distance themselves from the bandage mockery. But they resisted disassociating themselves from the Swift Boat ads entirely, arguing instead that Kerry's anti-war activism after he came home from Vietnam reflected negatively on American troops.

Republicans learn to love community organizing // Washington Examiner // David Drucker – July 20, 2015

When the Republican Party crowns a presidential nominee one year from now, he (or she) will be handed a campaign organization that is fully staffed and operational in every electoral battleground.

That might be the most important component of the top-to-bottom overhaul of the Republican National Committee's voter turnout program undertaken since the 2012 presidential election, as detailed in an interview with the Washington Examiner.

Four years ago, GOP nominee Mitt Romney was outgunned and outclassed by President Obama in the trenches of door-to-door combat for votes in swing states. Obama's advantage was multifold — better data, better manipulation of that data, a better candidate. But the RNC concluded that Obama's advantage stemmed, as well, from fielding a more competent organization that never packed up and went home after he won the presidency in 2008.

The president's campaign stayed in the field and prepared for his 2012 re-election almost from the minute his first race ended, deepening ties to the community. Romney, meanwhile, secured the nomination after a protracted primary fight, and was forced to rush a team with varying experience into the competitive states with barely months to go before voting started — as had every non-incumbent GOP nominee before him.

The party determined not to get caught flat-footed again. So, the RNC took a page from Obama for America's playbook and decided to build an operation that would be permanently deployed and available for the Republican presidential nominee to lease every four years.

"In 2007-08, we're laughing about this community organizing model, saying: 'You're going into presidential politics and you're going to bring community organizing into it?' Of course, they had the last laugh," said Chris Carr, the RNC's political director and its senior field strategist.

Soon after Obama's re-election, the RNC commissioned an autopsy report on its antiquated voter turnout program. Chairman Reince Priebus and party leaders concluded that wholesale reforms were required for the party to be competitive. The RNC invested more than $100 million in 2013 and 2014 to improve the collection and quality of voter data and the methods and technology used to target and push voters to the polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The party saw measurable results in the midterm elections with its new digital and data analytics program and ground game strategy that focused on targeting low-propensity voters who were highly likely to support Republicans if only they would pull the lever. But there have been complaints about the technology the RNC created to work with its improved voter file, and committee officials said coming digital products will change that.

The deficiencies the party suffered four years ago weren't just in data and technology. Nor was Obama's more prepared campaign the Republicans' only problem in the states. How the party organized its ground forces, and how it deployed them, was outdated. After studying how Obama for America structured its field team and volunteer army, Carr threw out the RNC's decades-old flow chart and redesigned the party's command and control.

"We started a very in-depth look at what OFA had been doing the last eight years," said Carr, a Louisiana native who spent several years as a GOP operative in Nevada before joining the RNC in February. "This is going to be a big change."

That change began by jettisoning the voting precinct and the precinct captain.

For decades, the RNC had organized teams of volunteer door-knockers who pounded the pavement hustling votes for the GOP presidential nominee based on precincts, the geographical regions for collecting and counting votes drawn by state and local governments. Precinct captains managed those teams. But under the RNC's new system, states are divided into "turfs" of 8,000-10,000 people that the party's voter file classifies as swing voters, persuadable voters and low-propensity Republican voters.

Each turf is led by a "field organizer" who oversees a group of "neighborhood team leaders," who in turn run organized teams of volunteers.

The new approach lets the party maximize outreach to voters who matter in competitive races, and avoids wasting resources in areas with little to gain — either because they're overwhelmingly Democratic or because support for Republicans is reliable. During next July's Cleveland convention, the Republican who accepts the presidential nomination will take possession of a campaign that has roughly 2,000 trained staff and volunteers working in about 1,500 turfs in about a dozen battleground states.

The RNC this year opened the Republican Leadership Institute to train the volunteers who will man the turfs. More than 2,000 applied for the program since June. The six-week training, held in cities across the country, was modeled on an Obama for America fellowship to learn how to become an effective community organizer. Incidentally, when the RNC compared how its 2016 "turfs" compared with the locations of Obama's 2012 campaign offices, they discovered remarkable symmetry.

The RNC aims to return to what worked for the party so well during President George W. Bush's 2004 re-election and what Obama emulated and improved on: the value of personal contact. Three years ago, Republicans were perplexed by the proliferation of Obama's empty campaign offices, compared to their fewer but larger regional headquarters that were teaming with people manning phone banks. The Obama folks were out talking to voters one-on-one.

Republicans rediscovered this simple secret belatedly, and at its core, this approach is the driver of its "new" 2016 strategy.

"We want to hire more people from within these states who actually know these communities," Carr said. "We want our field organizers to reflect that particular community that they're working in."

Forecasters Expect a Strong Economy for the 2016 Presidential Election // NYT // Neil Irwin – July 20, 2015

When it comes to elections, fundamentals matter. A lot.

A wide range of political science research suggests that if you want to know who will win the presidency, the state of the economy — and especially how economic conditions are changing — matters a great deal, perhaps even more than how charismatic the candidates are or how much money they raise.

The election is 16 months away, but knowing what we know now, what should we expect the economic backdrop to be when Americans choose their next president?

To answer that question, The Times asked leading forecasters from economic consultancies, financial firms and universities for their predictions on where key economic variables will stand on Nov. 8, 2016 — Election Day. The 17 who participated replied with a relatively strong consensus.

They said they believed that unemployment would be the lowest it has been during an election since George W. Bush and Al Gore faced off in 2000, when it stood at 3.9 percent. The median forecast for the unemployment rate when voters go to the polls in November 2016 was 4.8 percent (which would be down from 5.3 percent last month). They saw only a 15 percent chance of a recession starting by next Election Day. Interest rates, inflation and gasoline prices should all be a bit higher than they are now, they said, while staying quite low by historical standards.

“All in all, I’d guess it should be as close to a feel-good time as any we’ve seen in the past several years,” said Michael Feroli, chief United States economist at JPMorgan Chase.

On its face, all of that points to an election with dynamics similar to 1988 or 2000, when the nominee of the incumbent party (George H. W. Bush in 1988 and Mr. Gore in 2000) could promise continued prosperity. That bodes well for the Democratic nominee, though as Mr. Gore’s loss despite winning the popular vote shows, even a favorable economy doesn’t assure victory, given the workings of the Electoral College.

“On Election Day November 2016, voters should be feeling quite a bit better about where they stand economically and looking at their economic future a bit more optimistically,” said Scott Anderson, chief economist of Bank of the West.

In the voluminous research on the connection between economic performance and election outcomes, one important finding is that what matters is less an absolute level of economic activity or the unemployment rate, and more the speed and direction of economic change. That might explain, for example, why President Obama was re-elected in 2012 despite a 7.8 percent unemployment rate on Election Day. That is a poor number historically, but it was down from 8.6 percent a year earlier.

Some research has found that the economy matters less when the race for the presidency is wide open, as it will be in 2016, than when there is an incumbent on the ballot for whom the vote can be viewed as a referendum. In other words, if Hillary Rodham Clinton is the Democratic nominee, she probably won’t own President Obama’s economic successes and failures to the degree the president himself did in 2012.

The forecasters' projections also point to a soft underbelly in the economy that the Republican nominee could exploit.

Their consensus was 2.8 percent growth in average hourly wages in the 12 months before the election, slightly higher than the 2 percent rise in prices. That implies that the weak spot of the Obama economy, in compensation for ordinary workers, will remain that way heading into 2016.

The forecasters saw only a 25 percent chance of an economic boom — defined as G.D.P. growth greater than 3 percent maintained for a year — happening between now and Election Day. This slow-moving expansion generally hasn't resulted in the kind of explosive growth that was seen in the late Reagan or late Clinton administrations, and there's a slim chance of that changing soon.

It's against that backdrop that Jeb Bush and other Republican contenders have pledged to attain 4 percent annual economic growth; if they can pull it off, that would be a step up from the roughly 2.5 percent that has been typical of the Obama years.

Sustained growth of 4 percent or greater has been seen only rarely in American history, most recently from 1997-2000 and 1983-5. And those years had more favorable demographic trends driving that growth than the coming presidential administration is likely to encounter.

We asked 17 economists for their forecast of the nation's economy in November 2016.

That helps explain why forecasters' consensus was 2.8 percent G.D.P. growth in the year before the election, and why they were skeptical that 4 percent growth would prove attainable.

"The 4 percent G.D.P. goal of some candidates is unrealistic with the baby boom generational wave retiring and spending less," said Christopher Rupkey, chief financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi UFJ.

The forecasters could be wrong, of course. Surveys of economic prognosticators in the past have shown plenty of mistakes, including failing to predict the severity of the 2008-9 recession and offering overly optimistic projections during the sluggish recovery.

On the side of pessimism, forecasters failed to predict the economic acceleration of the late 1990s.

In elections that have been dominated by shifts in the economic winds, there tended to be evidence of what was to come by this point in the cycle. The subprime mortgage crisis that would spiral into a recession that characterized the 2008 election was well underway by July 2007, with foreclosures mounting. Though a recession in July 1991 had technically ended by Election Day 1992, the rebound was not swift enough to secure re-election for the first President Bush.

The forecasters, who were surveyed in early July, identified a number of threats that might undermine their forecasts of sunny economic skies in late 2016.

The Greek debt crisis was mentioned often, though the potential ripple effects for the United States economy appear much weaker than they did a few years ago when Greece's position in the eurozone was first at risk. They mentioned the possibility of a Middle East crisis causing an oil shock, and a Chinese economic slowdown that seemed plausible given a recent sharp sell-off in its stock market. But the economic threat that the forecasters mentioned most often — the Federal Reserve raising interest rates — would be driven by domestic policy.

If the Fed moves too quickly to raise interest rates, it could have any number of adverse effects: potentially stomping on the housing recovery, undermining exports by strengthening the dollar or causing dangerous volatility in financial markets.

The consensus of the forecasters was that the Fed's target interest rate would be 1.37 percent on Election Day 2016; the consensus of Fed officials themselves was that the rate would be 1.625 percent at the end of 2016. (Those views aren't mutually inconsistent, as there could be a rate increase in December after the election.) In effect, rates have been so low for so long that forecasters lacked confidence about exactly how robust an economic expansion would be in the face of tighter money.

Still, the forecasters said that they thought the Fed would move cautiously enough that incumbents could breathe easier than they have in years.

"Odds are good that by Election Day the economy will be at full employment, growing strongly," said Mark Zandi, chief economist of Moody's Analytics. "The economic winds will be at the back of incumbents."

The Only Realistic Way to Fix Campaign Finance // NYT Lawrence Lessig – July 21, 2015

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — FOR the first time in modern history, the leading issue concerning voters in the upcoming presidential election, according to a recent Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, is that "wealthy individuals and corporations will have too much influence over who wins." Five years after the Supreme Court gave corporations and unions the right to spend unlimited amounts in political campaigns, voters have had enough.

Republican candidates, including Chris Christie, Ted Cruz and Lindsey Graham, and the main Democratic candidates, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, all acknowledge the problem, with some tying it to the Supreme Court's 2010 decision in Citizens United, which unleashed virtually unlimited "independent" political spending.

The solution proposed by some, notably Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Graham and Mr. Sanders, is amending the Constitution.

It sounds appealing, but anyone who's serious about reform should not buy it. For a presidential candidate, constitutional reform is fake reform. And no candidate who talks exclusively about amending the Constitution can be considered a credible reformer.

This is not because we don't need constitutional reform. Of course we do. No sane constitutional designer would have picked the mix of restrictions and rights that our Constitution has been read to embrace. And with due respect to the Supreme Court, neither did our framers. Amendments will be essential to restoring this democracy, just as a healthy diet is essential to the recovery of a patient who has suffered a heart attack.

Nor is this because a constitutional amendment is impossible. No doubt it is ridiculously difficult to amend our Constitution. The veto of one house in just 13 states — representing as little as 5 percent of the American public — could block an amendment. But in the last hundred years we've added 10 amendments to our Constitution, with an average ratification time (excepting the most recent, which took 202 years) of less than 16 months. We've done it before; we can do it again.

Nor does this mean that the many reform organizations pushing for a constitutional amendment are not themselves true reformers. Of course they are, and their work is the most important force building the essential political movement that real reform will require.

But even if we could pass amendment to reverse Citizens United soon (and not since the Civil War has an amendment been adopted with support from just one party), it would not solve the problem of money's influence in American politics.

If the core problem is politicians beholden to their funders, then giving Congress the power to limit the amount spent or the amount would not resolve it. Regardless of how much was spent, the private funding of public campaigns, even with limits, would inevitably reproduce the world we have now.

Real reform will require changing the way campaigns are funded — moving from large-dollar private funding to small-dollar public funding.

Democrats, for example, have pushed for small-dollar public funding through matching systems, like New York City's. Under a plan by Representative John Sarbanes, Democrat of Maryland, contributions could be matched up to nine to one, for candidates who agree to accept only small donations.

Republicans, too, are increasingly calling for small-dollar funding systems. The legal scholar Richard W. Painter, a former "ethics czar" for President George W. Bush, has proposed a $200 tax rebate to fund small-dollar campaigns. Likewise, Jim Rubens, a candidate in the Republican primary for Senate in New Hampshire last year, proposed a $50 tax rebate to fund congressional campaigns.

Either approach would radically increase the number of funders in campaigns, in that way reducing the concentration of large funders that especially typifies congressional and senatorial campaigns right now.

Some 13 states already offer two kinds of public campaign funding: In Arizona, Connecticut and Maine, "clean elections" laws offer full subsidies to candidates who agree to limit their spending and private fund-raising, while Florida and Hawaii match small donations up to a certain amount. The Brennan Center for Justice wants to expand New York City's matching-contributing law to the rest of the state, saying it would increase transparency, accountability and voter turnout.

Most Americans are deeply skeptical of reform, and especially reform that costs money. So it's much easier to call for a constitutional amendment than to propose public financing.

But solving the crisis in our democracy will not be cheap or easy. We won't end the corruption of a system beholden to the funders until we, the citizens, are the funders. That truth takes courage to utter. This election needs that courage.

The Uber Election: 2016 Candidates Are Finally Talking About the New American Underclass // VICE // George Pearkes – July 20, 2015

Every week, it seems, Uber opens a new and previously unimaginable battlegrounds in its war for global ride-sharing dominance. Last month, the company was turning French cabbies into a new Parisian mob, hunting down anyone they suspected of being a cake-eating Uber driver. Just a few weeks later, it was launching a full-scale PR assault against the Mayor of New York, adding a "De Blasio" tab to show riders how long they would have to wait for a car if the city's taxi-loving despot gets his way.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, for most of us, Uber is the $50 billion-with-a-b ride-sharing juggernaut we hate on principle, but don't know how to get home from the bar without. Given this ubiquity as the world's most combative car-hailing company, it perhaps makes sense that Uber now finds itself in the middle of the country's biggest political battlefield, used as a rhetorical football in the 2016 presidential debate.

...many Americans are making extra money renting out a small room, designing websites, selling products they design themselves at home, or even driving their own car. This on-demand, or so-called gig economy is creating exciting economies and unleashing innovation. But it is also raising hard questions about work-place protections and what a good job will look like in the future.

She went on to pledge that she would "crack down on bosses who exploit employees" by classifying them as contractors, "or even stealing their wages."

To many, it seemed like a direct shot at Uber and the rest of the so-called "gig" or "sharing" economy—the Uber drivers, AirBnB hosts, Etsy sellers, and Postmates messengers who can be beckoned at the tap of a smartphone, but who also aren't on any employer's payroll.

The GOP saw its opening for an attack. As Clinton's remarks settled, the Republican National Committee went into action, blasting out a "Petition in Support of Innovative Companies Like Uber" with ominous warnings about the "taxi unions and government bureaucrats who would stifle innovation." Jeb Bush's campaign gleefully alerted reporters that the 2016 presidential candidate would be hailing an Uberon his visit to San Francisco Thursday.

Other GOP White House hopefuls have also heaped praise upon the sharing economy. Marco Rubio dedicated a whole chapter of his book to "Making America Safe for Uber." Ted Cruz has even gone so far as to claim that he is Uber—"the Uber of Washington."

So far, though, there hasn't been much effort on either side to come up with specific policies or solutions to adapt public policy around the realities of this new workplace—both to protect and foster innovation, and also to ensure fair wages and treatment for independent contractors working in this new landscape.

Independent contractors get paid on an ad hoc basis instead of an hourly wage. While the practice isn't new by any means, it has become controversial for app-based companies whose business model relies on the idea that they are third-party facilitator, connecting service and customer, but not the employer of those providing the services.

A recent decision by California's Labor CommissionCalifornia's Labor Commission foundthat a former Uber driver who had filed a complaint had actually been an Uber employee—something the company has been fighting against in several courts. While the decision applies only to one driver, its implications are big: If Uber drivers are employees, they are eligible for things like overtime, workers comp, and minimum wage. Similar class-action suits are moving down the pipeline in the state, and in other jurisdictions as well.

To make matters worse for Uber, a San Francisco judge recommended last Wednesday that the company be suspended from operations in California for refusing to hand over data on who their drivers pick up and where, to show that the company is providing equal access to its services.

So what does all this mean for 2016? Clinton's speech was made in the context of concerns independent contractors are exposed to more risk than traditional employees. Some costs are also shifted from employers to contractors. Payroll tax accrual, insurance, health care and other basic benefits businesses are required to provide for employees can be avoided. This is arguably a huge benefit for profit margins of businesses in the sharing economy. Firms can generate higher profits because drivers are less costly to "employ".

Ironically, the Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare, actually makes it easier for firms to employ contractors. The ACA's exchanges are designed to make it easier and cheaper for individuals to purchase health insurance, making independent contracting for sharing economy companies more attractive than prior to its passage when employer-provided health care was the only option for many Americans. Jeb Bush acknowledged that in a scrum with reporters after his campaign appearance in San Francisco last week.

Employees even provide the tools of their trade themselves, driving their own cars to pick up riders or deliver food, or renting own their own houses. Economically speaking, they're providing labor and capital, and being charged for it via the tech company's cut of their revenue. Clinton's logic is that this cost shifting is emblematic of a broader decline in labor's "bargaining power" or share of economic output. If workers are seeking flexibility, the sharing economy can be a liberating experience with no set hours or boss. But for members of society who turn to the sharing economy as a last resort, that liberation can feel more like desperation and a race to the bottom; these are the Americans that Clinton was trying to address.

From an economic perspective, there's some truth to the idea that workers aren't getting as much pay as they have in the past. It's certainly not the exclusive fault of the sharing economy though. Labor's share of economic output has fallenfrom a peak of about 59 percent in 1970 to about 53 percent today—a difference of about $1 trillion in wages, salaries and benefits for workers, or enough to boost the average family's pre-tax income from $64,432 to $72,656. In that context, the emergence of the gig economy is relatively recent—most app-based sharing companies, including Airbnb, Uber, Lyft, Spinlister, among others, were founded after the 2008 crisis.

Whether these gig companies are actually hurting labor income—or are treating workers unfairly—is a much more open question. Clinton's remarks assume that they are: Her concerns about the costs of the sharing economy are targeted at the Taskrabbits among us who feel forced to work at the instruction of apps because of a lack of options or opportunity in the traditional workforce—not workers who actively opt-in to the sharing economy for its benefits.

On the other hand, Bush and other Republicans have good reason to believe that support for Uber will score political points. The company has, after all, grown from nothing to a valuation that's about the same as General Motorsin the span of six years—regardless of how you feel about Uber and its Objectivist founders, it's hard to deny theirs is a bonafide American entrepreneurial success story. Bush is also on the record saying that he believesAmericans need to work more hours, and the flexible hours offered by sharing economy companies are a reasonable way to get people working more, offering more choice, lower prices for consumers, and less regulatory burden than traditional businesses.

Republicans have fetishized Uber and other tech "disrupters," whose business models they see as shining examples of a free-market, anti-regulatory ideology, challenging government-sanctioned monopolies—on, say, taxis or hotels—that keep consumer prices higher they would otherwise be. That was the source of the riots in France: French taxi drivers, angry that Uber was taking their fares, protested, and things got out of control, giving Courtney Love an unfortunate scare; the French government responded by cracking down on Uber's UberPOP service, effectively protecting the country's licensed cab driver monopoly. AirBnB has faced similar issues in numerous jurisdictions, including New York City.

In short, the sharing economy has all the ingredients of a punchy campaign issue: It's a metaphor for a big shift that's been under way for over thirty years, neatly encapsulating a lot of complicated economics and policy into one symbol. And it's a jumping off point for an important election-year debate over what that "normal" American economy should look like after years of slow recovery from a massive recession. Plus, all the kids are doing it.

Martin O'Malley Apologized for Saying "All Lives Matter." Should Hillary Clinton? // The New Republic // Rebecca Leber – July 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Martin O'Malley was booed at a liberal conference on Saturday when, after being interrupted by Black Lives Matter demonstrators, he said, "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter." Within hours, the former Maryland governor apologized, saying on the digital show "This Week in Blackness," "I meant no disrespect. That was a mistake on my part and I meant no disrespect. I did not mean to be insensitive in any way or communicate that I did not understand the tremendous passion, commitment and feeling and depth of feeling that all of us should be attaching to this issue."

But O'Malley isn't the only Democratic presidential candidate who has said "all lives matter." Frontrunner Hillary Clinton, who didn't attend Netroots, used the phrase in a speech last month at a historic black church five miles from Ferguson, Missouri. Describing her mother's life, Clinton said, "Her own parents abandoned her. By 14 she was out on her own, working as a housemaid. Years later, when I was old enough to understand, I asked her, 'What kept you going?' Her answer was very simple: Kindness along the way from someone who believed she mattered. All lives matter."

There was some debate over whether she ever needed to clarify her remarks. Democratic strategist Donna Brazile didn't see the need for it.

Clinton has never explicitly apologized for saying "all lives matter." Asked Monday if she regretted using the phrase and plans to apologize for it, her campaign sent a link to a Facebook comment by Clinton in response to a question by the Washington Post's Wesley Lowery.

"All lives matter" has become a common conservative retort to #blacklivesmatter, and activists (among others) object to the phrase because it obscures how black lives in particular are treated as less valuable in America. As Berkeley professor Judith Berkeley put it earlier this year:

Claiming that "all lives matter" does not immediately mark or enable black lives only because they have not been fully recognized as having lives that matter. I do not mean this as an obscure riddle. I mean only to say that we cannot have a race-blind approach to the questions: which lives matter? Or, which lives are worth valuing? If we jump too quickly to the universal formulation, "all lives matter," then we miss the fact that black people have not yet been included in the idea of "all lives."

Update: Another Democratic presidential candidate, Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, has made remarks not unlike "all lives matter." In June, he told NPR's David Greene, "Black lives matter. White lives matter. Hispanic lives matter. But these are also not only police matters. They're not only gun control matters. They are significantly economic matters."

The Unarmed Forces: Will the Pentagon let troops carry weapons after Chattanooga? // WaPo // Dan Lamothe – July 20, 2015

Three weeks ago, the U.S. Army awarded Purple Hearts to two soldiers who were wounded in an attack by a gunman on a military recruiting center. One of them, Pvt. William Long, received the award posthumously after being killed in the attack. The other, Pvt. Quinton Ezeagwula, was wounded numerous times but survived.

The June 1, 2009, attack in Little Rock, Ark., was recalled by many following the shootings last week at a military recruiting center and naval reserve installation in Chattanooga, Tenn., that killed four Marines and a sailor:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gunnery Sgt. Thomas Sullivan, 40; Staff Sgt. David Wyatt, 35; Sgt. Carson A. Holmquist; Lance Cpl. Squire D. “Skip” Wells, 21; and Petty Officer 2nd Class Randall Smith, 26.

All five were at the naval reserve center, one of two locations targeted by the shooter, Mohammad Youssef Abdulazeez, 24, who was also killed.

The attacks are evidence, some say, that the Pentagon should end its long-held restrictions on U.S. service members arming themselves while at military facilities. Law enforcement officials said Monday that they had recovered a privately-owned pistol at the reserve center following the shootout that may have been carried by one of the deceased Marines, but they would not have been allowed to do so.

Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter called on Friday for “immediate steps” to be taken to enhance force protection following the Chattanooga shooting, but arming troops was not one of them. Mark Wright, a spokesman at the Pentagon, said that the Marine Corps chose to close all recruiting offices within 40 miles temporarily, instruct recruiters across the country not to wear uniforms and to boost security at recruiting stations to force protection level Charlie, indicating an increased terrorist threat exists.

The Army also increased its security at recruiting centers to force protection level Charlie, and the Navy opted to have more random searches at facilities and coordinate more closely with law enforcement.

Pentagon officials said that Carter also called for a review by the services to determine how security can be improved, with recommendations due back to him within a few days.

Carter, asked about the review Sunday while flying from Washington to Israel, did not say whether he is considering arming U.S. troops while on base Stateside.

“We took some steps on Friday that seemed immediately advisable,” the secretary told reporters, without elaborating. “I’ve asked the services to quickly, but in a comprehensive way, assess additional things that they might recommend.”

Pressure is mounting to arm troops. Sen. Ron Johnson (R.-Wis.) said Friday he would introduce legislation that would get rid of rules preventing service members from being armed at military installations. Sen. John McCain (R.-Ariz.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and Rep. Mac Thornberry (R.-Tex.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, also called Friday for the Pentagon to do more to protect troops.

“Long before the Chattanooga attack, we had been working to clarify a post commander’s authority to allow carrying of personal firearms,” McCain and Thornberry said in a joint statement. “This year’s National Defense Authorization Act will reflect that work. Together, we will direct the Pentagon to end the disconnect between the threats our war fighters and their families face and the tools they have to defend themselves.”

The independent Marine Corps Times captured the sentiment among many rank-and-file Marines on the cover of its newspaper on Monday. The headline: “The call to arm all Marines — now.” It was greeted by readers on Facebook with widespread agreement.

In the 1990s, the Pentagon restricted who can carry weapons at military facilities, ostensibly to make them safer by allowing only military police to carry weapons in most situations.

There is some disagreement over where the policy originated. Some have blamed former President Clinton, citing a 1993 Army directive that limited the use of firearms on military bases. But it actually traces back a little farther. A 1992 Defense Department directive issued during President George H.W. Bush's administration addressed the issue and provided the Pentagon's rationale for limiting who carried firearms in the United States.

"The authorization to carry firearms shall be issued only to qualified personnel when there is a reasonable expectation that life or DoD assets will be jeopardized if firearms are not carried," the directive said. "Evaluation of the necessity to carry a firearm shall be made considering this expectation weighed against the possible consequences of accidental or indiscriminate use of firearms. DoD personnel regularly engaged in law enforcement or security duties shall be armed."

The issue has come up after numerous shootings on military bases, including the 2009 and 2014 attacks at Fort Hood, Tex., and the 2013 mass shooting at the Washington Navy Yard.

Bill That Lets Bosses Fire Single Women For Getting Pregnant Gains Steam // HuffPo // Dana Liebelson – July 20, 2015

In wake of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in favor of same-sex marriage, Republicans are pushing legislation that aims to protect Americans who oppose these unions on religious grounds. But critics say the language is so broad, the bill creates a license to discriminate that would let employers fire women for getting pregnant outside of wedlock.

The First Amendment Defense Act prohibits the federal government from taking discriminatory action against a person -- which is defined to include for-profit corporations -- acting in accordance with a religious belief that favors so-called traditional marriage. This means the feds can't revoke a nonprofit's tax-exempt status or end a company's federal contract over this issue.

The bill specifically protects those who believe that marriage is between "one man and one woman" or that "sexual relations are properly reserved to such a marriage." Ian Thompson, a legislative representative at the American Civil Liberties Union, said that in addition to targeting lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people, the bill "clearly encompasses discrimination against single mothers" and would hobble the ability of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), the federal body that protects women from sex-based discrimination, to act.

This scenario isn't merely hypothetical. There are a number of recent cases where religious schools have fired unwed teachers for becoming pregnant. A Montana Catholic school teacher who was fired for having a baby out of wedlock, for example, filed a discrimination charge last year with the EEOC. While the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized a ministerial exception to employment discrimination laws, that exception is somewhat limited, not necessarily covering educators employed by Catholic schools who teach about exclusively secular subjects.

James Ryan, a spokesman for the EEOC, said the commission could not comment on pending legislation in Congress.

At a press conference on Thursday, Rep. Raul Labrador (R-Idaho), who authored the House bill, strongly denied that it could be used this way. "It's just allowing people to continue to believe the way they do," he told The Huffington Post.

His colleague, Rep. Bill Flores (R-Texas) said, "We're not going to try to dance on the head of a pin here. This legislation protects an institution based on its sincerely held religious beliefs from persecution."

When NPR asked Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah), who introduced the companion Senate bill, about a hypothetical university firing an unmarried woman for having sex out of wedlock, he said, "There are colleges and universities that have a religious belief that sexual relations are to be reserved for marriage" and they "ought to be protected in their religious freedom."

The legislation is picking up steam, with pressure reportedly mounting on GOP leaders to call a vote this month on the bill. When House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) was asked on Thursday what he thinks of the bill and whether he'll bring it to the floor, he said, "The Supreme Court's decision on marriage raises a lot of other questions and a number of members have concerns about the issues it raises." He added, "No decision has been made on how best to address these."

Thompson said that this isn't the only problem with the bill. He said it would eviscerate anti-discrimination protections for LGBT federal contractors signed into law by President Barack Obama last year and allow federal grantees to turn away LGBT people from homeless shelter services or drug treatment programs. Comparing it to a religious freedom bill in Indiana that faced national backlash, he said, "This bill is Indiana on steroids."

U.S. Embassy in Cuba Reopens After More Than 50 Years // NYT // Azam Ahmed – July 20, 2015

After more than a half-century defined by mistrust and rancor, the United States officially reopened its six-story embassy in the Cuban capital on Monday, the culmination of many months of negotiations to overcome decades of historical enmity and to restore diplomatic relations between the two nations.

More than two years of effort went into restoring relations between Cuba and the United States, both public and private, yet most observers say they believe it will be many more years before mutual wariness fades.

A litany of questions have yet to be answered, including: Will the American trade embargo that has crippled Cuba's economy be lifted, and if so, when? Will the Cuban government improve its human rights record and incorporate outsiders into the political spectrum? How much, and how fast, will the lives of ordinary Cubans, who earn $20 a month on average, improve?

But for now, the reopening of the embassy on the Malecón waterfront in Havana, previously used as an interests section, a limited diplomatic outpost, stands as the most concrete symbol yet of the thaw set in motion last year when President Obama ordered the full restoration of diplomatic ties between the countries.

"It is sort of like a wedding," said James Williams, the president of an advocacy group, Engage Cuba, which has been lobbying for improved relations. "You've spent all this time planning your wedding day, and finally you're getting to see someone walk down the aisle."

"Now," he added, "you have the rest of your life together."

If Cubans are expecting bells and canapés to celebrate the nuptials, they will be sorely disappointed. The official celebration to inaugurate the American Embassy will not take place until later in the summer, when Secretary of State John Kerry plans to visit, to formally raise the flag and install the new signage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For now, the change is imperceptible from the outside, arguably a metaphor for the state of Cuba itself.

Technically, there will be differences. Diplomats will be formally registered, and, for the first time since the American Embassy was closed, they will be allowed to travel freely in the country. They will be invited to functions, too, like members of other diplomatic corps.

The American government is supposed to ease access for Cubans entering the embassy and for the American Foreign Service officers inside, a State Department official said.

Mr. Obama, when announcing an end to the diplomatic freeze, eased travel restrictions, opened the door for more remittances to Cuba, and expanded the amount of goods that visiting Americans could take home, like Cuban cigars and rum. In May, he removed the country from the list of nations that sponsor terrorism.

President Raúl Castro has spent the past five years, before the thaw began with the Obama administration, trying to jump-start the nation's economy, ordering that hundreds of thousands of government employees be laid off, encouraging Cubans into self-employment and entrepreneurship, and creating a special economic zone in the coastal city of Mariel to attract foreign investment.

But many of these changes have been confronted with bracing realities. A farm program to encourage crop cultivation struggled because of regulations and a lack of reliable transportation, and the mass public-sector layoffs Mr. Castro promised never really materialized. Real estate overhauls that now allow Cubans to sell their homes have run into a problem that vexes just about every segment of Cuban life: a lack of supplies.

Often, these initiatives have been ensnared by the mentality that has both preserved and ossified Cuban life, one forged through years of anti-American sentiment that has defined the social, political and economic lives of Cubans. Letting go of that is not easy.

Mr. Castro has said that change will be slow, and that it will not come at the cost of stability or values. Again and again, what emerges is this: Cuba will change, yes, but at its own pace and with no apologies.

For many Cubans, that is reason enough for hope.

"The genie is out of the bottle," said Carlos Alzugaray Treto, a former Cuban diplomat who is close to Mr. Castro and his brother Fidel, the country's longtime president. "And once it's out, you're not going to be able to put it back in."

Out of the bottle or not, life continues as usual in Havana. A number of Cubans know about the opening of the American Embassy and have formulated opinions about what it will mean for them.

Some fear that Cuban culture could be lost, devoured by American consumerism. But just as many, if not more, are fine with change if it means that they can earn enough to live on.

"For me, inequality is not a problem," said Lázaro Borrero, 39, a journeyman worker who does a bit of construction, cooking and tobacco rolling to make ends meet. "If you earn $1 million a year, and I earn $1 a year, good for you."

Change that will have an effect on the wallets of normal Cubans is, by some estimates, many years away. It will require the lifting of the American embargo as well as what many Cubans refer to as the "internal embargo," or the state impediments that exist in everyday life, from communications to buying groceries.

It will require change from within the Cuban system and adapting to economic norms that might require letting go of some of their control, experts say.

"Cuba has more of a challenge to change than does the United States," said Ricardo Pascoe, a former Mexican ambassador to Cuba. "They're going to have to open up one way or another."

But it will not be only the Cubans who change. American tourists are expected to come in waves to discover a nation so long forbidden, and there will also be families who can reunite without having to cross political minefields.

Consider Lucía Nuñez, the director of the Civil Rights Department for the government of Madison, Wis. Her parents, born in Cuba, left the country a year before America severed diplomatic ties with it under President Dwight D. Eisenhower, in 1961.

Ms. Nuñez drifted emotionally from Cuba over the years, growing up in the Virgin Islands and eventually moving to New England for high school and college. She was ashamed, she said, of having parents with accents and a cuisine that differed from her friends'.

She raised her children in the United States and has lived in Wisconsin for the past 17 years. Her mother, who has been back to Cuba only once since leaving, missed the deaths of her brothers on the island.

"I spent a lot of years denying I was Cuban," Lucía Nuñez said from the home of a Cuban entrepreneur who has been licensed to rent to foreign visitors. "But there's no denying it: I am Cuban. I am as much frijoles negros as I am Bruce Springsteen."

So this summer, she, her 81-year-old mother and her 19-year-old daughter decided to take a trip to Havana and to the small town near Guantánamo where the family is from. They recently arrived in Cuba and plan to stay for about a month, and Ms. Nuñez's mother will see her sister for the first time in years.

"I hope the normalcy of the relations — or whatever it is they are calling them — I hope it brings us closer to the family I used to have," she said.

Banks reopen, first repayments start as Greece aims for return to normal // Reuters // Lefteris Papadimas – July 20, 2015

Greece reopened its banks and started the process of paying off billions of euros owed to international creditors on Monday in the first signs of a return to normal after a deal to agree a new package of bailout reforms.

Customers were queued up outside bank branches open for the first time in three weeks on Monday after they were closed to save the system from collapsing under a flood of withdrawals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Increases in value added tax agreed under the bailout terms also took effect, with VAT on food and public transport jumping to 23 percent from 13 percent. The stock market remained closed until further notice. The bank closures were the most visible sign of the crisis that took Greece to the brink of leaving the euro earlier this month, potentially undermining the foundations of the single European currency.

Their reopening followed Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras' reluctant acceptance of a tough package of bailout demands from European partners, but a revolt in the ruling Syriza party now threatens the stability of his government and officials say new elections may be held as early as September or October.

"Things are better than the last few weeks. Thank God we didn't end up with the drachma!" said 62-year-old pensioner Maria Papadopoulou. "I came to pay bills and my taxes today. Last week I couldn't and all of this is very tiring for the older people like me."

Limits on withdrawals will remain, however -- at 420 euros ($455) per week instead of 60 euros per day previously -- and payments and wire transfers abroad will still not be possible, a situation German Chancellor Angela Merkel said on Sunday was "not a normal life" and warranted swift negotiations on a new bailout, expected to be worth up to 86 billion euros.

"Capital controls and restrictions on withdrawals will remain in place but we are entering a new stage which we all hope will be one of normality," said Louka Katseli, head of the Greek bank association.

Greeks will be able to deposit cheques but not cash, pay bills as well as have access to safety deposit boxes and withdraw money without an ATM card.

Bankers said there may be minor disruptions after the extended interruption to services but said they expected services to resume largely as normal.

"I don't expect major problems, our network and the network of our competitors are ready to serve our clients," said a senior official at Piraeus Bank, one of the big four lenders. "There might be lines because many people will want to withdraw money from their deposit boxes," the official said.

Athens initiated procedures to pay 4.2 billion euros in principal and interest to the European Central Bank due on Monday after European authorities agreed last week to provide emergency funding assistance,

It is also paying 2.05 billion euros to the International Monetary Fund in arrears since June 30, when Greece became the first advanced economy to default on a loan to the IMF, along with 500 million euros owed to the Bank of Greece.

Tsipras is eyeing a fresh start and swift talks on the bailout aimed at keeping Greece afloat but faces hurdles with factions in his party.

Although the Greek parliament approved the bailout package on Thursday, the 40-year-old prime minister was forced to rely on votes from the opposition after 39 rebels from Syriza refused to back the government by voting against or abstaining.

A second vote will be held on Wednesday on measures including justice and banking reforms and a similar outcome is expected. The voting arithmetic is finely poised, however.

Together with his coalition partners from the right-wing Independent Greeks party Tsipras has 162 seats in the 300-seat parliament. But Thursday's rebellion cut his support to just 123 votes, meaning he is likely to need opposition votes again.

Some officials in the government have suggested that if support from lawmakers from within the coalition dropped below 120 votes, early snap elections would have to be called while the bailout was still being negotiated.

Their argument is that under Greek law, the lowest number of votes a government can have to win a confidence motion is 120 out of 240, the minimum quorum in parliament for a vote to be valid.

Dropping below 120 would be a symbolic blow but whether it would actually push Tsipras to step down is unclear given that he would have the support of the pro-European opposition parties if a confidence vote were called.

"What worries me is that some people still think that there would be no austerity if we were out of the euro. This argument is absolutely false," State Minister Nikos Pappas, one of Tsipras' closest aides told the leftist Efimerida Ton Syntakton newspaper.

Acceptance of the bailout terms and reopening of the banks have marked a new stage for Tsipras after months of difficult talks.

The bailout terms, which are tougher than those rejected in a referendum earlier in July, include tax hikes, pension cuts, strict curbs on public spending, an overhaul of collective bargaining rules and a transfer of 50 billion euros of state assets into a special privatization fund.

Subject: Israeli Official--Close Hold

Dear Dan, Jake and Laura,

I had a breakfast meeting with a senior Israeli official who is very close to the Prime Minister, and knows his thinking. He had the following insights:

1. The Prime Minister always had a "surprising good relationship" with Hillary; she is "easy to work with", and that she is more instinctively sympathetic to Israel than the White House. Even during their "famous 43 minute phone call, when he felt like slamming down the phone, he felt she was simply heavily scripted and reading from points prepared by the White House.

2. While the Prime Minister favors a two state solution, neither a majority of the Likud Party nor Bennett's party does. Indeed, a two state solution has never been in the government guidelines in any Likud-led government.

3. The Prime Minister hoped during his most recent meeting with the President that the new MOU would be announced, but the White House only wanted to announce the intention to negotiate it. He hopes it will be concluded in the next few months. When I asked if Bunker Busting Bombs or the new deep ordinance bomb was on the Israeli request list, he only indicated that "there is no dispute on platforms" between the Administration and Israel. He said the biggest issue is the amount of money, in a lean budget situation. The Israeli Embassy is not going around the Administration to lobby for a higher figure, although they could probably get it. But if the figure is too low, they will wait until the next President.

4. Missile defense funds are also critical, but they come out of the Pentagon budget, while many of the items on the MOU list are in the FMF/Foreign Ops budget.

5. He attended part of the Saban Forum and felt that most of the emphasis was on the Palestinian issue, and wonders if a Clinton Administration "will be a Saban Forum for four years", due to "the people around her, but not her". Her own speech was "95% good, although there was some moral equivalence language."

6. We discussed possible economic initiatives to help the Palestinians, like more Palestinian investment in Zone C, and/or an agreement to limit settlement expansion to the established blocs that under the Clinton parameters would be in Israel after any negotiation. He said the Prime Minister is genuinely interested in doing positive things on the ground. He said that they know it would have to be unilateral, and that they can expect nothing from the Palestinian Authority. But, he said there are the following complications:

(1) It is difficult to do while the knifings are occurring, and while Abu Mazan is fomenting violence;

(2) So that it does not appear they are bending to violence they need the "support" of the USG. This could include:

(a) Opposition to a new UN Resolution, which Secretary Kerry continues to seek;

(b) Support for settlement activity in the established blocs. But the Obama Administration will not agree to any settlement activity, even in areas like Gilo.

(c) It is little appreciated that despite great pressure to stop any Palestinians from the West Bank from coming into Israel to work, the Prime Minister had kept the flow of tens of thousands coming in every day, recognizing how important this is to the economy of the West Bank and to stability.

(d) The Prime Minister has also kept the VAT refund money flowing to the PA, despite the provocative statements.

But he reiterated there is a deal to be made with the next Administration, looking for positive steps at the outset; "it would be easy to do".

7. American Jews are focused on issues like BDS and Israeli legitimacy, while Israelis are focused only on security, with the stabbings.

8. There are some in the Israeli coalition that want to dismantle the Palestinian Authority and take over full control. But the Prime Minister and the Defense Minster, and "certainly the military and intelligence community", want to keep the PA. There is still intelligence sharing on radicals, but when Israel asks them to arrest the radicals they identify, they refuse, and ask the Israelis to do it, and then protest the arrests. But this is all part of a scenario of cooperation. However, if the PA takes Israel to the International Criminal Court, this would be a "huge problem" and a potential game changer in terms of their relationship with the PA.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

9. Abu Mazan continues to talk about retiring, as he has done for years, but seems more serious now. There is no obvious successor if he leaves, “other than the guy in jail”.

10. Only about 2% to 4% of Israeli civilians have guns, and certainly not the kind of assault rifles used in the US.

11. Israel Arabs are a “real problem.” The government had to dismantle the northern branch of the Islamic Association because they were radicalizing the Israeli Arabs, who are 20% of the population.

Best wishes,

In Speech, Clinton Discusses Threat from ISIS and Reiterates Her Plan to Defeat Global Terror

At a speech today on the alliance between the United States and Israel, Hillary Clinton reiterated her plan to combat terrorism and defeat the Islamic State.

In her remarks to the Brookings Institution’s Saban Forum 2015, Clinton stressed the importance of cracking down on the ability of ISIS and other terrorist groups to communicate and spread propaganda online.

“Resolve means depriving jihadists of virtual territory just as we work to deprive them of actual territory," Clinton said. "They are using websites, social media, chat rooms, and other platforms to celebrate beheadings, recruit future terrorists, and call for attacks. We should work with host companies to shut them down.”

Clinton also observed that a series of trends in the region make the U.S. alliance with Israel "more indispensable than ever."

Please see below for a full transcript of the remarks:

"Thank you very much, thank you, Haim, for those kind words. Thanks to you and Sheryl and your family for important initiative and for once again gathering us here, together. It's wonderful being back with so many friends and colleagues, including many from the diplomatic corps and of course many from Israel. I want to thank Martin, Tammy, everyone at Brookings.

"We look to you to help us understand a world that seems more complex and confounding than ever. And we are grateful for your insights and for always helping us reach for statesmanship over partisanship.

"Before I begin, I want to acknowledge the loss of a beloved member of our foreign policy family, Sandy Berger. A friend and counselor to me and to many of us. Sandy was a wise and brilliant man. Although I was not able to be at the service on Friday, I know many of you were, and my husband told me how extraordinary it was to see generations of policymakers that Sandy had inspired and mentored, and to hear his children talk with such love and respect as the father they knew.

"Sandy was an enthusiastic participant in this Forum, a steadfast friend to Israel, and the recipient of an honorary degree from Tel Aviv University. Martin wrote a lovely tribute to Sandy called "The man who never gave up hope for Arab-Israeli peace." And he's right, Sandy never gave up on peace. He ever gave up on the potential for diplomacy to end even the most intractable of conflicts. Before I turn to this challenge and how we can and must take the U.S.-Israel relationship to the next level, let me say a few words about events in our own country.

"These past few days, all of us have tried to make sense of yet another senseless terrorist attack. I know that Americans are anxious and fearful. We have reason to be, the threat is real. The need for action is urgent. Our intelligence and law enforcement agencies will continue learning about what led to the massacre in San Bernardino, just as French and Belgian authorities are doing in Paris and Brussels. But this much we do know: the threat from radical jihadism has metastasized and become more complex and challenging. We're seeing the results of radicalism not just in far-off lands but right here at home, fueled by the Internet. It's the nexus of terrorism and technology and we have a lot of work to do to end it. As hard as this is, Americans now have to move from fear to resolve. America has beaten bigger threats before, and we will defeat this one as well.

"Resolve means depriving jihadists of virtual territory just as we work to deprive them of actual territory. They are using websites, social media, chat rooms, and other platforms to celebrate beheadings, recruit future terrorists, and call for attacks. We should work with host companies to shut them down. It's time for an urgent dialogue between the government and not just our government, but government and the high-tech community to confront this problem together. I heard from some of you that you had a great session about technology yesterday. And about how politics and society kind of go on in a linear way and there's an upward movement, but how technology is a disruptive force, that leads to a real exponential increase in activity and I think one of the experts on a panel said ISIS is an exponential force right now. Unfortunately, I agree with that. And that's why it requires us to bring together governments and high-tech experts to figure out how we disrupt them. Resolve means supporting also our first responders, like the officer in San Bernardino who said he would take a bullet for the civilians he was rescuing. We owe them our support and gratitude and whatever help they need.

"Local law enforcement should get the support, training, and coordination they need in their communities from counterterrorism experts in Washington. It also means taking a close look at the safeguards in visa programs and working more effectively with our European allies on intelligence and information sharing. And, yes, Congress must act to ensure that no one who is a suspected terrorist can buy guns anywhere in America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Resolve also means cutting off the finances that fuel the global jihadist network and demanding that our partners in the Gulf do so as well. Resolve means going after the threat at its source in Iraq and Syria and beyond, and I'll have more to say about that in a minute. So we must act with courage and clarity. And I think it's important to remind ourselves that Islam itself is not our adversary. This is not, and we should not let it become a "clash of civilizations." It is a clash between hate and hope. And the vast majority of Muslims are on our side of the battle unless we drive them away. We can't buy into the very narrative that radical jihadists use to recruit new followers or alienate partners we want and need at home and abroad with reckless rhetoric. Declaring war on Islam or demonizing the Muslim-American community is not only counter to our values, it plays right into the hands of terrorists.

"Muslim-Americans are our neighbors, co-workers, loved ones, friends. Many are working every day all over our country to prevent radicalization. We should be supporting them, not scapegoating them. But at the same time, none of us can close our eyes to the fact that we do face enemies who use Islam to justify slaughtering innocent people. We have to stop them and we will. Radical jihadists, like so many adversaries in our history, underestimate the strength of our national character. Americans will not cower or cave. And we will not turn on each other or turn on our principles. We will defeat those who threaten us.

"We will keep our country safe and strong, free and tolerant. And we will always defend our friends and allies. Today with stand with France, Nigeria, Lebanon, Iraq, Turkey, everywhere radical jihadists threaten. And, yes, we stand with our ally and true friend Israel now and forever. And of course Israel is no stranger to terrorism. I've sat in Israeli hospital rooms and held the hands of victims wounded by terrorist attacks, listening to doctors as they sometimes even showed me x-rays, describe how much shrapnel was left in a leg, arm, or a head. Today Israel faces growing threats in its own neighborhood. An ISIS affiliate across Israel's border in the Sinai is becoming more aggressive and sophisticated. It is responsible for the destruction of a Russian airliner with 224 passengers.

And Israeli media reported last week that an ISIS commander from the Sinai visited Gaza, raising the stakes even higher. There's also a new wave of violence inside Israel itself. Brutal stabbings, shootings, and vehicle attacks that seek to sow fear among the innocent. Israeli children have been killed as have Palestinian children. Just two weeks ago, terrorists murdered an American yeshiva student named Ezra Schwartz in a drive-by shooting. These knifings and other attacks are terrorism and they must be stopped immediately. So also must irresponsible rhetoric used to stoke tensions or spur violence. Palestinian leaders should condemn and combat incitement in all its forms. The right to be safe is not just the right of Americans but the right of Israelis and Palestinians alike.

"In this period of peril, Israel needs a strong America by its side. And America needs a strong and secure Israel by our side. It's in our national interest to have an Israel that remains a bastion of stability and a core ally in a region in chaos. We need a brave democracy whose perseverance and pluralism are a rebuke to every extremist and tyrant. We need "a light unto the nations" as darkness threatens.Today, three trends in the region and the world are converging and making our alliance with Israel more indispensable than ever. The first is a rising tide of extremism across a wide arc of instability from North Africa to South Asia. The second is Iran's continued aggression. And the third is the growing effort to delegitimize Israel on the world stage. America and Israel need to address these threats together. And we must take an already strong relationship to the next level.

"We have to develop a common strategic vision and pursue a coordinated approach. Deepen our cooperation and consultation across the board. Remind our peoples how much they have in common. And keep our relationship always above partisan politics. So we need to see how our challenges intersect and see the whole chessboard. I want to say a few words about each of the converging trends. First, the rise of ISIS and the struggle against radical jihadism. Our security and the security of free people everywhere depends on waging and winning this fight. Our goal must not to deter or contain ISIS. Our goal must be to defeat ISIS. I have put forth a three-prong plan to do that. One: Deny ISIS territory in Iraq and Syria by leading an intensified air campaign and working with local and regional forces on the ground.

"Second, dismantle the global infrastructure of terror, the networks that supply radical jihadists with money, weapons, and fighters, and stop them from recruiting and inspiring. And third: Toughen our defenses at home -- and those of our partners -- against external and homegrown threats. As part of our ongoing war against terrorist organizations, we've been operating under an authorization to use military force since 9/11.

"I think the time has come to update that authorization to ensure that we have the tools we need not only to fight ISIS but all international networks of terrorists. That effort has stalled, and I hope that the President and Congress will pick it back up. There is no alternative to American leadership. But the entire world must be part of this fight, and I welcome the new commitments from the United Kingdom, Germany, and others in recent days.

"Now, an effective fight on the ground against ISIS is essential, but that does not mean deploying tens of thousands of American combat troops. It does means stepping up efforts to get more Arab and Kurdish fighters into the fight against ISIS on both sides of the Iraq Syrian border. Supporting the Iraqi security forces while pressuring Baghdad to pursue a more inclusive and effective approach is essential. And immediately deploying the Special Operations forces that President Obama has already authorized with more to follow as more Syrians get into the fight.

We also have to demand that our Arab and Turkish partners carry their share of the burden, with military, financial, and diplomatic contributions. We will do our part, but it's their fight, too, and they need to act.

"Now I'm glad Turkey in particular has pledged to step up, now it needs to follow through, including by sealing its border. Dealing with the conflict in Syria with respect to Assad is central to this whole effort. We need to continue Secretary Kerry's efforts to move toward a diplomatic solution to the civil war in Syria that paves the way for new leadership, and enables Syrians from every community to take on ISIS. Investing the Russians in this outcome, and getting them to step up and do their part, will be difficult but essential.

"We have to pursue a transition away from Assad and an intensified fight ISIS simultaneously. We're not going to get Syrian opposition forces to fight ISIS in earnest without the credible prospect of a transition. And that's going to take more pressure and leverage. That's one of the reasons why I've proposed creating a no fly zone and safe havens, as well as more robust support for opposition forces. We also have to do more to support Syria's neighbors, especially Jordan and Lebanon, as they take in massive numbers of refugees fleeing both ISIS and Assad, so instability doesn't spread. And finally, it's crucial that we embed our mission to defeat ISIS within a broader struggle against radical jihadism.

"Extremist groups like ISIS feed off instability and conflict, and there is no shortage of that in the Middle East today. Decades of repression, poverty corruption, a lack of pluralism and tolerance, turned the region into a powder keg. Now we have long faced hard choices in the Middle East about how to balance our interest in working with any reliable partner, even those who don't share our values, with our commitment to democratic principles and human rights. Those dilemmas aren't going away, and we can't forget that lasting security and stability will only come with real reform that provides more space in both the economy and the political system for more people. That's why we have to work with our friends and partners to support economic and political modernization and train effective and accountable local intelligence, law enforcement, and counterterrorism services. And, once and for all, the Saudis, the Qataris, the Kuwaitis and others must stop their citizens from funding extremist organizations, and stop supporting radical schools and mosques around the world that have set too many young people on a path toward extremism. The second trend that makes a strengthened U.S-Israeli relationship essential is Iran's increasingly aggressive regional ambitions.

"Tehran's fingerprints are on nearly every conflict across the Middle East. Iran supports bad actors from Syria to Lebanon to Yemen and beyond. The Iranian Revolutionary Guard and its proxies are attempting to establish a beachhead on the Golan from which to threaten Israel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In Southern Lebanon, Hezbollah is amassing an arsenal of rockets and artillery. And the Ayatollahs continue to threaten Israel's destruction at every opportunity. We all agree that Iran can never be allowed to obtain a nuclear weapon. Now, as you know, I support the nuclear agreement negotiated by the world's great powers. Is it perfect? No, no agreement like that ever is. But I believe that if it is aggressively implemented and enforced, this deal will help us prevent a nuclear-armed Iran.

"That said, it is not enough to say yes to this deal. We have to say yes and we will vigorously enforce it.Yes and we will embed it in a larger effort to counter Iran across the region. How we handle enforcement in these early months will set the tone for years to come, so we have to get it right. Our message to Iran must be unequivocal. There will be consequences for even small violations and we are ready to snap back sanctions into place. Our approach must be distrust and verify. There can be no doubt in Tehran that if we see any indication that Iran's leaders are violating their commitment in the deal not to seek, develop or acquire any nuclear weapons we will stop them. And we will make sure the Iranians and the world understand that the United States will act decisively if necessary, including taking military action. And we should also should hold Iran and its Revolutionary Guard Corps accountable for their sponsorship of terrorism, ballistic missile development, human rights violations, detention of Americans, and other illicit behavior like cybercrime.

"Now make no mistake, Iran will test our resolve. They have already started to do so, with a ballistic missile test and other provocative behavior. We have to respond to these provocations, including with further sanctions designations as necessary. The third trend is the growing effort around the world to isolate and delegitimize Israel.

"This is not a new challenge. As Secretary of State, I called out systemic, structural anti-Israel bias at the UN and fought to block the one-sided Goldstone Report. Particularly at a time when anti-Semitism is on the rise across the world, especially in Europe, we need to repudiate efforts to malign and undermine Israel and the Jewish people. The Boycott, Divestment, and Sanctions movement, known as BDS, is the latest front in this battle. Demonizing Israeli scientists and intellectuals, even young students. Comparing Israel to South African apartheid. Now no nation, no nation, is above criticism, but this is wrong and it should stop immediately. Some proponents of BDS may hope that pressuring Israel will lead to peace. Well that's wrong too. No outside force is going to resolve the conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians.

"Only a two-state solution can provide Palestinians independence, sovereignty and dignity, and provide Israelis the secure and recognized borders of a democratic, Jewish state. Now, it's no secret that the most recent efforts to advance direct negotiations didn't yield much tangible progress. But I remain convinced and I think it's important we all remain convinced, that peace is possible. So I refuse to give up on the goal of two states for two people. And no matter how unattainable it may seem at the moment, Israelis and Palestinians shouldn't give up on it either.

"Instead, they should demand that their leaders seek every opportunity to demonstrate their commitment. Inaction is not an option. And a "one-state solution" is no solution. It is a prescription for endless conflict. Israelis deserve security, recognition, and a normal life free from terror. And Palestinians should be able to govern themselves in their own state, in peace and dignity. Now for most Americans, it is hard to imagine the reality that exists for many Palestinians and recently for Israelis. So as difficult as this is, we need to look for opportunities to move forward together. Everyone has to do their part to create the conditions for progress by taking positive actions that can rebuild trust and by avoiding damaging actions, including with respect to settlements. And at the same time we should also oppose any unilateral action at the United Nations.

"Now I know that sometimes this process can start to feel like that famous definition of insanity, doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result. But circumstances do change. And most importantly, demographics change. Technology changes. Geopolitics changes. Today, in the Middle East, Israel and its Arab neighbors find that many of their strategic interests are increasingly aligned. That creates room for greater coordination. Neither Israel nor its Arab neighbors want to see Iran increase its influence in the region or violent jihadists gain footholds. So we should encourage more intelligence sharing and security cooperation like the quiet partnership between Israel and Egypt to stabilize the Sinai. And you may have seen that Israel plans to open a diplomatic mission in the UAE to participate in the International Renewable Energy Agency, which I was proud to support locating in Abu Dhabi. Imagine how that kind of step could be followed by broader diplomatic engagement.

"Converging interests between Israel and key Arab states may make it possible to promote progress on the Israeli-Palestinian issue, and clearly progress between Israelis and Palestinians could contribute toward greater cooperation between Israel and Arabs. Right now, Arab leaders could send a powerful message by reviving and updating the Arab Peace Initiative and laying out a process for normalizing relations with Israel and accepting it as a Jewish state alongside an independent Palestine. And Israel could seize the opportunity to directly respond to such an initiative. This is no magic wand, but there's a real strategic opportunity worth exploring.

"That said, it's also time to stop pretending that solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will solve all of the Middle East's problems. For too long Arab states have used the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as an excuse to avoid facing their own challenges at home. The people of the region have shown that they will no longer accept this. Their leaders should drop the excuses and pick up the pace of getting their own houses in order.

"And as they do, the United States will support them. We should reaffirm that the Gulf is a region of vital interest to America and commit to sustaining a robust military relationship with our partners there to defend against radical jihadism and Iranian aggression in any form. So if you add it all up, radical jihadism on the rise, Iran seeking to extend its reach, efforts to delegitimize Israel, we can see how crucial it is for the United States and Israel to stand together closer than ever.

"And we can see how Israel's search for security, stability, and peace goes hand-in-hand with the broader effort the United States must lead to secure and stabilize the Middle East. Now, we know our governments have had their share of disagreements in recent years. But the relationship has always been stronger and deeper than the headlines might lead you to believe. Under President Obama, we achieved unprecedented defense and intelligence collaboration and supported the development of the Iron Dome air defense system, which saved many Israeli lives when Hamas rockets began to fly from Gaza. As Secretary of State, I worked with the Israeli government to negotiate a cease-fire that ended those rocket attacks in 2012 and vigorously defended Israel at the UN and in other international bodies. Now, as I've said, it's time, it's the time to take our alliance to the next level.

"A centerpiece of that effort must be ensuring that Israel continues to maintain its qualitative military edge. The United States should help further bolster Israeli air defenses, including to cover Israel's north, and make it a top priority to develop better tunnel detection technology to prevent arms smuggling and kidnapping. And we need to ensure that a new 10-year defense memorandum of understanding sends a clear message to Israel's enemies that they will never prevail. But we all know that our common security commitments are about more than lists of weapons or dollars and cents. They are about understanding each other. Acting together. Being on the same page. So let's expand high-level U.S.-Israel strategic consultations. Bring our best minds together for deeper discussions about enforcing the nuclear deal, countering Iran's regional ambitions, and developing new defense technologies for the future.

"If Israel and the United States stand shoulder-to-shoulder and present a united front to the region and the world, I am confident we can meet the threats and challenges we face today.

"I was born just a few months before the State of Israel and my generation came of age admiring the talent and tenacity of the Israeli people. We marveled as they coaxed a dream into reality out of the harsh desert soil, and built a thriving, raucous democracy in a region full of adversaries and autocrats determined to push Israel into the sea. We watched a small nation fight fearlessly for its right to exist. And Israel's pursuit of peace was as inspiring as its prowess in war. It was one of the great honors of my life to call Yitzhak Rabin a friend and to witness that historic handshake on the White House lawn. Many Americans feel a deep emotional connection with Israel. In its story we see some of our own, and the story of all people who struggle for freedom and self-determination. We see a homeland for people long oppressed, and a thriving economy that is a model for how innovation, entrepreneurship, and freedom can deliver prosperity even in unforgiving circumstances. So we are two nations woven together. Lands built by immigrants and exiles seeking to live and worship in freedom, given life by democratic principles, and sustained by the service and sacrifice of generations of patriots.

"Yet even with all this history, even with all our common interests and shared values, none of us can or should take this relationship for granted. With every passing year, we must tie the bonds tighter. Reach out to the next generation, we can bring them with us and do the hard necessary work of friendship. Because there is a new generation in both countries today that does not remember that shared past. Young Americans who didn't see Israel in a fight for survival again and again. Young Israelis who didn't see the United States broker peace at Camp David or kindle hope at Oslo or stand behind Israel when it was attacked. They are growing up in a different world. And the future of our relationship depends on building new ties for a new time. Ben Gurion once said, "In Israel, in order to be a realist you must believe in miracles." Well, tonight is the first night of Chanukah, when the Jewish people in Israel and all over the world praise the Almighty for the miracles for the redemption, for the mighty deeds, for the saving acts.

"This season and this moment in history is a time once again for mighty deeds and saving acts. For us to rededicate and renew our great alliance. For us once again to light candles of hope that will shine through the darkness for our peoples and all peoples, if we do it together. Thank you all very much."

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton's poll numbers come back down to earth"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 9, 2014 11:47 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton's favorability ratings continue to tumble as she renters the political fray, with 43% of respondents now saying they view her positively, according to a new NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, down from a high of 60% in 2009.

But Clinton remains one of only two politicians polled whose favorability rating tops their unfavorable numbers (the other being her husband, former president Bill Clinton). Forty-one percent of respondents hold a negative view of the former first lady and potential 2016 presidential candidate, slightly fewer than those who hold positive views.

Clinton's numbers were likely destined to fall back to earth as she reentered domestic partisan politics. In recent months, she's increasingly weighed in on hot-button issues like gun control, which is likely to blunt her support among non-Democrats who may have liked her as secretary of state or as a private citizen, but would never support her as a presidential candidate.

George W. Bush's ratings, for instance, have climbed since he left office.

Her husband remains the most popular political figure surveyed, with 56% of respondents holding positive views of the former president and just 21% expressing a negative opinion.

Florida Republican Sen. Marco Rubio, who is also eyeing a presidential bid, breaks even with the same number holding favorable and unfavorable views. Among other potential GOP presidential contenders, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul has a net negative four point rating, Mitt Romney is down seven points, and Jeb Bush is down 11 points.

There is somewhat more intensity against Clinton than for her, with 26% saying they hold "very negative" views of Clinton and 21% holding "very positive" views of the former first lady.

Clinton allies say the former secretary of state is still strong, despite the drop in favorability rating. "Despite the fact that Republicans are resorting to misinformed and blatantly false attacks on Hillary Clinton's record, poll after poll demonstrates that she continues to be one of the most admired leaders not only in America, but across the globe," said Adrienne Elrod of the pro-Clinton group rapid response group Correct the Record.

Mother Jones: "How Hillary Clinton's State Department Sold Fracking to the World"

By Mariah Blake

September/ October 2014

ONE ICY MORNING in February 2012, Hillary Clinton's plane touched down in the Bulgarian capital, Sofia, which was just digging out from a fierce blizzard. Wrapped in a thick coat, the secretary of state descended the stairs to the snow-covered tarmac, where she and her aides piled into a motorcade bound for the presidential palace. That afternoon, they huddled with Bulgarian leaders, including Prime Minister Boyko Borissov, discussing everything from Syria's bloody civil war to their joint search for loose nukes. But the focus of the talks was fracking. The previous year, Bulgaria had signed a five-year, $68 million deal, granting US oil giant Chevron millions of acres in shale gas concessions. Bulgarians were outraged. Shortly before Clinton arrived, tens of thousands of protesters poured into the streets carrying placards that read "Stop fracking with our water" and "Chevron go home." Bulgaria's parliament responded by voting overwhelmingly for a fracking moratorium.

Clinton urged Bulgarian officials to give fracking another chance. According to Borissov, she agreed to help fly in the "best specialists on these new technologies to present the benefits to the Bulgarian people." But resistance only grew. The following month in neighboring Romania, thousands of people gathered to protest another Chevron fracking project, and Romania's parliament began weighing its own shale gas moratorium. Again Clinton intervened, dispatching her special envoy for energy in Eurasia, Richard Morningstar, to push back against the fracking bans. The State Department's lobbying effort culminated in late May 2012, when Morningstar held a series of meetings on fracking with top Bulgarian and Romanian officials. He also touted the technology in an interview on Bulgarian national radio, saying it could lead to a fivefold drop in the price of natural gas. A few weeks later, Romania's parliament voted down its proposed fracking ban and Bulgaria's eased its moratorium.

The episode sheds light on a crucial but little-known dimension of Clinton's diplomatic legacy. Under her leadership, the State Department worked closely with energy companies to spread fracking around the globe—part of a broader push to fight climate change, boost global energy supply, and undercut the power of adversaries such as Russia that use their energy resources as a cudgel. But environmental groups fear that exporting fracking, which has been linked to drinking-water contamination and earthquakes at home, could wreak havoc in countries with scant environmental regulation. And according to interviews, diplomatic cables, and other documents obtained by Mother Jones, American officials—some with deep ties to industry—also helped US firms clinch potentially lucrative shale concessions overseas, raising troubling questions about whose interests the program actually serves.

GEOLOGISTS HAVE LONG KNOWN that there were huge quantities of natural gas locked in shale rock. But tapping it wasn't economically viable until the late 1990s, when a Texas wildcatter named George Mitchell hit on a novel extraction method that involved drilling wells sideways from the initial borehole, then blasting them full of water, chemicals, and sand to break up the shale—a variation of a technique known as hydraulic fracturing, or fracking. Besides dislodging a bounty of natural gas, Mitchell's breakthrough ignited an energy revolution. Between 2006 and 2008, domestic gas reserves jumped 35 percent. The United States later vaulted past Russia to become the world's largest natural gas producer. As a result, prices dropped to record lows, and America began to wean itself from coal, along with oil and gas imports, which lessened its dependence on the Middle East. The surging global gas supply also helped shrink Russia's economic clout: Profits for Russia's state-owned gas company, Gazprom, plummeted by more than 60 percent between 2008 and 2009 alone.

Clinton, who was sworn in as secretary of state in early 2009, believed that shale gas could help rewrite global energy politics. "This is a moment of profound change," she later told a crowd at Georgetown University. "Countries that used to depend on others for their energy are now producers. How will this shape world events? Who will benefit, and who will not?…The answers to these questions are being written right now, and we intend to play a major role." Clinton tapped a lawyer named David Goldwyn as her special envoy for international energy affairs; his charge was "to elevate energy diplomacy as a key function of US foreign policy."

Goldwyn had a long history of promoting drilling overseas—both as a Department of Energy official under Bill Clinton and as a representative of the oil industry. From 2005 to 2009 he directed the US-Libya Business Association, an organization funded primarily by US oil companies—including Chevron, Exxon Mobil, and Marathon—clamoring to tap Libya's abundant supply. Goldwyn lobbied Congress for pro-Libyan policies and even battled legislation that would have allowed families of the Lockerbie bombing victims to sue the Libyan government for its alleged role in the attack.

According to diplomatic cables released by WikiLeaks, one of Goldwyn's first acts at the State Department was gathering oil and gas industry executives "to discuss the potential international impact of shale gas." Clinton then sent a cable to US diplomats, asking them to collect information on the potential for fracking in their host countries. These efforts eventually gave rise to the Global Shale Gas Initiative, which aimed to help other nations develop their shale potential. Clinton promised it would do so "in a way that is as environmentally respectful as possible."

But environmental groups were barely consulted, while industry played a crucial role. When Goldwyn unveiled the initiative in April 2010, it was at a meeting of the United States Energy Association, a trade organization representing Chevron, Exxon Mobil, and ConocoPhillips, all of which were pursuing fracking overseas. Among their top targets was Poland, which preliminary studies suggested had abundant shale gas. The day after Goldwyn's announcement, the US Embassy in Warsaw helped organize a shale gas conference, underwritten by these same companies (plus the oil field services company Halliburton) and attended by officials from the departments of State and Energy.

In some cases, Clinton personally promoted shale gas. During a 2010 gathering of foreign ministers in Washington, DC, she spoke about America's plans to help spread fracking abroad. "I know that in some places [it] is controversial," she said, "but natural gas is the cleanest fossil fuel available for power generation today." She later traveled to Poland for a series of meetings with officials, after which she announced that the country had joined the Global Shale Gas Initiative.

That August, delegates from 17 countries descended on Washington for the State Department's first shale gas conference. The media was barred from attending, and officials refused to reveal basic information, including which countries took part. When Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) inquired about industry involvement, the department would say only that there had been "a limited industry presence." (State Department officials have since been more forthcoming with Mother Jones: In addition to a number of US government agencies, they say attendees heard from energy firms, including Devon, Chesapeake, and Halliburton.)

During the cursory press conference that followed, Goldwyn, a short, bespectacled man with a shock of dark hair, argued that other nations could avoid the environmental damage sometimes associated with fracking by following America's lead and adopting "an umbrella of laws and regulations." A reporter suggested that US production had actually "outpaced the ability to effectively oversee the safety" and asked how we could be sure the same wouldn't happen elsewhere. Goldwyn replied that attendees had heard about safety issues from energy companies and the Groundwater Protection Council, a nonprofit organization that receives industry funding and opposes federal regulation of fracking wastewater disposal.

Goldwyn and the delegates then boarded a bus to Pennsylvania for an industry-sponsored luncheon and tour of some shale fields. Paul Hueper, director of energy programs at the State Department's Bureau of Energy Resources, says the tour was organized independently and that energy firms were only invited to the conference itself to share best practices. "We are very firm on this," he insisted. "We do not shill for industry."

WHILE THE MEETING helped stir up interest, it wasn't until 2011 that global fracking fever set in for real. That spring, the US Energy Information Administration (EIA) released its initial estimate of global shale gas, which found that 32 countries had viable shale basins and put global recoverable shale gas at 6,600 trillion cubic feet—enough to supply the world for more than 50 years at current rates of consumption. This was a rich opportunity for big oil and gas companies, which had largely missed out on the US fracking boom and were under pressure from Wall Street to shore up their dwindling reserves. "They're desperate," says Antoine Simon, who coordinates the shale gas campaign at Friends of the Earth Europe. "It's the last push to continue their fossil fuel development."

The industry began fighting hard for access to shale fields abroad, and promoting gas as the fuel of choice for slashing carbon emissions. In Europe, lobbyists circulated a report claiming that the European Union could save 900 billion euros if it invested in gas rather than renewable energy to meet its 2050 climate targets. This rankled environmentalists, who argue fracking may do little to ease global warming, given that wells and pipelines leak large quantities of methane, a potent greenhouse gas. They also fear it could crowd out investment in renewables.

By early 2011, the State Department was laying plans to launch a new bureau to integrate energy into every aspect of foreign policy—an idea Goldwyn had long been advocating. In 2005, he and a Chevron executive named Jan Kalicki had published a book called Energy and Security: Toward a New Foreign Policy Strategy, which argued that energy independence was unattainable in the near term and urged Washington to shift its focus to energy security—by boosting global fossil fuel production and stifling unrest that might upset energy markets. Goldwyn and his ideas had played a key role in shaping the bureau, so some observers were surprised when he quietly stepped down just before its launch.

When I approached Goldwyn following a recent speaking engagement in Washington, DC, to ask about his time at the State Department and why he left, he ducked out a side door, and Kalicki blocked the corridor to keep me from following. Goldwyn later said via email that he had simply chosen "to return to the private sector."

Around the time of his departure, WikiLeaks released a slew of diplomatic cables, including one describing a 2009 meeting during which Goldwyn and Canadian officials discussed development of the Alberta oil sands—a project benefiting some of the same firms behind the US-Libya Business Association. The cable said that Goldwyn had coached his Canadian counterparts on improving "oil sands messaging" and helped alleviate their concerns about getting oil sands crude to US markets. This embarrassed the State Department, which is reviewing the controversial Keystone XL pipeline proposal to transport crude oil from Canada and is under fire from environmentalists.

After leaving State, Goldwyn took a job with Sutherland, a law and lobbying firm that touts his "deep understanding" of pipeline issues, and launched his own company, Goldwyn Global Strategies.

In late 2011, Clinton finally unveiled the new Bureau of Energy Resources, with 63 employees and a multimillion-dollar budget. She also promised to instruct US embassies around the globe to step up their work on energy issues and "pursue more outreach to private-sector energy" firms, some of which had generously supported both her and President Barack Obama's political campaigns. (One Chevron executive bundled large sums for Clinton's 2008 presidential bid, for example.)

As part of its expanded energy mandate, the State Department hosted conferences on fracking from Thailand to Botswana. It sent US experts to work alongside foreign officials as they developed shale gas programs. And it arranged for dozens of foreign delegations to visit the United States to attend workshops and meet with industry consultants—as well as with environmental groups, in some cases.

US oil giants, meanwhile, were snapping up natural gas leases in far-flung places. By 2012, Chevron had large shale concessions in Argentina, Australia, Canada, China, and South Africa, as well as in Eastern Europe, which was in the midst of a claim-staking spree; Poland alone had granted more than 100 shale concessions covering nearly a third of its territory. When the nation lit its first shale gas flare atop a Halliburton-drilled well that fall, the state-owned gas company ran full-page ads in the country's largest newspapers showing a spindly rig rising above the hills in the tiny village of Lubocino, alongside the tagline: "Don't put out the flame of hope." Politicians promised that Poland would soon break free of its nemesis, Russia, which supplies the lion's share of its gas. "After years of dependence on our large neighbor, today we can say that my generation will see the day when we will be independent in the area of natural gas," Prime Minister Donald Tusk declared. "And we will be setting terms."

But shale was not the godsend that industry leaders and foreign governments had hoped it would be. For one, new research from the US Geological Survey suggested that the EIA assessments had grossly overestimated shale deposits: The recoverable shale gas estimate for Poland shrank from 187 trillion cubic feet to 1.3 trillion cubic feet, a 99 percent drop. Geological conditions and other factors in Europe and Asia also made fracking more arduous and expensive; one industry study estimated that drilling shale gas in Poland would cost three times what it does in the United States.

By 2013, US oil giants were abandoning their Polish shale plays. "The expectations for global shale gas were extremely high," says the State Department's Hueper. "But the geological limitations and aboveground challenges are immense. A handful of countries have the potential for a boom, but there may never be a global shale gas revolution."

The politics of fracking overseas were also fraught. According to Susan Sakmar, a visiting law professor at the University of Houston who has studied fracking regulation, the United States is one of the only nations where individual landowners own the mineral rights. "In most, perhaps all, other countries of the world, the underground resources belong to the crown or the government," she explains. The fact that property owners didn't stand to profit from drilling on their land ignited public outrage in some parts of the world, especially Eastern Europe. US officials speculate that Russia also had a hand in fomenting protests there. "The perception among diplomats in the region was that Russia was protecting its interests," says Mark Gitenstein, the former US ambassador to Romania. "It didn't want shale gas for obvious reasons."

Faced with these obstacles, US and European energy companies launched a lobbying blitz targeting the European Union. They formed faux grassroots organizations, plied lawmakers with industry-funded studies, and hosted lavish dinners and conferences for regulators. The website for one industry confab—which, according to Friends of the Earth Europe, featured presentations from Exxon Mobil, Total, and Halliburton—warned that failure to develop shale gas "will have damaging consequences on European energy security and prosperity" and urged European governments to "allow shale gas exploration to advance" so they could "fully understand the scale of the opportunity."

US lobbying shops also jumped into the fray. Covington & Burling, a major Washington firm, hired several former senior EU policymakers—including a top energy official who, according to the New York Times, arrived with a not-yet-public draft of the European Commission's fracking regulations.

In June 2013, Covington staffer Jean De Ruyt, a former Belgian diplomat and adviser to the European Commission, hosted an event at the firm's Brussels office. Executives from Chevron and other oil and gas behemoths attended, as did Kurt Vandenberghe, then one of the commission's top environmental regulators. These strategies appeared to pay off: The commission's recently released framework for regulating fracking includes recommendations for governments but not firm requirements. "They chose the weakest option they had," says Simon of Friends of the Earth Europe. "People at the highest level of the commission are in the industry's pocket."

Goldwyn was also busy promoting fracking overseas—this time on behalf of industry. Between January and October 2012, his firm organized a series of workshops on fracking for officials in Bulgaria, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, and Ukraine, all of them funded by Chevron. The events were closed to the public—when Romanian journalist Vlad Ursulean tried to attend the Romanian gathering, he says Goldwyn personally saw to it that he was escorted out.

Goldwyn told Mother Jones that the workshops featured presentations on technical aspects of fracking by academics from the Colorado School of Mines and Penn State University. Chevron, he maintains, had "no editorial input." But all of these countries—except Bulgaria, which was in the midst of anti-fracking protests—would later grant Chevron major shale concessions.

In some cases, the State Department had a direct hand in negotiating the deals. Gitenstein, then the ambassador to Romania, met with Chevron executives and Romanian officials and pressed them to hand over millions of acres of shale concessions. "The Romanians were just sitting on the leases, and Chevron was upset. So I intervened," says Gitenstein, whose State Department tenure has been bookended by stints at Mayer Brown, a law and lobbying firm that has represented Chevron. "This is traditionally what ambassadors do on behalf of American companies." In the end, Romania signed a 30-year deal with Chevron, which helped set off massive, nationwide protests.

When the government began weighing a fracking ban, it didn't sit well with Gitenstein, who went on Romanian television and warned that, without fracking, the nation could be stuck paying five times what America does for natural gas. He added that US shale prospectors had "obtained great successes—without consequences for the environment, I dare say." The proposed moratorium soon died.

A FEW WEEKS LATER, Chevron was preparing to build its first fracking rig near Pungesti, a tiny farming village in northeastern Romania. According to a memo from the prime minister's office, a Romanian official met with Chevron executives and an embassy-based US Commerce Department employee to craft a PR strategy for the project. They agreed to organize a kickoff event at Victoria Palace in Bucharest. As a spokesman, they would tap Damian Draghici, a charismatic Romanian lawmaker who was a "recognized personality among the Roma minority," which had a "considerable presence" around Chevron's planned drilling sites. "It was really extraordinary—the level of collaboration between these players," says Ursulean, who has written extensively about Chevron's activities in Romania. "It was as if they were all branches of the same company."

The strategy did little to soothe the public's ire. When Chevron finally did attempt to install the rig in late 2013, residents—including elderly villagers who arrived in horse-drawn carts—blockaded the planned drilling sites. The Romanian Orthodox Church rallied behind them, with one local priest likening Chevron to enemy "invaders." Soon, anti-fracking protests were cropping up from Poland to the United Kingdom. But Chevron didn't back down. Along with other American energy firms, it lobbied to insert language in a proposed US-EU trade agreement allowing US companies to haul European governments before international arbitration panels for any actions threatening their investments. Chevron argued this was necessary to protect shareholders against "arbitrary" and "unfair" treatment by local authorities. But environmental groups say it would stymie fracking regulation and point to a $250 million lawsuit Delaware-based Lone Pine Resources has filed against the Canadian province of Quebec for temporarily banning fracking near a key source of drinking water. The case hinges on a similar trade provision.

Despite the public outcry in Europe, the State Department has stayed the course. Clinton's successor as secretary of state, John Kerry, views natural gas as a key part of his push against climate change. Under Kerry, State has ramped up investment in its shale gas initiative and is planning to expand it to 30 more countries, from Cambodia to Papua New Guinea.

Following the Crimea crisis, the Obama administration has also been pressing Eastern European countries to fast-track their fracking initiatives so as to be less dependent on Russia. During an April visit to Ukraine, which has granted concessions to Chevron and Royal Dutch Shell, Vice President Joe Biden announced that the United States would bring in technical experts to speed up its shale gas development. "We stand ready to assist you," promised Biden, whose son Hunter has since joined the board of a Ukrainian energy company. "Imagine where you'd be today if you were able to tell Russia: 'Keep your gas.' It would be a very different world."

MSNBC blog: The Maddow Blog: "Benghazi creeps back into spotlight"

By Steve Benen

September 10, 2014, 10:30 a.m. EDT

The deadly attack on a U.S. outpost in Benghazi two years ago has been investigated by seven congressional committees, each of which concluded that the conspiracy theorists are wrong. House Republicans nevertheless concluded that it's time for an eighth committee to launch a probe, which its chairman, Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), insists won't be the least bit political.

And yet, consider what Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.) said over the weekend.

"U.S. Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Grantville) addressed the Benghazi investigation and terrorist organization ISIS among other topics Saturday morning at the Cobb County GOP breakfast at its headquarters. […]

"'I'm not going to stand here and confirm or deny anything,' Westmoreland told the crowd. 'Our job is to figure out the truth.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Westmoreland spent much of his speech criticizing Democrats. 'I think our enemy stands on 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.,' Westmoreland said to loud applause."

Oh good, we're reached the point at which elected lawmakers publicly describe the president of the United States as an enemy."

According to the report in the Marietta Daily Journal, Westmoreland went on to say that "it's hard" for congressional Democrats "to be bipartisan."

Said the guy who considers the president his "enemy."

Remember, Westmoreland isn't just some random conservative – the Georgia Republican was one of only seven House Republicans to be named to the new GOP Benghazi committee. In May, Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) said Westmoreland has "no business" joining the select committee, calling it "inappropriate" for the far-right lawmaker to serve on the panel while also overseeing political strategy for the National Republican Campaign Committee.

With the benefit of hindsight, Lewis' concerns appear well grounded.

Igor Bobic added, "Admission for the Marietta, Georgia, event was $10. The Cobb County GOP touted the event as a 'very unusual breakfast' where its supporters would receive an 'update on the Benghazi investigation.'"

Trey Gowdy recently said he hopes to avoid a media "circus" with his investigation. "If you take the approach 'Are we doing this to learn more and better ourselves as a people? And be respectful of their sacrifice?' then you won't let it become a circus," he said.

And yet, here's a handpicked member of Gowdy's panel, using the Benghazi investigation to help a local Republican Party, at an event in which that member referred to the president as an "enemy."

As for the larger context, with Gowdy's committee poised to hold its first hearing next week, msnbc's Alex Seitz-Wald noted last week, "After several mercifully Benghazi-free months, the 2012 attack on the diplomatic compound in Libya is about to be thrust back into the spotlight around its September 11 anniversary."

Fox News, naturally, is getting increasingly invested, repackaging old news as new fodder, while again pushing discredited theories.

Huffington Post blog: Bill Schneider, senior fellow and resident scholar at Third Way: "Will the 2016 Presidential Race Be the 'We Told You So' Election?"

By Bill Schneider

September 9, 2014, 10:50 a.m. EDT

It would be the "We told you so" election: Mitt Romney versus Hillary Clinton in 2016. The campaign would look like an effort to roll back the calendar and say, "Let's get it right this time."

There's plenty of buyers' remorse in the electorate right now. At a time when the world is beset by crises, President Obama's legendary coolness makes him seem weak and detached. The president's careless statements have only amplified that impression, including remarks that "we don't have a strategy yet" for dealing with ISIS and our goal is to reduce Islamic extremism to "a manageable problem." A recent CNN poll offered voters a redo of the 2012 election. The result: Romney would now beat Obama by a decisive margin (53 percent to 44 percent).

Romney encouraged the speculation in a backhanded way when he told a radio talk show host there's "one in a million" chance he will run in 2016: "Let's say all the guys that were running [for the Republican nomination] came together and said, 'Hey, we've decided we can't do it, you must do it.' That's the one in a million we're thinking about."

Romney's comment stirred some excitement among Republicans. They are keenly aware of the country's buyers' remorse. A USA Today poll of Iowa Republican caucus participants raised a lot of eyebrows last month when it showed Romney, at 35 percent, far ahead of all the other contenders. That's partly name recognition and partly Republicans' desire for a do-over. It also reflects the fact that no other Republican contender has caught fire. In three different national polls of Republicans this summer, no potential contender got more than 13 percent support (Romney's name was not offered).

The Republican Party establishment is worried. All their potential standard-bearers -- Chris Christie, Scott Walker, Paul Ryan, Rick Perry -- have significant problems. That's why the party elite is fantasizing about either Romney or Jeb Bush. At the same time, Tea Party activists and evangelicals are warning the party not to nominate another establishment candidate like John McCain or Mitt Romney.

"The Republican base will not tolerate another candidate foisted upon us as a guy who can win," said Gary Bauer, a leading figure in the religious right.

It has become rare for a party to renominate the candidate who lost the previous election. It didn't work for Democrats with Adlai Stevenson (1952 and 1956) or for Republicans with Thomas Dewey (1944 and 1948). Both got a smaller share of the vote the second time. Democrats nominated William Jennings Bryan three times (1896, 1900, and 1908). Bryan's share of the vote went down each time. Bryan was a populist. So in 1904, Democrats took a different tack and nominated a conservative, Alton B. Parker. That didn't work either. Parker did worse than Bryan.

It did work when Republicans nominated Richard Nixon a second time in 1968. But Nixon had to wait eight years. In between, Republicans suffered the catastrophe of Barry Goldwater's candidacy in 1964. Given the fact that Nixon lost in 1960 by what is still the closest vote in U.S. history (a popular vote margin of 0.2 percent), renominating Nixon did not look like such a big risk.

Romney seems aware of the risk the party would take by renominating him. "I have looked at what happens to anybody in this country who loses as the nominee of their party," Romney has said. "They become a loser for life." But he lost to Obama, and widespread dissatisfaction with President Obama is causing Republicans to fantasize about bringing Romney back to life.

"In many ways, it looks like 2016 will be a referendum on Obama in the same way 2008 was a referendum on [George W.] Bush," Romney's former chief strategist told Politico.

That would certainly be the case if Vice President Joe Biden were the Democratic nominee. But Hillary Clinton? She also lost to Obama. Democrats, too, are longing to go back to the future and redo the 2008 primaries.

Clinton loyally served in the Obama administration for four years. That leads many Republicans to believe she would represent a third term for Obama. But the fierce 2008 primary campaign established Clinton's identity. She has her own distinctive record, plus that of her husband, to run on. President Clinton's economic record stands in sharp contrast to Obama's.

While Romney would easily defeat Obama if there were a rematch right now, he would not do so well against Clinton. The CNN poll shows Clinton leading Romney by an even larger margin, 55 percent to 42 percent. That's pretty good evidence that voters do not see the prospect of a Clinton presidency as a "third term for Obama."

Brookings: "Obama, ISIS, and What a New War Means for 2016"

By William A Galston

September 10, 2014, 12:00 p.m. EDT

As President Obama prepares to address the nation this evening, Americans with some grey in their hair have seen this movie before.

In May 1977, President Jimmy Carter gave a speech at Notre Dame rejecting what he termed the “inordinate fear of communism.” Less than three years later, he confessed that the invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979 had taught him more about the Soviet Union than he had learned previously in his entire presidency, and he initiated tough new anti-Soviet policies, including a covert campaign to arm the Afghan resistance.

In October 2011, President Barack Obama announced the full withdrawal of American troops from Iraq by year’s end. “The tide of war is receding,” he declared, and “America’s war in Iraq is over.” Tonight, Mr. Obama will announce his strategy for defeating a fanatical army that has seized a large swath of Iraqi territory.

The rise of ISIS is to the Obama presidency what the invasion of Afghanistan was to the Carter presidency: the refutation of a central premise of the administration’s foreign policy.

Mr. Obama’s pivot back to the Middle East has domestic political consequences as well. Senator Rand Paul (R-KY), an undeclared candidate for his party’s presidential nomination, has had the wind in his sails as he has advocated a libertarian-tinged policy of restraint abroad. ISIS’ beheading of two Americans has moved Republican sentiment back toward its longstanding hawkishness, boosting the prospects of neo-Reaganites such as Florida’s Sen. Marco Rubio and complicating Sen. Paul’s path.

As for the Democrats, there was restive grumbling among liberals as former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton became more open about her disagreements with Mr. Obama’s foreign policy, notably on Syria. But now, as the president toughens his stance in the Middle East, the breach is narrowing. If Secretary Clinton presents herself as a candidate for her party’s nomination, she will be able to run as the heir of a foreign policy that has moved sharply in her direction, and as the leader of a party whose major factions are in alignment.

It is likely that the 2016 presidential election will focus on the economy rather than foreign policy. Still, Americans know that presidents have the power to place their sons and daughters in harm’s way. That is why the reverberations from tonight’s speech are likely to be long-lasting.

Bloomberg View: Francis Berry: “Hillary's Biggest Foe Is History”

By Francis Barry

September 10, 2014, 11:07 a.m. EDT

If Hillary Clinton runs for the White House and wins, she would make history -- not only as the first female president, but also as the first Democratic candidate since before the Civil War to win the presidency after a failed first run for the office.

Hubert Humphrey (1968), George McGovern (1972) and Al Gore (2000) all ran for president at least once before securing the Democratic Party’s presidential nomination -- and all lost in general elections.

Lyndon Johnson won the presidency in 1964 after losing out on the party’s nomination at the 1960 convention, but he was a sitting president in 1964, not an aspirant. The last non-incumbent Democrat to come back from a losing bid to win the presidency was James Buchanan (the bachelor president) in 1856, four years after a divided convention denied him the nomination, settling instead on a compromise candidate, Franklin Pierce.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Does this bit of trivia doom Clinton's chances in 2016? Of course not. But it does tell us something about Democratic presidential voters in general: They tend to like fresh faces. Six of the last seven non-incumbent Democrats to be nominated for president (Barack Obama, John Kerry, Bill Clinton, Michael Dukakis, Walter Mondale and Jimmy Carter) have been first-time candidates, as were John Kennedy, Adlai Stevenson and Franklin Roosevelt.

On the Republican side, the situation is reversed: Since 1944, only four Republicans have won the party's nomination without having previously sought it, and each either held national office (Richard Nixon in 1960 and Gerald Ford in 1976) or had national name recognition (war hero Dwight Eisenhower in 1952 and presidential scion George W. Bush in 2000). All other Republican nominees -- Thomas Dewey, Barry Goldwater, Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush, Bob Dole, John McCain and Mitt Romney -- won the party's nomination on their second or third try.

Republican voters, it would seem, aren't as eager as Democrats to take chances on newcomers. That makes sense: They're more conservative. In 2016, however, there will be no Republican candidate holding national office. Only one rumored candidate, Jeb Bush, is a national name, and he will not have as clear a path to the nomination as his brother did in 2000, given his vulnerabilities with the party's base.

At least two possible contenders have previously sought the White House (Mike Huckabee and Rick Perry), but both have real weaknesses and could join the list of Republicans who have run multiple times (Steve Forbes, Pat Buchanan, Ron Paul and others) without winning the nomination.

If Bush runs, some first-time aspirants may take a pass on the race. They should think twice. Republican and Democratic primary voters could flip roles in the 2016 primaries, with Republicans voting for fresh blood. If they do, it would be the first time since Wendell Willkie in 1940 that Republicans nominate a first-time candidate who is not a national figure.

No matter who wins the nomination, first-time Republican candidates will have an opportunity to introduce themselves to voters, gaining a familiarity that -- if history is any guide -- will be helpful to them in 2020 or 2024. As with the Democrats, there is no reason to think that Republican voters won't return to their usual modus operandi in future elections.

So a word of advice to the increasingly long list of potential first-time Republican presidential candidates: Run. And to those eyeing a primary run against Clinton: In the Democratic Party, patience can sometimes be a virtue.

Huffington Post opinion: Peter Rosenstein: "The Inevitability of Hillary"

By Peter Rosenstein

September 10, 2014, 12:40 p.m. EDT

One can only imagine the sound, something like air being let out of a helium balloon, should Hillary Rodham Clinton announce in the beginning of 2015 that she isn't running for President. Most can't for a moment fathom that scenario playing out.

One who can't is the new host of Meet the Press, Chuck Todd, who said on his inaugural show, "She's running". Maybe he's connected to her by a soup can like in the Progresso commercial. The only luminary on the Meet the Press panel who thought she wouldn't run was Joe Scarborough and he often likes to be obstinate.

The press has had a love-hate relationship with Hillary since she first appeared on the scene giving the graduation speech at Wellesley in 1969. But love her or hate her, they can't get enough of her. Whether on TV or in print they know that talking about her will get them airtime or a front page story. Since she was a young woman what Hillary says gets attention.

There is an overwhelming feeling one gets from people in all walks of life and all political stripes that her time has arrived. She will finally overcome the haters and doubters because enough people recognize she is the real thing. Her in-depth understanding of both the United States and the world will leave no one questioning that she is the right person, as a TV ad once claimed, "to answer that 3am phone call".

Hillary wrote a sobering piece on the state of the world in her Washington Post review of Henry Kissinger's new book, World Order. While complimenting Kissinger she made clear it was on his understanding of the world as it is today, very different from when he was Secretary of State. She wrote, "It's no wonder so many Americans express uncertainty and even fear about our role and our future in the world. In his new book, "World Order," Henry Kissinger explains the historic scope of this challenge". She continued, "His analysis, despite some differences over specific policies, largely fits with the broad strategy behind the Obama administration's effort over the past six years to build a global architecture of security and cooperation for the 21st century." Hillary presents herself as one who won't back away from the challenges the United States faces and understands that as the only remaining superpower in the world we can't allow the new isolationists in our country to keep the United States from acting to protect our homeland and make the world a safer place. She clearly defines what she means by acting when she describes her view of 'Smart Power". She makes clear it is not always rushing in with troops but using all the levers a President has at her disposal with military action being the last resort. But one understands she wouldn't shy away from using military force when necessary.

A few days before the review appeared in the Washington Post Hillary keynoted Senator Harry Reid's (D-NV) energy conference in Las Vegas. One can often judge the correctness of her ideas by those who attack them. Senator Rand Paul (R-KY) chastised her for correctly saying, "Climate Change is the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face as a nation and world and the data is unforgiving no matter what the deniers try to assert." Paul, who shows a lack of understanding of global and world issues, attacked her for this on Fox news saying, "I don't think we really want a Commander in Chief that's battling climate change instead of terrorism." Paul, one of the leading lights of today's Republican Party doesn't understand what the role of President is which may be because he can't actually see himself in the role. One in which as the saying goes, 'you must be able to walk and chew gum at the same time'.

All we need do is read the headlines of the past few weeks from ISIS, to Israel, to Syria, to the drought in California, to Ferguson, MO, to the Ebola epidemic; to understand that our next President will have to focus on a myriad of issues at the same time, all of them usually presenting as a crisis. We need someone who not only understands that but is up to the challenge. Hillary Clinton has demonstrated she is ready on both counts.

Over the next few months Hillary will do what she has said all along she needs to do before announcing and that is bring into focus her vision for the future which she will do in a series of speeches and appearances across the nation.

She will stand side-by-side with Democratic candidates who are running in 2014 and will shine a light on them. The pundits must be careful not to judge the result of the vote for a candidate she stands with purely based on her having been there. Hillary will help to draw attention to them but we know in the end people vote for the person they trust and trust has always been difficult to transfer. Bill Clinton managed to make a difference for President Obama in 2012 with his brilliant Convention speech but in the end it was Barack Obama who had to make the case for himself.

The Republican Party already understands when Hillary is the candidate in 2016 she will make that winning case for herself. She will share her vision for a better future for America and show that she has the wealth of knowledge and experience to make it a reality. There isn't anyone in the Republican Party that has even been hinted at as a potential nominee that can match her in the scope of her experience or brain power.

As we move toward early 2015 it appears that a Hillary Rodham Clinton candidacy for President is becoming inevitable.

Talking Points Memo: "No Fan Of Hillary, Bill Maher Says He Could Vote GOP In 2016"

By Tom Kludt

September 10, 2014 9:51 a.m. EDT

Bill Maher made a hefty donation to bolster President Obama's re-election bid in 2012, but the liberal comedian says he's open to going the other way the next time around. And there's one Republican in particular who intrigues him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Rand Paul is an interesting candidate to me. Rand Paul could possibly get my vote,” Maher told The Hill.

Maher has never hidden his affinity for the Paul clan. He told The Hill that he admired the Kentucky senator's father, former Rep. Ron Paul (R-TX), for having "the guts to say we should end the American empire, pull the troops home, stop getting involved in every foreign entanglement."

Earlier this month, Maher told Syracuse.com that he has admiration for Rand Paul for occasionally going "against his own tribe."

Maher donated $1 million to a pro-Obama super PAC in 2012, but he told The Hill that he won't do the same for Hillary Clinton in 2016.

"First of all, I’m not as big a fan of Hillary as I am of Obama," he said. "So we’ll see who’s running. I’m not even committing to being for Hillary.”

Because of his lukewarm feelings toward Clinton, a huge favorite to claim the Democratic nomination in 2016, the HBO host said he's open to "considering the Republican product."

Indyk: Settlement Freeze Makes Abbas Peace Partner Tomorrow

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas could be a partner for peace "tomorrow" if Israel were to impose a freeze on settlement construction, former U.S. special envoy Martin Indyk said Thursday. Speaking at Ha'aretz newspaper's peace conference in Tel Aviv, the former envoy also conceded that the previous round of negotiations in 2014, in which he played a role, were a "magnificent failure." Abbas "could become a partner tomorrow for the deal you'd like to make if there was a settlement freeze…Why not freeze the settlements? Does it affect your security?"

Saudi Prince: Peace Unsustainable without Two-State Solution

Saudi Prince Turki al-Faisal called on Thursday for the revival of the 2002 Arab Peace Initiative in which Israel would withdraw to the pre-1967 lines and there would be an "agreed upon" solution for Palestinian refugees. He was speaking in an unusual 10 minute pre-recorded interview that aired at the Israel Peace Conference sponsored by Ha'aretz. The "relative peace that Israel is now enjoying" cannot last unless the conflict is resolved through a two-state solution, the prince said.

US: EU's Labeling of West Bank Products Not a Boycott

The Obama administration said Thursday it doesn't consider a new European Union rule outlawing "Made in Israel" tags on West Bank goods as a boycott of the Jewish state, only a technical guideline for consumers. The long-awaited EU rule has triggered a fierce backlash from the Israeli government. The US clarified its position a day after the decision by the EU, which applies to goods produced in Israeli settlements on the West Bank. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu blasted the 28-nation bloc as "hypocritical" and accused the EU of double standards. One of his Cabinet members called the rule "disguised anti-Semitism." Even Israeli opposition figures chimed in with criticism.

IDF Begins Reserve Call Up for West Bank Deployment in 2016

The army is preparing for the possibility of deploying as many as 70 reserve battalions on unplanned operational activity in the West Bank next year, at a cost of some 300 million shekels ($77 million). The first call-up orders for operational duty in the West Bank in January were received this week by four reserve battalions. But the 2016 plans drawn up by the Israel Defense Forces call for many other such battalions. The General Staff doesn't know how long the current clashes with the Palestinians will last. But its working assumption is that many months will pass before the violence ebbs. If so, it will need many reservists, in part to replace regular troops so they can train as scheduled.

With Woman-in-Labor Disguise, Police Raid Hospital in Hebron

A veiled "pregnant woman" in a wheelchair and a group of what looked like Palestinian men made their way down a corridor in the al-Ahli Hospital in Hebron early on Thursday, blending into their surroundings, until the men suddenly pulled out assault rifles and handguns, and began moving quickly, in search of their target. Dramatic CCTV footage released by the hospital revealed how the Border Police's elite counterterrorism unit snuck into the hospital to arrest Azzam Shalalda, 20, on suspicion of stabbing and seriously injuring an Israeli civilian on October 25.

How a Year of War and Terror Changed Arab Israelis' Views

In April 2014, nearly 60% of Israel's 1.7 million Arab citizens said they felt "part of the state and its problems." The 11 months that followed saw the nationalistically motivated murders of four teenagers—three Jewish and one Arab—a two-month war in the Gaza Strip, a wave of terror in Jerusalem and a tense election campaign. By March 2015, the month of the election, only 28 percent of Arab-Israelis felt part of the country and its problems. That's the starkest of several indications of Arab-Israeli alienation from the state in the latest Israel Democracy Index, a comprehensive annual survey of Israeli attitudes conducted by the Israel Democracy Institute think tank.

High Court Approves Terror Home Demolitions

The High Court for Justice approved Thursday the demolition of the homes of six terrorists. It rejected a motion filed against the demolitions by a leftist "civil rights" group against the demolition orders issued by IDF Central Command Head, Major General Roni Numa. The homes of the murderers of the Eitam and Naama Henkin, Danny Gonen and Malachi Rosenfeld will be razed. The court rejected the demolition of one of the homes scheduled to be razed, since it is inside a multi-story residential building. Supreme Court Judge Uzi Fogelman issued temporary orders last month to prevent the demolition orders issued against the homes of seven Arab terrorists' families, after the families petitioned the IDF demolition orders.

Israel to Build Underground Barrier Around Gaza Strip

Israel plans to build an underground barrier around the besieged Gaza Strip, officials announced on Wednesday. Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon said that the Israeli army would start the project soon. The barrier will "prevent terrorists from using deep tunnels to try and penetrate the wall," Israeli Army Radio reported. Last month, the Israeli Ministry of Defense announced that it had completed construction of a "smart" security fence around 12 Israeli communities located near the border with Gaza.

Stick a Label On It

Europe steps up pressure on Israel over its settlements.

By The Economist Staff

The prize-winning Psagot Winery in a West Bank settlement north of Jerusalem has become a favorite destination in recent years for right-wing Israeli and American politicians, eager not just to quaff Cabernet but also to score political points by highlighting the return of the Jews to their biblical homeland. Sixty-five per cent of the 250,000 bottles produced here each year are exported. Under new European Union rules adopted this week those bottles sold in Europe will no longer be labeled "Produce of Israel" but "Produce of the West Bank (Israeli settlement)".

Yaakov Berg, the winery owner, is not concerned for his own business. "People who buy our wines know where we are and want to buy them," he says. "This will probably only make them more popular." He is already planning a line of Christmas gift-boxes with additional settlement products, which he believes will be a hit in evangelical communities in America. Some of his fellow producers may see sales fall as European retailers refuse to stock their products.

Labeling produce from the Israeli settlements in the West Bank, the Golan Heights and East Jerusalem has been a subject of diplomatic disagreement between the EU and Israel for more than seven years. The Europeans, like the rest of the world, do not recognize Israel's sovereignty in the lands captured in the six-day war in 1967 and regard Israeli settlements there as illegal. Although Israel enjoys preferential access to Europe's market and gets grants for research programs inside the "green line", it has refused to abide by the EU's previous labeling regulations. These new guidelines put the onus on EU members to ensure that imports from the settlements declare the correct provenance.

Israel's response has been to accuse Europe of discrimination. Israel's prime minister, Binyamin Netanyahu, questioned why such guidelines do not exist for other cases where there are contested borders, such as Northern Cyprus, accusing the EU of a "double standard" and said the move "brings back dark memories", alluding to the Holocaust.

The new measure represents a diplomatic blow for Israel as well as a victory for the BDS (Boycott, Divestment, Sanctions) movement, which calls for a boycott of all Israeli produce. However, as European diplomats were at pains to point out, the new guideline is not intended to constitute a boycott of Israel in any sense. It is, they said, to ensure consumers are not misinformed.

Whatever the moral justification of this step, it is unlikely to amount to more than an exercise in gesture politics. Israel's Economics Ministry reckons that it could cause no more than $50m-worth of damage to Israeli producers a year, out of some $300m exported from the settlements (and some $18.9 billion that Israel exports to Europe). It will not help to restart the moribund peace process between Israel and the Palestinians, and may only entrench an Israeli government that believes that it is unfairly singled out by a hostile and, in its view, anti-Semitic international community.

Why Israelis Weren't Interested in Netanyahu-Obama Meeting

By Mazal Mualem

"Starting Over" — that was the headline that Israeli daily Yedioth Ahronoth gave to the meeting between US President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at the White House on Nov. 9. It was accompanied by a photo of a formal handshake between the two men. Daily Ma'ariv chose "Reconciliation Meeting" as its headline and featured a picture of the two leaders smiling. The other media, both print and digital, also described the summit meeting in terms that seemed overly positive . Channels 2 and 10 reported that the meeting had been conciliatory. Also, all media outlets stressed that the meeting went 45 minutes over its allotted time, indicating that the mood in the Oval Office was good.

In the end, however, the meeting between the two men — after over a year in which they did not see each other, and with their tense and fragile relationship hovering in the background — did not create any real headlines, or any interest at all for that matter. The only interesting thing was that it took place, which is in itself important.

Their past meetings took place as part of Netanyahu's efforts to stop the Iran nuclear deal, and even involved him intervening in US politics. This created enormous interest and huge headlines about the crisis surrounding his relationship with Obama. This time, however, the visit was anti-climactic. The agreement with Iran is now a fait accompli and seen as something of a failure for Netanyahu and a victory for Obama. Given all of that, the Israeli prime minister was the last person in the world who wanted to bring up the issue, which he focused on so intently for two terms and which caused an unprecedented fissure in Israel-US relations.

Over the years, the Israeli media and public have gotten used to Netanyahu stoking the drama and making intimidating speeches about the Iranian nuclear program during all of his previous meetings with the president. These resulted in dramatic headlines and ongoing coverage of very tense and volatile meetings. This time, the press had to make do with a relaxed meeting without any surprises or any blaring headlines. Obama announced to the cameras that he was committed to Israel's security , and Netanyahu kept reiterating his respect and appreciation for the American president. Nothing was out of the ordinary, apart from the fact that everything was said after a lengthy hiatus during which the two men did not meet.

When Netanyahu announced to the cameras that he is committed to a vision of peace with the Palestinians in the spirit of the two-state solution, his very words evaporated almost as soon as he said them, despite their professed significance. The reason for this is clear. It has been almost 6½ years since he delivered his "Bar Ilan speech " in June 2009, in which he expressed for the first time his commitment to the two-state vision, raising the hope for a diplomatic solution . Now, the Israeli public, including politicians on the right, see these statements as nothing more than lip service, intended to appease Obama.

Even reports about the US compensation package to Israel following the nuclear agreement did not evoke much interest. Nor did Netanyahu's declaring his commitment to take steps to reduce Palestinian terror by easing economic restrictions.

Unlike the meeting between Obama and Netanyahu that, as we have noted, provided only limited headlines, the European Union's dramatic decision to label Israeli products manufactured in the settlements became the main story on the diplomatic front. The decision was made on Nov. 11, during Netanyahu's visit to Washington. With this development in the background, it was, according to media reports, quite obvious that Netanyahu was back in his element, when he launched a focused attack on the EU's hypocrisy. This development immediately became the focus, effectively removing the Obama-Netanyahu meeting from the agenda.

The truth is that interest in Netanyahu's meeting with Obama subsided as soon as the meeting was over. It was barely mentioned in the main newscasts in Israel the following day, and it could hardly be found in the newspapers either. The best indication that the meeting between Netanyahu and Obama was not considered too important or interesting is the fact that politicians, especially Netanyahu's rivals, did not bother to respond to it. For the most part, Netanyahu's previous meetings with Obama were regularly accompanied by critical attacks from the opposition, claiming that Netanyahu is destroying the US-Israel relationship. But this time, however, the mood at the meeting was conciliatory. Neither Yesh Atid leader Yair Lapid nor Zionist Camp leader Isaac Herzog had very much to say. In that sense, Netanyahu was the winner again. It was impossible to claim that he destroyed the relationship with the United States.

It is reasonable to assume that this lack of interest in the Obama-Netanyahu meeting among the political classes also contributed to the limited volume and scope of its coverage.

A glimpse at the Israeli social networks shows that interest in the visit and meeting was even more limited there than it was in the established media, and was restricted to journalists who covered the event. Online accounts of flash flooding in the city of Ashkelon because of the torrential rains, the passing of Israel's fifth president, Yitzhak Navon , Nov. 7 and the wave of terrorist knifings by Palestinian youth were of greater interest to Israelis than the meeting between Obama and Netanyahu.

In the end, with no innovations, surprises or drama, along the lines of Obama planning to launch a new peace initiative , the overall impression is that the media regarded the visit as the end of an era and nothing more. Maybe that was because Obama is at the end of his second term, and this week's meeting was, apparently, the last time that these two men will meet.

They're off the hook.

Republican 'birther' rappers perform at 9/12 rally.

Self-professed "Republican rapper" Hi-Caliber made an appearance at the anti-Obama 9/12 march on Saturday. Demonstrating his imperfect understanding of Russian history, Hi-Caliber railed against the "communist czars" he perceived to be operating in President Obama's administration. Not only that, the crowd cheered at a line questioning Obama's birth certificate:

> We need tanks and hummers, not hybrid cars!
> We need honest politicians, not communist czars!
> USA, not the USSR.
> We need more Ann Coulter and less Bill Maher.
> […]
> I don't need another lecture from the Socialistic hypocrite.
> Tuesday was your birthday, but where's your birth certificate?

Watch it:

Hi-Caliber has said his conservative views were formed by right-wing talker Michael Savage . "Here was this guy Michael Savage screaming and ranting and raving about illegal immigration Islamofascism and you know it all started to click and make sense," explained Hi-Caliber to the Daily Beast's Max Blumenthal earlier this year.

MEMORANDUM

TO: House Republicans

FR: Republican Leader John Boehner
Republican Whip Roy Blunt
Conference Chairman Adam Putnam
Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor

DA: July 22, 2008

RE: House Republicans demand a vote on American-made energy now

American families continue to be crushed by high gas prices, and they are looking for leadership from Washington. House Republicans have stepped forward with meaningful solutions that will increase the supply of American-made energy, lower gas prices and promote energy independence. For their part, all Democratic leaders have offered is the same empty rhetoric and failed policies that have resulted in $4 gas.

Over the last two months, House Republicans have proposed solution after legislative solution to America¹s energy crisis, including expanded deep water and Arctic coastal plain exploration, and increased investment in next-generation alternative and renewable energies. It is truly an ³all-of-the-above² energy strategy. House Republicans have aggressively carried this national dialogue forward and offered meaningful solutions that will lower gas prices. The American people are listening, and the plan is attracting bipartisan support in Congress.

Democrats in charge of Congress, however, are charting a very different course. While gas prices soar and Americans cry out for action, this Democratic Congress has refused to take meaningful action to help lower gas prices and promote energy independence, and it¹s on track to become the least productive Congress in 25 years. The American people are demanding action, and time is running short.

This week, House Republicans will introduce our ³all-of-the-above² energy plan in a single piece of legislation that increases the supply of American-made energy, improves conservation and efficiency, and promotes new and expanding technologies.

To increase the supply American-made energy in environmentally sound ways, the legislation will:

* Open our deep water ocean resources, which will provide an additional 3 million barrels of oil per day;
* Open the Arctic coastal plain, which will provide an additional 1 million barrels of oil per day; and
* Allow development of our nation¹s shale oil resources, which could provide an additional 2.5 million barrels of oil per day

To improve energy conservation and efficiency, the legislation will:

* Provide tax incentives for businesses and families that purchase more fuel efficient vehicles;

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* Provide a monetary prize for being the first to develop an economically feasible, super-fuel-efficient vehicle (reaching 100 miles-per-gallon); and
* Provide tax incentives for businesses and homeowners who improve their energy efficiency.

To promote new and expanding energy technologies, the legislation will:

* Spur the development of alternative fuels, including through government contracting, the repeal of the "Section 526" prohibition on government purchasing of alternative energy and promoting coal-to-liquids technology.
* Establishes a renewable energy trust fund using revenues generated by exploration in the deep ocean and in the Arctic coastal plain.
* Permanently extends the tax credit for alternative energy production, including wind, solar and hydrogen; and
* Eliminate barriers to the expansion of carbon-free nuclear power production.

This legislation will demonstrate to the world that America will no longer keep its rich energy resources under lock-and-key. It will be a landmark step toward energy independence, and it will make needed investments in the alternative fuels that will power our lives and our economy in the future.

Numerous independent polls show the American people strongly support this approach to our energy crisis. It would clearly garner the support of a bipartisan majority of Democrats and Republicans in Congress, and it is legislation that the President would sign into law. Yet House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-CA) continues to stand in the way of lower gas prices for struggling families and small businesses. When asked last week whether she would schedule a vote on meaningful legislation to increase American energy production, the Speaker told CNN, ³I have no plans to do so.²

The Democratic leadership in Congress is defying the will of the American people and a bipartisan majority in Congress. American families are suffering. Time is running short, and further inaction can no longer be tolerated.

House Republicans will stand together beginning today and demand that the Democratic leadership hold a vote on this legislation to increase American-made energy before Congress adjourns for the month of August. On Wednesday, all House Republicans assemble on the West Front Steps at approximately 1pm to unveil our legislation and publicly demand the up-or-down vote the American people deserve. You will be contacted shortly to become an original co-sponsor of this vital legislation.

We will use every option at our disposal to force a vote on the ³all of the above² energy plan. America¹s energy future should not be held hostage to the whims of radical special-interest groups that support higher gas prices.
If Speaker Pelosi and her liberal colleagues in the Democratic leadership continue to defy the will of the American people, they do so at their own peril.

US Judge Thomas Griesa; Street scene from the Argentinian economic collapse of 2001.

OccupyTLV, September 7 - Joseph Zernik, PhD, filed with the government of Argentina his opinion regarding the litigation of NML Capital v The Republic of Argentina (1:08-cv-06978) in the US District court, Southern District of New York. [1]

The judgment in the case is likely to cause the collapse of the Argentinian economy for the scond time in 15 years and cause poverty and misery for millions in Argentina.

Regarding the collapse of the Argentinian economy in 2001, Nobel prize winner Joseph Stieglitz raised the suspicion in his book "Globalization and Its Discontent" that the collapse was the handiwork of Stanley Fischer in his capacity as a senior officer of the International Monetary Fund (later Governor of Bank of Israel, today No 2 in the US Federal Reserve), at the service of US agencies.

The opinion, filed today, in part says:
Joseph Zernik, PhD, herein opines that fraud is being committed on the people and the Republic of Argentina by the US government and its agencies, the US District Court, Southern District of New York, the US Court of Appeals, 2nd Circuit, and the US Supreme Court in the litigation of NML Capital v The Republic of Argentina (1:08-cv-06978) in the US District Court, Southern District of New York. US Judge Thomas Griesa, Clerk of the Court Ruby Krajick, and all attorneys, who filed papers in the case, including the law-firm, which filed on behalf of the Republic of Argentina, Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton, LLP, should be deemed part of the conspiracy to defraud.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Attached to the opinion is a paper, which provides detailed analysis of the litigation records in the case, and which shows missing Summons, invalid Notice of Assignment for US Judge Thomas Griesa, and denial of public access to the authentication records.

The opinion is also based on other cases of fraud in the same court, which is notorious for fraud in banking matters. The most notable among these cases is SEC v Bank of America Corporation (1:09-cv-06829), where Judge Jed Rakoff appeared as presiding Judge. The PACER docket in SEC v Bank of America Corporation included no copy of the summons in disregard of US law, as is the case in NML Capital v The Republic of Argentina. The summons in SEC v Bank of America Corporation was eventually discovered through a Freedom of Information request on SEC. As seen here, the summons is unsigned, and fails to bear the seal of the court, i.e., invalid summons. SEC v Bank of America Corporation was a landmark court case, relative to banking supervision under the current financial crisis. It originated in the unlawful taking of $5.8 billions by banking executives. US Judge Jed Rakoff colluded with Clerk of the Court Ruby Krajick and attorneys for SEC and Bank of America Corporation and conducted Simulated Litigation in the US District Court, Southern District of New York, which ended with no executive being held accountable and none of the ill-gotten funds returned by the offending executives.

The paper concludes that conduct of the US courts over the past decade should be deemed organized state-corporate crime and an unannounced regime change in the United States. It is also central to abuse of the people of the United States and failing banking regulation. In the case of NML v Republic of Argentina the US courts reach beyond the territorial US, to rob the people of Argentina through fraud of medieval style and proportions.

Copies of the opinion were filed with the governments of the German Federal Republic, the People's Republic of China, the Russian Federation, and the United States.

The paper, detailing the evidence for the fraud in the US District Court, Southern District of New York, was separately published today by OpEdNews.com. [2]

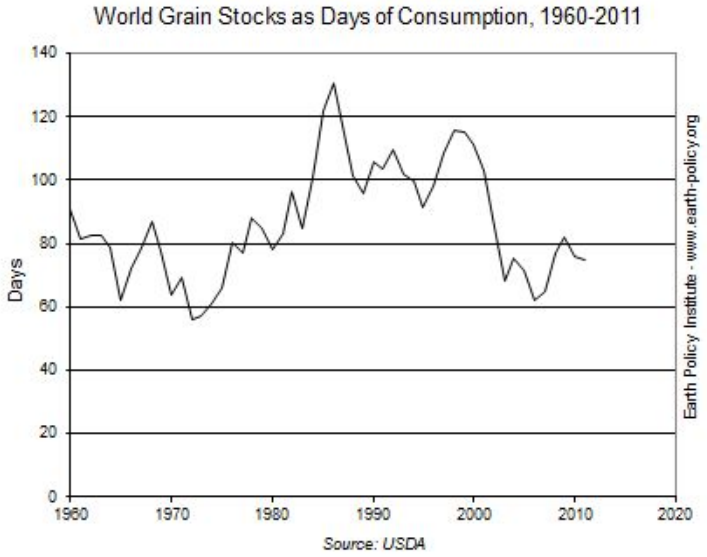
Bumper 2011 Grain Harvest Fails to Rebuild Global Stocks

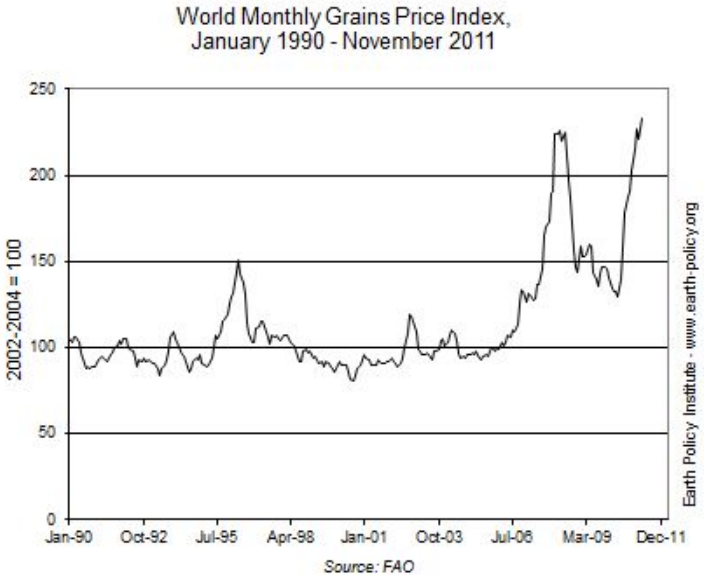
Janet Larsen

www.earth-policy.org/indicators/C54/grain_2012

The world's farmers produced more grain in 2011 than ever before. Estimates from the U.S. Department of Agriculture show the global grain harvest coming in at 2,295 million tons, up 53 million tons from the previous record in 2009. Consumption grew by 90 million tons over the same period to 2,280 million tons. Yet with global grain production actually falling short of consumption in 7 of the past 12 years, stocks remain worryingly low, leaving the world vulnerable to food price shocks.



Nearly half the calories consumed around the world come directly from grain, with grain-fed animal products making up part of the remainder. Three grains dominate the world harvest: wheat and rice, which are primarily eaten directly as food, and corn, which is largely used as a feedgrain for livestock. Wheat was the largest of the world's grain harvests until the mid-1990s. Then corn production surged ahead in response to growing demand for grain-fed animal products and, more recently, for fuel ethanol. Despite a drop in the important U.S. harvest due mostly to high summer temperatures, global corn production hit 868 million tons in 2011, an all-time high. The harvests of wheat (689 million tons) and rice (461 million tons) were also records. (See data at www.earth-policy.org .)



Carryover grain stocks—the amount left in the world's grain elevators when the new harvest begins—now stand at 469 million tons, enough to cover 75 days of consumption at current levels. Between 1984 and 2001 grain stocks hovered around the more comfortable level of 100 days. In 2002, however, grain production fell 88 million tons short of demand, and since then annual carryover stocks have averaged 72 days of use, close to the bare minimum for basic food security. In 2006, stocks bottomed out at 62 days, setting the stage for the 2007–08 food price spike when international grain prices doubled or tripled in a short amount of time. For poor families in developing countries who spend half or more of their incomes on food, often grain staples, this led to empty plates and frustration. Protests erupted in some 35 countries as the number of hungry people in the world climbed above 1 billion.

Following several strong harvests, global stocks were again pushed downward in 2010 when drought, wildfires, and a scorching heat wave decimated wheat crops in Russia and neighboring countries. Exports were banned. Food prices again started to rise, prompting warnings of a second food price crisis in three years. Ultimately the higher food prices between June 2010 and December 2010 pushed an additional 44 million people down the economic ladder into extreme poverty, according to the World Bank. The prospects for the world's poorest remain grim, as even the record production in 2011 failed to outpace consumption enough to rebuild stocks sufficiently.

The tight stocks and food price volatility are occurring against a backdrop of a shrinking area available to feed each person and of slowing crop yield growth. Worldwide, grain is grown on close to 700 million hectares (1.7 billion acres). With the global population hitting the 7 billion milestone in 2011, this leaves 0.1 hectare (a quarter of an acre) planted in grain per person, half as much as in the early 1960s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While the total grain area is down from the peak of 732 million hectares in 1981, largely from the retiring of marginal and eroded land, production is more than 50 percent higher thanks to improved yields. In 1950, farmers could expect to harvest on average 1 ton of grain per hectare. Now yields are three times as high. The problem for world food prospects is that the proverbial “low-hanging fruit” have been picked, with much of the world (notably excepting sub-Saharan Africa) having already adopted higher yielding crop varieties and yield-boosting fertilizer and irrigation practices. Furthermore, yields may be leveling off or even shrinking in some countries. Global grain yields increased by an average 2.2 percent each year from 1970 to 1990. But between 1990 and 2010, the annual gains were just half as large.

Three countries produced nearly half the world’s grain in 2011: China at 456 million tons, the United States at 384 million tons, and India at 226 million tons. Together the 27 European Union countries harvested 286 million tons of grain.

A growing number of countries are relying on imported grain to meet their needs, pushing the share of the world grain harvest entering international trade to 12 percent. The United States is far and away the world’s top grain exporter, sending 73 million tons abroad in 2011. This is a quarter of all grain trade. It is followed by Argentina exporting 32 million tons of grain; Australia and the Ukraine, each at 24 million tons; and Russia and Canada, each topping 20 million tons. For corn in particular, the United States dominates the world market, with U.S. corn accounting for over 40 percent of all international corn movement. For this reason, importing countries are concerned about the growing share of the U.S. crop—40 percent in 2011—being turned into fuel ethanol.

Japan continues to be the world’s largest grain importer, buying more than 25 million tons of grain from abroad in 2011, much of it to be used as animal feed. Egypt, Mexico, South Korea and Saudi Arabia round out the list of countries importing more than 10 million tons of grain. International grain market dependence is high across the arid Middle East; for instance, Saudi Arabia now relies on imports for 90 percent of its grain consumption. As the country has nearly pumped dry its underground water stores, it is abandoning its desert wheat farms.

China imported a net 5 million tons of grain in 2011, the most significant inflow since the country declared a national grain self-sufficiency policy in the mid-1990s. Though still a tiny fraction of the country’s 451-million-ton consumption, the potential for China to import increasing amounts of grain is a concern to those who watch grain markets and prices. China’s grain imports would be far higher had it not ratcheted up imports of another key field crop, the soybean. Climbing from almost nothing through the mid-1990s, China’s soybean imports hit 56 million tons in 2011, close to 80 percent of the country’s total soybean consumption and nearly 60 percent of all the soy traded internationally. Most of the high-protein soy is used in livestock and poultry feed.

As more people in China are moving up the food chain and eating more meat, milk, and eggs, the country’s feedgrain use has risen dramatically, surpassing that of the United States (where use is falling) for the first time in 2010. China now leads the world in the amount of grain fed to animals, standing at 149 million tons in 2011. Still, as the average meat intake in China is less than half that of the United States, the total grain consumption per person is far lower.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With little arable land around the world left unfarmed and with ever more mouths to feed, farmers face an uphill climb in their efforts to feed the world's people. The animal protein and food-based biofuel production systems are two areas where fields could be re-appropriated to grow food directly for people instead of for livestock or cars. But as water shortages spread and rising global temperatures bring more unpredictable weather—replete with heat waves, droughts, floods, and other crop-damaging extreme events—a higher level of grain reserves is needed to help cushion against harvest failures. Otherwise, preventing major food price shocks will require bumper harvests year after year, something that is far from guaranteed.

COLUMN-Michelle Patron: What a climate deal means for oil markets

(Michelle Patron writer is a former energy and climate advisor to President Barack Obama. The opinions expressed here are those of the author.)

By Michelle Patron

Dec 1 (Reuters) - Over the next two weeks countries from around the world are convening in Paris to develop a global plan to address climate change. A successful deal in Paris could have significant impacts for energy and equity markets.

In many ways, the heavy lifting for Paris has already occurred. Learning from failed past attempts to impose global rules, governments have developed a more flexible bottom up approach. Under the new system, each country puts forward its own nationally determined plan based on what it believes it can achieve over the next 10-15 years. More than 150 countries -- developed and developing, energy exporters and importers -- have already submitted these plans, covering over 90 percent of global emissions.

Plans include policy proposals in the electricity, transportation, industrial and forestry sectors. Some of these plans are quite ambitious. China and Mexico have set timelines to permanently halt the growth of their emissions. India and Brazil have plans to drastically expand the use of non-fossil fuels. While the first round of plans may not deliver enough action to limit global warming to two degrees centigrade, it signals a fundamental shift in how countries produce and consume energy. Scientists have set two degrees as a benchmark for "safe" levels of warming.

A successful deal in Paris would tie these plans together and create a process for countries to report and update their targets at regular intervals. This would enable the public to track the status of each country's progress and prompt governments to tighten existing and future targets. This process would boost confidence in implementation despite the absence of penalties for underperformance. Of course, the risk remains that domestic politics in the United States or other key emitters can impede progress down the road.

Agreement is by no means assured and could be derailed by disagreements over financing, namely demands by some developing countries for richer countries to underwrite climate mitigation and adaptation efforts. Progress has already been made with the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development calculating current climate capital flows from rich to poor countries at $62 billion per year, almost two-thirds of the $100 billion goal by 2020 set in Copenhagen.

The most immediate market impact is in the power sector where a strong agreement will extend and accelerate the shift from coal to alternative power sources including renewables, nuclear and in some cases natural gas. The International Energy Agency estimates that renewable energy will become the largest single power source by 2040 and the share of coal will decline from 41 to 31 percent. This trend is already underway. Last year, more new power plants were built that produce electricity from renewable sources than from all fossil fuel sources combined. As a result, green technology stocks will likely get a boost from Paris.

The impact on oil markets is more nuanced and depends on the pace at which governments ratchet up policies to constrain oil demand and limit the environmental impacts of production Oil prices are unlikely to move significantly on news from Paris since there is no instantaneous lever to reduce demand and current oversupply is drowning out other market signals.

Nevertheless, there are long-term effects with policies in place and more on the way that directly target the transportation sector, which consumes half the world's oil. Continued improvements in vehicle efficiency and removal of fossil fuel subsidies can moderately reduce demand with the impact growing over time as the vehicle fleet changes. Success in Paris can also inject momentum into global negotiations underway on aviation and marine fuel controls.

Perhaps the most critical variable for oil is how a deal impacts alternative fuels in road transportation. A strong political signal from Paris can boost public and private investment in transportation. A breakthrough on electric vehicle batteries or hydrogen can dramatically disrupt future demand. Consensus forecasts calling for $100 oil after 2020 do not factor in such a breakthrough. That may prove shortsighted. Weaker oil demand as a result of vehicle innovation has the potential to cap long-term oil prices well below these forecasts.

There are also supply side impacts. Regulations that tighten controls on methane, a gas produced alongside oil and flared into the environment, may increase production costs. Meanwhile, growing pressure by environmentalists for companies to strand or abandon risky environmental investments, such as oil sands, deep water and Arctic drilling, can limit supply options and force companies back to onshore assets in politically unstable countries. The recent success of these "stranded asset" campaigns in blocking the Keystone pipeline and contributing to the withdrawal of Shell and Statoil from the Alaskan Arctic has emboldened environmental groups. The portfolios of major international oil companies are the most exposed to stranded asset risk whereby public and legal pressure prevents completion of these projects after significant capital investment has been sunk. Meanwhile, smaller independent companies with tighter budgets are more vulnerable to methane regulations. Both segments would be hurt by lower oil prices.

The bottom line is that global climate action widens the range of risks in the energy sector. Ten years ago, German utilities were seen as stable investments, now they are struggling under the weight of policies pushing renewables and reductions in technology costs. Prudent companies and investors should begin factoring these risks into their oil portfolios now. (Michelle Patron)

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Yesterday Hillary for America announced that the location of her official campaign launch speech will be in New York City on Roosevelt Island. On June 13, she is expected to lay out her vision for the future of the country and explain to voters why she is the right person to lead it there. The speech will be followed by an organizing meeting in Iowa with volunteers that will be simulcast with volunteers in every Congressional district. And, the meeting will be followed by HRC travel through the early primary states.

Hillary Clinton said Monday that past advances made by the LGBT community should be recognized during Pride celebrations this month, but noted that more work remains. In a statement to the Washington Blade, she recognized June as Pride month, calling for a rededication to complete the work of improving the lives of people everywhere. Tuesday the Hillary for America merchandise store will launch the new limited edition Hillary for America Pride shop.

There is a new national CNN poll Tuesday morning which shows an increase in HRC's unfavorable rating but the polling just puts in it line with other previously released national polls.

On Monday, South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham announce his candidacy for President. He is the ninth GOP candidate to announce.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

ABC and CBS both reported on Lindsey Graham entering the presidential race, noting that he said he has more national security and foreign policy experience than any other contender in the race, including HRC. NBC had a brief report on NSA telephone surveillance, noting that Rand Paul is insisting that the government should be required to have a warrant when monitoring private phones.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary sets venue for first big rally: Roosevelt Island // Politico // Annie Karni – June 1, 2015

The solemn memorial park at the southern tip of Roosevelt Island, Four Freedoms Park, will serve as the backdrop for Hillary Clinton's first significant speech as a presidential candidate on June 13, when she is expected to lay out her vision for the future of the country and explain to voters why she is the right person to lead it there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The park, designed by architect Louis Kahn and dedicated in 2012, honors the "four freedoms" Franklin D. Roosevelt outlined in his 1941 State of the Union address — freedom of speech, religion, freedom from want and freedom from fear. The symbolic backdrop won out over other potential sites for Clinton's "vision" speech that were floated to the campaign by supporters, such as Seneca Falls, N.Y., the site of the first women's rights convention in 1848.

In announcing the venue for the much-anticipated speech, the campaign emphasized Clinton's long admiration of both Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. Clinton is expected to be joined at the kick-off speech by her family, Chelsea and Bill Clinton. It won't mark their first time there: Bill Clinton was one of the speakers at the 2012 dedication ceremony of the park.

Clinton's New York speech will be open to the public and tickets will be free, according to the campaign website. But that message came with a big disclaimer: tickets do not guarantee admission and the rally will fill up on a first-come, first-served basis. A spokesman said it was not clear yet how many supporters the venue would accommodate.

The big rally will mark a break from the intimate roundtables Clinton has participated in during the first two months of her campaign. The speech comes almost two months to the day after Clinton formally announced her presidential bid, and will be followed up by her busiest week on the trail yet: Clinton will fly directly to Iowa Saturday night, marking her third visit there since announcing, followed by stops in New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada — all early states she has already visited at least once during the ramp up phase of her campaign.

The Iowa organizing meeting that Clinton will participate in on Saturday evening will be simulcast at organizing meetings planned for nearly all of the country's 435 congressional districts, campaign officials said.

Clinton's campaign is already lowering expectations as they explain how the former secretary of state will fight for every vote and not take the primary for granted — even while her challengers so far remain side players in the 2016 drama. In Iowa, the campaign pointed out, no Democratic presidential candidate has ever received more than 50 percent of the caucus vote, unless they were a sitting president, vice-president, or Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin, who ran in 1992. In New Hampshire, the campaign underscored, no Democrat in a contested primary in the last 25 years has won by more than 27,000 votes, or received more than 50 percent of the vote.

But the campaign is building up the rally as a dramatic beginning of a new phase of the campaign. "Thousands of Americans coming together to hear Hillary lay out her vision for the future of our country," is how campaign chairman John Podesta described it in an email. "All at one of the most spectacular locations you'll ever see."

EXCLUSIVE: Clinton looks to the future in Pride statement // Washington Blade // Chris Johnson – June 1, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said Monday past advances made by the LGBT community should be recognized during Pride celebrations this month, but noted that more work remains.

In an exclusive statement to the Washington Blade, the former secretary of state recognized June as Pride month, calling for a rededication to complete the work of improving the lives of people everywhere.

"Each June, we honor the contributions of the LGBTQ community and proudly reaffirm our commitment to ensuring that every member of the American family can live, work, and marry the person they love without enduring discrimination or prejudice," Clinton said. "As we celebrate the hard-fought progress that has been made toward advancing the rights of LGBTQ Americans, we must also recognize that this work is far from finished. I hope that each and every one of us will dedicate ourselves to building a future in which every person can live in dignity, free from violence or fear, free to be themselves, free to live up to their God-given potential no matter where they live or who they are — this month and every month."

Clinton made the statement on the same day she issued a message via Twitter hinting that, like many LGBT Americans, she's awaiting good news from the Supreme Court on same-sex marriage. This month, justices are expected to issue a decision on whether same-sex couples have a right to marry nationwide.

As of the time of this posting, neither former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley nor U.S. Sen. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) — other Democratic candidates in the race — had issued statements this year recognizing June as Pride month, nor had any of the Republican presidential candidates.

Clinton, who enjoys considerable support in the LGBT community, issued the statement shortly after calling on the Supreme Court to issue a nationwide ruling in favor of same-sex marriage. She's also spoken out against religious freedom measures in Indiana and Arkansas seen to enable discrimination against LGBT people.

Among her achievements on behalf of the LGBT community as a U.S. senator are advocating for the Employment Non-Discrimination Act and twice voting against a U.S. constitutional amendment that would have barred same-sex marriage throughout the country.

During her tenure as secretary of state, Clinton coined the phrase "gay rights are human rights" during a Pride celebration at the State Department and delivered a high-profile speech in Geneva in favor of LGBT human rights across the globe.

But Clinton didn't articulate support for same-sex marriage until 2013 and before that time said her position was that she opposed gay nuptials. In a later interview with National Public Radio, she advocated a state-by-state approach to advancing marriage rights for same-sex couples. Two weeks before oral arguments at the Supreme Court, Clinton made clear she believes same-sex couples should have a constitutional right to marry.

According to a Clinton aide, staff and volunteers are set to participate in a number of Pride events and parades throughout the country during the month of June.

Poll: New speed bumps for Clinton // CNN // Jennifer Agiesta – June 2, 2015

More people have an unfavorable view of Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton now than at any time since 2001, according to a new CNN/ORC poll on the 2016 race.

While Clinton remains strikingly dominant in the Democratic field, the poll shows that her numbers have dropped significantly across several key indicators since she launched her campaign in April.

A growing number of people say she is not honest and trustworthy (57%, up from 49% in March), less than half feel she cares about people like them (47%, down from 53% last July) and more now feel she does not inspire confidence (50%, up from 42% last March).

In head-to-head match-ups against top Republicans, her margin is tighter than it has been at any point in CNN/ORC's polling on the contest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the Republican side, though, no candidate has successfully broken out of the pack.

The group of seven that have come to dominate most polling on the race hold the top of the charts in this poll, Sen. Marco Rubio and Jeb Bush leading the pack with Mike Huckabee, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Sen. Ted Cruz, Ben Carson and Sen. Rand Paul all in the hunt.

Much of Clinton's fade is attributable to shifts among independents, but she's also losing some ground among her own partisans. Her support in the Democratic nomination contest has dropped 9 points since April, and though more than 8-in-10 Democrats said they thought she was honest and trustworthy earlier this year; now, just 73% say so.

The new CNN/ORC poll looking at the shape of the race for the presidency in 2016 finds these warning signs for Clinton, alongside some concerns for the Republican Party's best-known contender, Jeb Bush.

Jeb Bush's family ties

Bush's efforts to separate himself from his brother have worked to some extent. Only about half of Americans say Bush is "a lot like his brother."

But most -- 56% -- say his connection to two former presidents would make them less likely to back him for the presidency. Just 27% say that connection would make them more likely to back the former Florida governor.

That's virtually the opposite situation of what his brother faced when George W. Bush made his initial run for the presidency in 1999. Back then, 42% said Bush's connection to his father made them more likely to back him, while only 24% said it was a deterrent.

Bush's family ties are slightly more of a draw for Republicans, but not by much. Among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents, 42% say they're more likely to back Jeb Bush because of his connections, while 38% say they are less likely to vote for him because of that.

No leader emerges in the GOP pack

For the bulk of the GOP field, however, the race for the Republican nomination remains an effort to distinguish themselves from the pack and no one has yet succeeded at that.

Though there has been some shuffling at the top of the GOP order since the last CNN/ORC poll in April, no individual candidate's movement lies outside of the margin of sampling error.

Rubio tops the field with 14%, with Bush near even at 13%. Huckabee and Walker follow at 10% each, with Cruz (8%), Paul (8%) and Carson (7%) all within striking distance of double-digit support.

Paul prompts the largest gender gap on the GOP side, drawing 13% and tying for first among men while garnering just 2% support among women.

The top of the field is similar among conservative Republicans to the overall horse race numbers, but among those who consider themselves tea party supporters, there's a clear leader: Scott Walker with 19% support. His closest competitor is Ted Cruz with 12%.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Overall, about half of Republicans (49%) would like to see the field resolve early, saying it would be best for the party if one strong candidate emerged early as a clear frontrunner. But 46% say they would prefer a longer campaign, with a number of strong contenders competing over the next year.

One possible differentiator emerges: The poll finds a distinct difference in which candidates Republicans view as representing the future rather than the past.

Three-quarters of Republicans describe Marco Rubio (77%) or Scott Walker (75%) as representing the future, nearly 7-in-10 say so about Rand Paul (68%), but Bush (51%) and Christie (51%) are far less likely to be seen as representative of the future.

The growing Democratic field

Democrats are more likely than Republicans to say they would like a competitive primary (53% say that would be best for the party), but their preferences so far don't portend a close contest.

Clinton continues to hold a massive lead in that race, with 60% of Democrats saying she would be their top choice for the nomination. Behind her, 14% would favor Vice President Joe Biden, and 10% prefer Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.

Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor who announced his candidacy on Saturday, barely registers with 1% support.

Sanders does fare better among liberals than overall, carrying 18% support among that group, but Clinton still notches 61% among the liberals in her party.

Getting closer to the general

In general election match-ups, Clinton now runs about even with Rand Paul, Scott Walker and Marco Rubio, while she continues to top Bush and Ted Cruz by a significant margin.

As noted above, those shifts stem largely from a change among independents, though Republicans appear to be solidifying their support for GOP candidates while Democrats are slightly less certain about Clinton.

One feature of the race that has held even as the numbers shifted: These match-ups prompt enormous gender gaps. According to the poll, the gender gaps remain over 20 points in each of the five match-ups tested, including a whopping 34-point gender gap in Clinton's match-up with Scott Walker.

Her declining support in those general election match-ups, alongside falling favorability ratings and worsening impressions of her, suggests recent news about her actions as secretary of state may have taken a toll.

Though most -- 61% -- think the release of Clinton's emails over the next months from her time as secretary of state will not reveal any previously hidden wrongdoing, the poll also finds 58% are dissatisfied with the way she handled the attack in Benghazi in 2012.

A narrow majority feel the Republican-led congressional hearings on the attack have been handled appropriately, just 41% say the GOP has gone too far with them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's family ties to a president are more of a wash than Bush's. While 39% say her marriage to Bill Clinton makes them more likely to vote for her, the same share say it's a turn-off. And most Americans say Clinton is not like her husband at all (54%).

The CNN/ORC Poll was conducted by telephone May 29-31, among a random national sample of 1,025 adults. The margin of sampling error for results among the full sample is plus or minus 3 percentage points. It is 4.5 points for results among the 433 Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents and the 483 Republicans and Republican-leaning independents.

Republican Lindsey Graham Announces 2016 Presidential Campaign // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 1, 2015

Senator Lindsey Graham announced his campaign for president on Monday, emphasizing his centrist challenge to the Republican Party's base.

"I intend to be president not of a single party, but of a nation," Graham said in a speech in his hometown of Central, S.C. "I want to do more than make big government smaller. I want to help make a great nation greater."

Graham's speech finishes a months-long exploratory process, one that found the Republican bantering with town hall audiences and baiting rivals into fights on foreign policy and immigration. Polling in single digits, joking about his chances, Graham combines the candor of a dark-horse candidate with the media profile of a front-runner.

He left little doubt as to his intentions during a May interview on CBS This Morning: "I'm running because I think the world is falling apart. I've been more right than wrong on foreign policy," he said.

Graham, 59, joins three younger Senate colleagues—Ted Cruz of Texas, Rand Paul of Kentucky, and Marco Rubio of Florida—in the Republican nomination fight. (Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders is seeking the Democratic nomination.) Elected in 2002 to replace the retiring Strom Thurmond, and previously elected to four terms in the House of Representatives, he is likely to have the longest Washington resume of anyone on the Republican stage.

He's also the only declared candidate with a military record, having been a judge advocate in the United States Air Force since 1982. Last week he announced he would leave the reserves as he reaches the mandatory retirement age of 60 this summer.

Since the January launch of his exploratory committee, Security Through Strength, the possibility of a Graham bid has been a puzzle. His is a resume not calculated to appeal to Republican primary voters. Graham's early Washington career was defined by the impeachment of President Bill Clinton, a case on which he served as a prosecutor, which quickly came to look like a debacle for Republicans. In the Senate, he's advocated for an aggressive foreign policy and strong security state even as his party's libertarian tendency has grown. And every time legislation to change immigration policy moved in the Senate, Graham was a co-sponsor.

"We are going to solve this problem," he told the National Council of La Raza in a 2007 speech. We're not going to run people down. We're not going to scapegoat people. We're going to tell the bigots to shut up."

Talk like that infuriated conservatives. In 2008 and 2014, Graham's enemies searched for credible primary challengers. Both times, they came up far short, and convinced Graham that the fringe could bark but not bite. In 2010, he predicted that the Tea Party would "die out." After securing his 2014 victory, he seemed to be proven right.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There's a growing element in our party that would like me to speak up," Graham said earlier this year in an interview. "Where is the Republican Party on problem solving? Is there a rational way forward on immigration? Do you deport 11 million people? I don't think so."

Wry and affable, Graham's approach to presidential politicking owes much to his friend and mentor John McCain. In 2000 and 2008, Graham campaigned hard for the Arizona senator, who was running for president. In the Capitol, both men share an open-door approach to the media and a hunger for deals with Democrats. Graham shares McCain's readiness with a joke and talent for TV debate.

"In debates, he'll shred 'em," McCain said when Graham announced his exploratory committee. "He has my all-out complete support."

Graham may be kept out of the first Fox News debate, in August, which the network intends to limit to the top 10 candidates according to national public polling. Despite his steady presence in green rooms, Graham's focusing more on the New Hampshire primary than any "national" race. Like McCain, Graham is looking to prove that he can reason with the Republican primary electorate one room at a time. Alone among the candidates, he favors laws that would limit campaign spending–an issue that boosted McCain in 2000.

When challenged on immigration, he enters into a Socratic dialogue with audiences, to convince them that reform and pathways to citizenship are sensible but not amnesty.

And like McCain, Graham is a hawk whose confidence is not dimmed by events. "I think the world is falling apart," he often says, "and I've been right more than wrong." Graham supported the 2003 invasion of Iraq and the 2007 military surge, and has insisted that the conflict was won, a victory squandered by Barack Obama. He favored a more muscular intervention in Libya than the no-fly zone favored by the Obama administration, and favored an early military intervention on the side of Syria's rebels.

Graham's foreign policy contrasts completely with that of Rand Paul, and the two men have sparred across the primary states. Paul tends to avoid using Graham's name when he refers to "a senator" who favors NSA surveillance and treating captured terrorists as enemy combatants. Graham has no such filter, and has said that Paul "would have the worst chance of anybody to make a case against Barack Obama’s foreign policy."

That confidence grows out of a personal story that Graham has become more comfortable telling on the trail. Born in Central, near Greenville, he worked at a pool hall and was compelled at an early age to take care of his younger sister. "My mom's disease, Hodgkin's disease, wiped us out financially," Graham told Fox News in April. "We eventually lost our businesses. I understand we're all one car wreck from needing help. But what it told Lindsey Graham, above all else, is that family, friends and faith really do matter."

In politics, since winning a state legislative seat in 1992, Graham has defended the existence of the welfare state while arguing for reform. Raising the Social Security retirement age, like an immigration overhaul and foreign policy, has been a focus of Graham's early pitch. He starts with less support than McCain–but unlike the Arizonan, he hails from one of the GOP's vital early primary states.

"Get ready," Graham told a dinner audience in his native South Carolina last month. "Get ready for a debate that's been long overdue within the party. Get ready for a voice that understands you can't save America without someone willing to sacrifice and die for America."

Graham holds undergraduate and law degrees from the University of South Carolina. On Sunday, while the Senate debated the Patriot Act, he officially retired from the Air Force reserves, which he joined while attending school and caring for his sister in the absence of his late parents.

"There are a lot of so-called 'self-made' people in this world," Graham planned to say in Central. "I'm not one of them. My family, friends, neighbors, and my faith picked me up when I was down, believed in me when I had doubts. You made me the man I am today."

Clinton Lawyer Accuses Wisconsin of Trying to Suppress the Vote // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 1, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's top campaign lawyer has filed a second voter-access lawsuit accusing a Republican-led state of trying to suppress the vote — this time in Wisconsin, home to Scott Walker, the governor and likely Republican 2016 presidential candidate.

Marc Elias, the general counsel for the Clinton campaign and an election law expert, filed the suit in federal court on Friday. It was reported in the blog of Rick Hasen, an election law expert who works at the University of California, Irvine.

"This lawsuit concerns the most fundamental of rights guaranteed citizens in our representative democracy — the right to vote," the complaint states, then refers to a curtailing of early voting in the state, among other changes that affect minority voters and other groups. "That right has been under attack in Wisconsin since Republicans gained control of the governor's office and both houses of the State Legislature in the 2010 election."

Mrs. Clinton's aides said the suit was not filed on behalf of the campaign, but they offered their support for it.

"We are aware of it and strongly support its goal of ensuring the right to vote is not unduly burdened," Brian Fallon, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said in a statement.

Mr. Elias filed a similar lawsuit in Ohio recently, accusing the state of trying to suppress the votes of traditional Democratic constituencies like blacks, Hispanics and young people.

Mr. Walker, as he travels around the country, often talks about his efforts to push through changes in the voting rights laws to require people to bring identification to the polls.

Journalists Meet To Discuss Frustration With Clinton Campaign's Control Over Access And Information // HuffPo // Michael Calderone – June 1, 2015

NEW YORK -- Journalists covering Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign met for nearly two hours in Washington on Monday to discuss concerns about what they believe is inadequate access to cover the Democratic front-runner, according to people who attended.

The grievances discussed at the private gathering, which was held at the Los Angeles Times/Tribune Washington offices, go beyond Clinton's unwillingness so far to substantively engage with the press, a topic that has already been discussed publicly on cable news and social media. Attendees of the meeting, who were not authorized by their news organizations to speak on the record, charge the Clinton campaign with keeping an excessively tight grip on information, even when it comes to logistical details that don't seem particularly sensitive or revelatory.

Among the problems discussed were the campaign's failure to provide adequate notice prior to events, the lack of a clear standard for whether fundraisers are open or closed press and the reflexive tendency to opt to speak anonymously. The complaints mirror concerns that a number of political journalists have also raised in recent conversations with The Huffington Post.

While the White House Correspondents' Association has worked for greater media access for over a century and elects representatives to present the group's concerns to the administration, there isn't any comparable, established body working on behalf of the campaign press. Monday's meeting, which included about 17 journalists from outlets such as The New York Times, The Washington Post, Politico, Time and McClatchy, was an attempt not only to discuss such concerns, but eventually to present them to the campaign in a unified way.

Attendees discussed the feeling that the campaign hasn't provided enough notice for events, resulting in logistical difficulties for those trying to cover them. It's still too early in the election cycle for the campaign to be chartering the flights and buses that news organizations, at the cost of thousands of dollars, can sign up for to follow the candidate from stop to stop. For now, reporters are booking commercial flights to reach Clinton's events, and networks need to make sure satellite trucks and camera equipment make it there on time. The group discussed urging the Clinton campaign to provide information outlining the upcoming week so they can plan accordingly.

Another concern raised, according to attendees, was that the campaign had initially said that fundraisers of more than 100 people would be open to the press through a pool system. Under this arrangement, certain reporters are designated to cover events that cannot accommodate large numbers of journalists, and those reporters then provide information to the larger press corps. But recent Clinton fundraisers have been closed press.

Meeting attendees also expressed dissatisfaction with the ground rules established for a Thursday briefing at the campaign's Brooklyn headquarters that was attended by dozens of news outlets, including The Huffington Post.

CNBC's John Harwood wrote Friday that reporters who attended the briefing were not allowed to quote top campaign officials directly, even when it came to information that appeared to be basic talking points. Harwood noted that he could not show readers what campaign staffers' desks looked like because "the post-briefing tour was deemed off-the-record." (A week earlier, the Nashua Telegraph, a New Hampshire newspaper, similarly mocked the Clinton campaign for holding a conference call in which mundane information was provided under ground rules that those speaking should not be quoted.)

Coincidentally, Monday's meeting wrapped up just before the campaign sent a mass email to journalists with details of an upcoming event. The campaign said the details could only be attributed to a "campaign official," which prompted New York Times reporter Adam Nagourney to out the sender on Twitter. Such rules for anonymity, Nagourney noted, are not done unilaterally but established between two parties. He also pointed out that the information itself didn't "rise to [the] level" of requiring anonymity.

There was a general consensus at Monday's meeting that the ground rules for the Thursday headquarters briefing were unacceptable. Attendees say they expected that the group will urge the campaign to agree that similar briefings need to be on the record in the future.

When asked about the reporters' complaints and how the campaign is reacting, Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill responded in an email to HuffPost.

"I'd say two things," he wrote. "First, we want a happy press corps as much as the press corps does. Not in an effort to obtain favorable coverage, but because we're decent humans who want people to be able to plan their lives. It's a long campaign, and we are going to do our best to find equilibrium. Griping on background is not a constructive solution though, and I can't help but point out the irony here."

The group also discussed its system for disseminating pool reports, which The Washington Post criticized Friday for turning some reporters "into second-class journalists in the hunt for Clinton info."

The pool system, established at the urging of the Clinton campaign but run by campaign reporters, places journalists on a rotation and disseminates reports in real-time to fourteen news organizations. Those organizations, which do not bear the costs of being in the pool, receive the reports at the end of the day.

Though the Post put forth the idea of the system creating two classes of reporters, attendees at Monday's meeting stressed that the system allows for wider dissemination of traveling pool reports than was possible during Mitt Romney's campaign four years ago. At that time, only reporters physically present for Romney campaign trips received pool reports, and there was no wider dissemination to news organizations not in the rotation.

Hillary Clinton Focuses on Drug Addiction After Learning Scale of Problem // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 1, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's carefully choreographed round-table discussions with voters don't lead to many moments of surprise. But Mrs. Clinton has seemed to have had some legitimate jolts when conversations in Iowa and New Hampshire repeatedly drifted back to drug abuse.

Mrs. Clinton called heroin and methamphetamine addiction in rural America a "quiet epidemic" and told her policy advisers in Brooklyn to put it on the list of priorities as her campaign inched closer toward presenting a specific policy platform.

As part of that effort, last week senior campaign policy advisers held Google Hangout discussions with local officials and substance abuse activists in Iowa and New Hampshire to see how the campaign could best address the problem, the first of such discussions that will take place in the early nominating states, according to the campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the six years Mrs. Clinton has been mostly out of the discussion on domestic policies, heroin use has swept rural communities, and although aides say she was aware of problem in an abstract way, from reading policy briefings and talking to academics and advisers, her discussions with voters on the issue were particularly eye opening.

She instructed her policy team "to go beyond standard policies and really take a hard look at some of the more creative or forward-looking policy positions," said Jake Sullivan, the campaign's senior policy director.

The Google Hangouts, led by the senior policy advisers Ann O'Leary and Maya Harris, are part of that effort. Moving forward, drug addiction, according to aides, will be a central part of the "four fights" that Mrs. Clinton routinely references in her prepared remarks.

Participants in the hangouts included Candace Accord, of the Community Based Correctional Facility in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and Abigail Shockley, executive director of the New Hampshire Alcohol and Other Drug Service Provider Association, among other local community leaders and elected officials.

Based on their suggestions, Mrs. Clinton is likely to propose better-financed prevention and treatment options before criminalization and better access to mental health services (an area that aides and voters have said is lacking under the Affordable Care Act). She has already called for reform to the criminal justice system and a prison system overflowing with low-level drug offenders.

Drug abuse has not been a central campaign issue since the 1980s and early 1990s, when crime was on the rise and the crack cocaine epidemic threatened American cities. Candidates, particularly Republicans, and the more centrist-minded Bill Clinton were elected by vowing to be tough on drugs. Under President Bill Clinton's administration, drug offenders received stiffer penalties under federal law.

In the 2016 election, Mrs. Clinton enters a very different situation, in which rural areas, like the ones she has visited in Iowa and New Hampshire, are seeing an increase in addiction. She is expected to present more specific policy proposals after her campaign's official kickoff event on June 13.

"We have an increasing problem that is only beginning to break through the surface so that people – I think a lot of people are thinking, well, that's somebody else's problem, that's not my problem," Mrs. Clinton has said.

It's time for the media to admit that Hillary Clinton is popular // Vox // Matthew Yglesias – June 1, 2015

Quinnipiac is out with a new poll that confirms something the national media is loathe to admit and essentially never surfaces in their coverage of one of the most-covered people in the world today: Hillary Clinton is the most popular politician in America.

It would be genuinely silly to think that her early leads in general election polling tell us anything interesting about what will happen in November 2016. But they tell us a lot about how people feel in May 2015, and the way they feel is pretty good about Hillary Clinton.

According to Gallup, for example, she is the most admired woman in the world. What's more, she has been the most admired woman in the world for 17 out of the past 18 years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Journalists don't like Hillary Clinton

But the press hates to admit this. For Clinton, good news is never just good news. Instead it's an opportunity to remind the public about the media's negative narratives about Clinton and then to muse on the fact that her ratings somehow manage to hold up despite these narratives.

Here's how the Wall Street Journal wrote up an earlier poll showing Clinton beating all opponents:

> Hillary Clinton's stature has been battered after more than a month of controversy over her fundraising and email practices, but support for her among Democrats remains strong and unshaken, a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll finds.

And here's how the New York Times wrote up yet another poll showing Clinton beating all opponents:

> Hillary Rodham Clinton appears to have initially weathered a barrage of news about her use of a private email account when she was secretary of state and the practices of her family's foundation, an indication that she is starting her second presidential bid with an unusual durability among Democratic voters.

This framing is not surprising, since, among journalists, Clinton is one of the least popular politicians. She is not forthcoming or entertaining with the press. She doesn't offer good quotes. She doesn't like journalists, respect what we do, or care to hide her disdain for the media. She feels that the right-wing press has tried to destroy her for decades, that the mainstream press got played like a cheap fiddle by the conservative press, and that even the liberal press was overwhelmingly hostile to her during her 2008 campaign.

The public also hates journalists

Journalists are obviously free to dislike politicians who are uncooperative with the press, and to celebrate those who embrace a more freewheeling media-friendly style. But reporters all-too-often confused the conventional wisdom of the journo-pack with the opinions of actual voters.

The reality is that Clinton's disdain for the press is largely shared by the public, which does not think journalists are credible or contribute to society's well-being.

At the same time, most of the "bad" narratives about both Clintons that exist in the media are essentially self-centered. From an impeachment grounded in Bill's effort to keep an extra-marital affair out of the newspapers to a scandal about an email server designed to keep the contents of Hillary's messages out of the newspapers, the Clintons have continually run afoul of the press' fervent desire to know everything.

But few regular people evaluate public figures on the basis of their level of cooperation with media inquiries. Clinton's brand of cautious center-left politics and her genuine passion for trying to bring people together and make deals more-or-less reflects what the public wants from a politician.

Hillary Clinton Still Strong in Iowa Poll, Though Negative News Is a Concern // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 1, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton continues to command a sizable lead in a poll released on Monday of Iowa Democrats, who will cast the first votes of the presidential nominating race early next year. At the same time, Democrats are worried that revelations about Mrs. Clinton could hurt her in the general election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton is the choice of 57 percent of likely Democratic Iowa caucusgoers, followed by 16 percent for Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont and 2 percent for former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland. Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr., who has shown little interest in running, received 8 percent.

The poll was conducted for The Des Moines Register and Bloomberg Politics from May 25 to 29. Mr. Sanders, who drew large crowds in the state during the end of that period, was up from 5 percent in a January survey by the same pollsters. He has inherited the support of his party's most liberal wing that once favored Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, who was not included in the poll after repeatedly saying she was not a candidate.

Mr. Sanders or Mr. O'Malley, who officially entered the race on Saturday and is also carving out a lane to the left of Mrs. Clinton, seem to have room to grow: 37 percent of likely Democratic caucusgoers said their political beliefs were closer to Ms. Warren's than Mrs. Clinton's.

Support for Mrs. Clinton stayed steady since the earlier Iowa poll in January. It showed no softening despite the continuing spate of negative news accounts of foreign donations to her family foundation while she was secretary of state, her use of a private email account in office, and a Republican-led investigation of her handling of the attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

But 66 percent of Democrats said that at least one of those issues will hurt Mrs. Clinton in the general election if she is the nominee.

Here's the best news for Hillary Clinton in that new Iowa poll // WaPo// Chris Cillizza – June 1, 2015

It's not been a very good last month for Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. She's been dogged by questions regarding donations made to the Clinton Foundation, bad publicity surrounding the release of her State Department e-mails and a continued unwillingness to engage the media.

Doesn't matter! That's according to a new Des Moines Register/Bloomberg poll of Iowa Democratic caucus-goers, who in large majorities believe the Clintons are getting a raw deal in all of this. Seven in ten respondents (71 percent) said that regarding the "controversies surrounding Bill and Hillary Clinton," the couple is getting a "bad rap." Just 14 percent said the controversies were indicative of a "pattern of unethical behavior" by the former first couple.

Yes, these are Democrats. And Iowa Democrats, as we've learned over the past decade or so, are on the liberal side of the ledger. So if anyone was going to rally to Clinton's side against the perceived attacks of Republicans and the mainstream media, it's true believers like the ones tested in the DMR poll.

Still, the fact that there is a widespread belief that things like the private e-mail server or the donors to the Clinton Foundation are trumped up is extremely good news for Clinton.

The key for Clinton — in both the primary and, to a certain extent, the general election — is to rally Democrats, especially liberal Democrats, to her cause. In the early days of her presidential campaign, she has staked out decidedly liberal positions on hot-button issues like immigration and income inequality. But oftentimes, the best way to convince people you are one of them is to come under attack from enemies of those people. (Enemy of my enemy and all that.) And Republicans and, increasingly, the media, are very much enemies in the eyes of dyed-in-the-wool liberals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If liberals — like those in Iowa — continue to see stories about the e-mail server and the Clinton Foundation as part of a broader witch hunt against Clinton being organized by her political enemies and reporters with an ax to grind, that's a best-case scenario for the former secretary of state. Why? Because with every report on her e-mails or her donors, it affirms the sense within her liberal base that she's being unfairly maligned. The more the merrier, from Clinton's point of view.

The alternate reality is that these scads of stories raise doubts about Clinton's ability to win next November and, as a result, people begin to shop for a different candidate. While there is some evidence that Democratic voters are slightly worried about that possibility (four in ten Democrats in the DMR poll say that keeping a private e-mail server will hurt Clinton in the general election), they remain largely united behind her.

The more Clinton can turn the negative storylines around her into an "us versus them" (no matter who the "them" really entails) conversation, the better for her chances.

Meet the woman behind Hillary Clinton's Twitter account // Fortune // Nina Easton – June 1, 2015

Katie Dowd is the campaign's digital director, in charge of putting the swagger in Clinton's Twitter–not to mention Facebook, Instagram, Tumblr and all the rest.

With many of the power players from Hillary Clinton's 2008 presidential run are sitting this one out, the big question is: Who's in?

What follows is the latest installment of a Fortune series looking at the the most influential women on Clinton's 2016 team. When this series wraps, we'll turn our attention to the most powerful women on the GOP side of the race.

Katie Dowd may be in charge of the Clinton campaign's digital strategy, but she's not all about pixels. Indeed, Dowd is a self-described "people geek"—a sociology major drawn to politics because she's interested in understanding what makes people tick. After graduating from Illinois' Wittenberg University, she headed to D.C. and wound up working for a direct mail firm, learning old-style political persuasion that would later become useful in the exploding universe of social media. She worked at the two organizations charged with electing Democratic members of Congress—the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Most recently, Dowd worked on a State Department project called TechCamp, which helped civil society groups around the globe harness web tools for social action. A prime example: The Lithuanian activist who wanted to make the buildings in his town wheelchair accessible. Through TechCamp, he was able to use Google Maps to "tag" buildings and prove to authorities that physically disabled residents were being excluded. Before this project, Dowd worked on STEM (science, technology, engineering and math) issues as senior adviser to the chief technology officer at the White House.

When Dowd started out in political campaigns a decade ago, early engagement with voters was mostly an exercise in fund-raising; operatives viewed the Internet as an ATM machine. That has changed dramatically. Now, engaging voters online means a lot more than asking them to write checks. On the Democratic side, the presidential campaigns of Howard Dean and John Kerry set the bar for using the web to create a grassroots network of passionate voters–a trend that Obama all but perfected in 2008. When Dowd was part of the 2008 Clinton campaign, the team experimented with new digital techniques, like enabling volunteers to make internet calls to fellow voters from their own homes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This time around it's a far bigger, more complicated ball game. Dowd and her staff (likely to grow to 150) will have to manage a range platforms, from Twitter and FaceBook to Instagram, Tumblr, Pintrest—and likely other emerging networks we haven't even heard of yet. "We have to think about where the audiences are," says Dowd. Real-time video platforms like Meerkat and Periscope will change how campaigns operate. In the 2016 race, says Dowd, the focus will be on "letting people feel like they are part of the real-time movement of a campaign."

And of course, there is the low-tech, but essential challenge: How to give voters a lasting personal connection to Hillary connection. Already, Dowd has helped craft the candidate's famous Twitter bio: Wife, mom, grandma, women+kids advocate, FLOTUS, Senator, SecState, hair icon, pantsuit aficionado, 2016 presidential candidate.

What's her next move? Keep an eye on your screens.

Hillary Clinton camp seeks to both raise and lower expectations // WaPo // Anne Gearan – June 1, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign spokesman on Monday sought to raise and lower expectations at the same time, announcing a New York City venue for her first big rally while also suggesting that she does not expect to break 50 percent in the early primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire.

The dueling messages reflect the Democratic front-runner's desire not to be seen as an inevitable nominee — a posture that hurt her during her failed run in 2008 — while also ramping up excitement at the prospect of the nation's first female president.

At her first major rally, to be held June 13 on New York's Roosevelt Island, Clinton will lay out the main principles of her campaign. The rally will be followed in the subsequent week by a blitz of the four first primary states, according to spokesman Jesse Ferguson.

"Her speech will lay out her view of the challenges facing this country and her vision and ideas for moving the country forward," Ferguson said.

The rally on Roosevelt Island marks a shift away from a deliberately low-key rollout intended to take the edge off what both Democrats and Republicans had regarded as a steamroller to the 2016 nomination. The event will also include the first campaign appearances by her husband, former president Bill Clinton, and their daughter, Chelsea Clinton.

The choice of Roosevelt Island is a nod both to Hillary Clinton's adopted home state of New York and her longtime admiration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt-style government and ideals. She has often invoked the Depression-era president in speeches, and she cites Eleanor Roosevelt as a role model for her own public service.

In a memo Monday, Ferguson noted that no Democratic candidates have surpassed 50 percent in the Iowa caucuses unless they were a sitting president, vice president or Iowa senator; similarly, he wrote, no Democrat has received more than half the vote in a contested primary in New Hampshire.

Clinton will travel to Iowa immediately after the New York rally for a meeting with organizers that night. Her address to that meeting will be simulcast to similar meetings across the country, the campaign said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton will campaign in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada that week.

She is expected to do her first media interviews about the same time. Clinton has briefly responded to some questions from reporters traveling with her since the campaign's launch but has held no formal news conference.

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus said in a statement that Clinton should answer questions about foreign donations to her family's foundation and her use of a private e-mail server while she was secretary of state.

"After dodging questions for months, she should take this opportunity to finally come clean and discuss the issues important to everyday Americans," Priebus said.

Clinton campaign emails Ready for Hillary list // Capital NY – June 1, 2015

The Clinton campaign has sent its first email to the Ready for Hillary supporter list after obtaining access to it last week.

Politico reported Saturday that the campaign obtained the list of almost four million contacts through a swap with another independent group a Democratic source would not identify.

Capital reported in April that Emily's List, which took over Ready for Hillary's social media accounts, had begun emailing the Ready for Hillary list in March. It has continued to do so through May.

Politico reported Saturday that the campaign has not had access to the Ready for Hillary list in the first six weeks of its campaign as lawyers were working out what the best option would be for the campaign to receive access to the independent super PAC's list. Until now, Politico reported, in addition to signing up its own supporters, campaign staffers were working with a list of old 2008-era supporters that was often unproductive.

As Politico noted, Ready for Hillary had also sent out several e-mails after the Clinton campaign's official launch urging supporters to sign up.

In the email Sunday, with the subject line"Ready for your free sticker?," Robby Mook, campaign manager for the Clinton campaign, writes that "You and I have something in common: We've both been ready for Hillary for a long time." The email urges recipients to provide a mailing address to receive a bumper sticker.

Watchdog accuses Clinton campaign of illegally obtaining email list from super PAC // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – June 1, 2015

A watchdog group is asking the Federal Election Commission to review whether Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign legally obtained a massive email list from a political action committee associated with the candidate.

The Foundation for Accountability and Civic Trust pressed the FEC Monday on how the Clinton campaign was able to "swap" unknown items for a collection of nearly 4 million supporters' email addresses that had been compiled by the Ready for Hillary super PAC.

"Federal law explicitly prohibits a candidate from coordinating with and accepting donations, including an in-kind donation of a mailing list, from a super PAC," wrote Matthew Whitaker, FACT's executive director, in a letter

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monday supplementing a complaint filed in April.

The original FEC complaint alleged Clinton had used Ready for Hillary to vacuum up supporter information and contributions in a manner befitting a full-fledge campaign long before announcing her candidacy.

Whitaker cited a Saturday report from Politico that suggested the Clinton campaign had "gained entry to the independent super PAC's list through a swap with another independent group," although Politico did not name the third group involved in the transfer.

A spokesman for the Clinton campaign declined to comment on the swap.

Larry Noble, senior counsel at the Campaign Legal Center, said the debate over whether the transaction was legal boils down to the "fair market value" of Ready for Hillary's email list.

"It would be considered an illegal in-kind contribution to the campaign if the campaign did not pay, in monetary or list-swap terms, what the fair market value is for the list that it's getting," Noble said.

The FEC would be the ultimate arbiter of the fair market value if a question was raised, he noted.

"I think we're going to run into an issue here because, as far as I know, the campaign hasn't identified the groups involved and until we know more about that, there are going to be a lot of serious questions raised," Noble said. "The concern is that the Clinton campaign is getting a list of tremendous value and paying little or nothing for it."

Whitaker said his group had long suspected Ready for Hillary was preparing to transfer the email list to Clinton's campaign.

"If the campaign swapped lists with the super PAC, what value would a list have to a closing super PAC?" Whitaker said. "Right now, we do not know who the Clinton campaign swapped lists with or how, if not the super PAC, that group got the lists."

Ready for Hillary reportedly began to shutter its operations in April.

The super PAC survived an FEC review earlier this year after an anti-Clinton group complained about Ready for Hillary's decision to rent an email list from the candidate-in-waiting's prior Senate race.

The commission had an "insufficient number of votes" to find the super PAC in violation of a number of campaign laws and dismissed outright several other allegations, including that Ready for Hillary had sent an email to supporters in January 2014 that was authorized by Clinton herself.

Hillary Clinton to Rally in New York, Then Tour Early Voting States // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 1, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton will hold the first major rally of her presidential campaign on June 13 on Roosevelt Island in New York City, before embarking on a five-day swing through the four states with the earliest Democratic nominating contests, her campaign said on Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a midday speech at Four Freedoms Park — a memorial to Franklin D. Roosevelt, for whom the East River island is named — Mrs. Clinton will sketch out her view of the problems facing the nation and her "vision and ideas" for how to move the country forward, a top spokesman, Jesse Ferguson, said in an email to reporters that also noted Mrs. Clinton's admiration for both F.D.R. and Eleanor Roosevelt.

From New York, she will travel to Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

In the email, Mr. Ferguson also sought to lower expectations for Mrs. Clinton in Iowa and New Hampshire. He noted that no Democratic candidate had won more than 50 percent of the Iowa caucus who was not a sitting president, vice president or Iowa senator; and that no Democrat had received more than 50 percent of the vote in a contested New Hampshire primary in the last 25 years.

For Clinton, a big rally on a small island // Reuters // Jonathan Allen – June 1, 2015

NEW YORK – Hillary Clinton will hold her first large rally of her campaign this month on Roosevelt Island, the little slip of land in New York's East River best known as the site of the former New York City Lunatic Asylum. According to an email from her campaign, the June 13 rally will be held in the Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park, which belatedly opened in 2012, four decades after architect Louis Kahn first began designing the memorial to the former president.

Clinton can count on an impressive backdrop of the skyscrapers of Midtown Manhattan as she gives what her campaign says will be her fullest explanation yet of why she should be elected president next year. How a crowd of thousands might reach the island is less clear at this point – it has a single subway station that rarely deals with large crowds, and a tram car system, memorably featured in the climactic battle scene in the 2002 "Spider-Man" film, that can deliver about 100 people to the island at a time. There is also a small bridge connecting the mostly car-free island to the borough of Queens.

Clinton, who moved to New York in 1999 ahead of a successful run to become a Democratic U.S. senator for the state, picked the park in part because she said she was inspired by Roosevelt's presidency and considered his wife, Eleanor Roosevelt, a role model, according to the announcement email. When she last ran for president in 2007, she held her first rally at school gym in Des Moines, Iowa, a few days after her initial announcement. This time around, Clinton has been an announced candidate for about seven weeks, but has only held small events with little or no access for the general public.

The hospitals and prisons that once made the island infamous have long been replaced by small clusters of middle-class housing, popular with people who work at the United Nations headquarters just across the water. Although Clinton is yet to discuss much in the way of specific policies, she has said she is concerned both about reducing the number of people the U.S. sends to prison and making it easier for people with mental health problems to get treatment. Given the setting of her rally, Clinton may be tempted to invoke the work of Nellie Bly, the celebrated journalist whose 1887 book "Ten Days in a Mad-House", written after she feigned insanity and got herself committed, caused outrage for exposing the abusive treatment of mentally ill inmates on the island.

Hillary Clinton: First stop is New York City's Welfare Island // Washington Times // S. A. Miller – June 1, 2015

Attempting to draw a connection with a liberal hero, Hillary Rodham Clinton arranged for her first big campaign rally to take place this month in New York City's Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park — a landmark previously known as Welfare Island.

The Clinton campaign stressed the Roosevelt connection rather than the welfare moniker that until 1973 was the name for the narrow island in New York's East River, campaign officials said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They said the location will showcase her ties to the city as a former senator from New York, who also put her campaign headquarters in Brooklyn, and reflect how her life's work was inspired by former President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Memories of Welfare Island, which was named after the City Hospital located there, are not the location's only drawbacks. It also put Mrs. Clinton conspicuously close to the Wall Street banks with which liberal activist already say she is too cozy.

Still, the June 13 rally will mark the official kickoff of Mrs. Clinton's campaign and will be followed by a six-day whirlwind tour through the first four early voting states: Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

The former first lady, senator and secretary of state announced her White House bid in April, but she limited her campaign stops to small events and roundtable discussions, a sort of listening tour to ease her into the campaign and help her get to know the voters that she referred to as "everyday Americans."

The campaign announced the date of the big rally Friday but kept the location secret until Monday.

In her speech, Mrs. Clinton will lay out her view of the challenges facing this country and her vision and ideas for moving the country forward, the official said.

She'll also describe how her lifelong commitment to working on behalf of children and families took her from Illinois, where she grew up, through Arkansas and Washington, D.C., to New York were she was elected as the state's first female senator.

With a nod to the city, the park and the island named after her hero, Mrs. Clinton will tell the crowd how her work championing the needy followed in the tradition of Mr. Roosevelt and Eleanor Roosevelt, the campaign official said.

Hillary Clinton to launch campaign from one of New York's least-accessible public places // Washington Post //Philip Bump – June 1, 2015

There is only one island in New York City harder to get to than Roosevelt Island, where Hillary Clinton will hold her campaign kickoff later this month. That island is Riker's Island.

I'm not the type to go looking for metaphors in things! I am not that type! I am merely here to offer insights as a New Yorker-American into the ins and outs of New York life. Including the details of Roosevelt Island.

First of all: Roosevelt Island is a cool place to visit. It use to house a smallpox quarantine center at its southern end, which is still in the process of being restored (after partially collapsing a few years back). It's got a bunch of new housing and a spectacularly painted public pool. But it is about as inconvenient a place to get to in New York as is conceivable.

There are three ways onto the island.

By car: The red line shows the one route onto the island by car. You have to get to Queens and make your way through back streets in an industrial area to do so. The Queensboro Bridge (or whatever it is called now that New Yorkers ignore) passes over the island, but has no outlets onto it. (It would be hard to do so, given how high the bridge is.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What's left, then, is that little scroungy two-lane bridge from Queens, limiting how many people can get across it. But most people don't.

By train: Instead, they usually use the subway (the black line). Now, here is a secret about taking the subway to Roosevelt Island: It is terrible.

In order to get under the East River, the train tunnel is very deep underground, meaning you have to take about six escalators up to get to the surface. Maybe more, I haven't counted. I tried to take the stairs once, instead, and actually almost passed out. I'm not an athlete. But still.

By tram: The cool way to get to the island, the way that's mentioned inHollywood Movies, is to take the newly refurbished tram, seen here in blue.

It holds maybe 20 people at a time and takes probably 10 minutes. It's beautiful! I recommend it to visitors. However, it is not mass transit in the sense of accommodating masses of people for rapid transit.

I am not the type to find metaphors in things, as I said. I am just reporting that the Hillary Clinton campaign is launching from one of the least accessible parts of New York City. That is all I am doing here in this article. Nothing

Hillary Clinton's "Grassroots Campaign" Sets $1,000 Minimum for a Conversation // Firstlook // Lee Fang – June 1, 2015

An Intercept reader forwarded me the following invitation from Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, asking him to join the candidate for a series of events in Massachusetts. To take part in a "Conversation with Hillary" at a home in Chestnut Hill on June 10th, three days before the Clinton campaign's official launch in New York, attendees are asked to pay $2,700 per person. For the "Conversation with Hillary" earlier that day in Boston, a "Friend" of the campaign can attend for as little s $1,000.

The private events are described in the invitation as part of Clinton's "grassroots campaign."

The Clinton campaign website lists other upcoming fundraisers, including one on June 17th with McGuireWoods, a lobbying firm that represents ExxonMobil, the Washington Redskins, and America's Natural Gas Alliance, a trade group for fracking companies.

Hedge Fund Giant Tells Hillary Clinton to Cut the 'Crap' // Bloomberg // David Knowles – June 1, 2015

In the early days of Hillary Clinton's latest presidential campaign, hedge fund managers have taken it on the chin.

"There's something wrong when hedge fund managers pay lower tax rates than nurses or the truckers that I saw on

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I-80 as I was driving here over the last two days," Clinton declared in mid-April as she campaigned in Iowa.

"People aren't getting a fair shake. Something is wrong when CEOs earn more than 300 times than what the typical American worker earns and when hedge fund managers pay a lower tax rate than truck drivers or nurses," she repeated a month later when she returned to the state.

"I don't need anybody crapping all over what I do for a living."

Leon Cooperman

Now, one such manager is firing back.

"I don't need anybody crapping all over what I do for a living," Leon Cooperman, the billionaire founder of the Omega Advisors hedge fund told CNN on Monday, adding that she 'hangs out with all these people in Martha's Vineyard and in the Hamptons and then the very first thing she has to say is to criticize hedge funds."

Cooperman says he and other maligned hedge fund managers have given millions of dollars back to society in the form of donations to universities, charitable organizations, and cultural institutions.

"I have nothing to apologize for. I've made a lot of money. I'm giving it all back to society," he said.

Clinton's populist critique of hedge fund manager tax rates has also come under scrutiny for its accuracy.

"Her broad-brush assertion does not hold up to scrutiny, even when the talking point is uttered correctly," the Washington Post's Glenn Kessler wrote in May. "Overall, even hedge fund managers pay higher taxes—and tax rates—than middle-class Americans."

The Tampa Bay Times' Politifact concurred.

"She is certainly wrong for dollar amounts, which is what her statement was about. If she meant to say tax rates, that's more complicated, and the data doesn't clearly back up the point. Here, we're looking at just taxes paid, so we rate her claim False," Louis Jacobson wrote.

Clinton's own son-in-law, Marc Mezvinsky is a founding hedge fund manager for Eaglevale Partners, LP, and her ties to Wall Street have provided ammunition to rivals like Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley. On Sunday, O'Malley renewed that criticism by noting that Goldman Sachs CEO Lloyd Blankfein allegedly said that he would be happy if either Clinton or Jeb Bush was elected president in 2016.

Blankfein is an investor with Eaglevale Partners, which Mezvinsky started with his former Goldman Sachs colleagues Bennett Grau and Mark Mallon.

Journalists Meet To Discuss Frustration With Clinton Campaign's Control Over Access And Information // HuffPo // Michael Calderone – June 1, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NEW YORK -- Journalists covering Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign met for nearly two hours in Washington on Monday to discuss concerns about what they believe is inadequate access to cover the Democratic front-runner, according to people who attended.

The grievances discussed at the private gathering, which was held at the Los Angeles Times/Tribune Washington offices, go beyond Clinton's unwillingness so far to substantively engage with the press, a topic that has already been discussed publicly on cable news and social media. Attendees of the meeting, who were not authorized by their news organizations to speak on the record, charge the Clinton campaign with keeping an excessively tight grip on information, even when it comes to logistical details that don't seem particularly sensitive or revelatory.

Among the problems discussed were the campaign's failure to provide adequate notice prior to events, the lack of a clear standard for whether fundraisers are open or closed press and the reflexive tendency to opt to speak anonymously. The complaints mirror concerns that a number of political journalists have also raised in recent conversations with The Huffington Post.

While the White House Correspondents' Association has worked for greater media access for over a century and elects representatives to present the group's concerns to the administration, there isn't any comparable, established body working on behalf of the campaign press. Monday's meeting, which included about 17 journalists from outlets such as The New York Times, The Washington Post, Politico, Time and McClatchy, was an attempt not only to discuss such concerns, but eventually to present them to the campaign in a unified way.

Attendees discussed the feeling that the campaign hasn't provided enough notice for events, resulting in logistical difficulties for those trying to cover them. It's still too early in the election cycle for the campaign to be chartering the flights and buses that news organizations, at the cost of thousands of dollars, can sign up for to follow the candidate from stop to stop. For now, reporters are booking commercial flights to reach Clinton's events, and networks need to make sure satellite trucks and camera equipment make it there on time. The group discussed urging the Clinton campaign to provide information outlining the upcoming week so they can plan accordingly.

Another concern raised, according to attendees, was that the campaign had initially said that fundraisers of more than 100 people would be open to the press through a pool system. Under this arrangement, certain reporters are designated to cover events that cannot accommodate large numbers of journalists, and those reporters then provide information to the larger press corps. But recent Clinton fundraisers have been closed press.

Meeting attendees also expressed dissatisfaction with the ground rules established for a Thursday briefing at the campaign's Brooklyn headquarters that was attended by dozens of news outlets, including The Huffington Post.

CNBC's John Harwood wrote Friday that reporters who attended the briefing were not allowed to quote top campaign officials directly, even when it came to information that appeared to be basic talking points. Harwood noted that he could not show readers what campaign staffers' desks looked like because "the post-briefing tour was deemed off-the-record." (A week earlier, the Nashua Telegraph, a New Hampshire newspaper, similarly mocked the Clinton campaign for holding a conference call in which mundane information was provided under ground rules that those speaking should not be quoted.)

Coincidentally, Monday's meeting wrapped up just before the campaign sent a mass email to journalists with details of an upcoming event. The campaign said the details could only be attributed to a "campaign official," which prompted New York Times reporter Adam Nagourney to out the sender on Twitter. Such rules for anonymity, Nagourney noted, are not done unilaterally but established between two parties. He also pointed out that the information itself didn't "rise to [the] level" of requiring anonymity.

There was a general consensus at Monday's meeting that the ground rules for the Thursday headquarters briefing were unacceptable. Attendees say they expected that the group will urge the campaign to agree that similar briefings need to be on the record in the future.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When asked about the reporters' complaints and how the campaign is reacting, Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill responded in an email to HuffPost.

“I’d say two things,” he wrote. “First, we want a happy press corps as much as the press corps does. Not in an effort to obtain favorable coverage, but because we're decent humans who want people to be able to plan their lives. It's a long campaign, and we are going to do our best to find equilibrium. Griping on background is not a constructive solution though, and I can't help but point out the irony here."

The group also discussed its system for disseminating pool reports, which The Washington Post criticized Friday for turning some reporters "into second-class journalists in the hunt for Clinton info.”

The pool system, established at the urging of the Clinton campaign but run by campaign reporters, places journalists on a rotation and disseminates reports in real-time to fourteen news organizations. Those organizations, which do not bear the costs of being in the pool, receive the reports at the end of the day.

Though the Post put forth the idea of the system creating two classes of reporters, attendees at Monday’s meeting stressed that the system allows for wider dissemination of traveling pool reports than was possible during Mitt Romney's campaign four years ago. At that time, only reporters physically present for Romney campaign trips received pool reports, and there was no wider dissemination to news organizations not in the rotation.

New York Times reporter blows up Clinton campaign’s ‘background’ e-mail // WaPo // Erik Wemple –June 1, 2015

Adam Nagourney is the Los Angeles bureau chief for the New York Times. Though he’s the paper’s former chief political reporter, he’s not currently assigned to cover the campaign of Democratic 2016 hopeful Hillary Rodham Clinton. But he receives the campaign’s e-mails.

And tweets about them:

That tweet was an apparent reference to a June 1 e-mail from the Clinton campaign that included this data point: “In Iowa, no Democratic candidate for president has ever received more than 50% of the caucus vote unless they were a sitting President or Vice-President, or incumbent Iowa Senator.” More Nagourney:

As Nagourney noted, the e-mail addressed Clinton’s June 13 campaign kickoff speech at Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park in New York City. The e-mail instructed recipients to attribute its contents to a “Clinton campaign official.” Those contents were pedestrian and, in some cases, Wikipedia-style pedestrian. For example:

> Hillary Clinton grew up in Illinois, and her career spent working on behalf of children and families has taken her from Massachusetts to Washington, D.C., Arkansas to New York. But it was the voters of New York who elected her to serve as their first female senator.

Now let’s attribute that snippet in accordance with the rules of the e-mail:

> Hillary Clinton grew up in Illinois, said a Clinton campaign official in an e-mail sent to reporters, and her career spent working on behalf of children and families has taken her from Massachusetts to Washington, D.C., Arkansas to New York. But it was the voters of New York who elected her to serve as their first female senator, noted the campaign official.

In a chat with the Erik Wemple Blog, Nagourney said, “Reporters negotiate the terms of information with sources….you can’t go preemptively.” He called the information in the e-mail “anodyne stuff.” “It’s like give me a break,” he says. Nagourney isn’t writing a piece on Clinton’s campaign launch, nor has he heard any complaint from the Clinton people about his tweets. The Twitter commentary from Nagourney, furthermore, lands on a heap of other backlash pieces against the Clinton campaign team for generally worthless press briefings.

And Nagourney has some experience torpedoing background e-mails. Way back in December 2003, Nagourney did a story on how the capture of Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein would affect the then-incipient race for the Democratic presidential nomination. Around that time, Howard Dean was viewed as a threat to vanquish his rivals, who included eventual nominee Sen. John Kerry. Nagourney wrote:

> The strains this created were evident on Sunday. Mr. Kerry’s press secretary, Stephanie Cutter, sent an e-mail message to news organizations listing remarks Dr. Dean had made over the past six months that she said demonstrated that his opposition to the war was ”politically driven.”
> But Ms. Cutter, reflecting the concern among the campaigns that they not be viewed as turning a foreign policy victory to political advantage, put a note on the top of the statement demanding that it be reported as ”background” and attributed only to a Democratic campaign.

“She was upset,” Nagourney recalls, when asked how Cutter reacted to the outing. Cutter told the Erik Wemple Blog via e-mail, “[B]ackground has to be agreed to, not assumed.”

Of course, there’s a problem when reporters gripe about the “background” tendencies of campaigns and Cabinet officials and White House officials and so on. That problem is that media execs also run away from on-the-record accountability whenever possible.

Hillary Clinton coming back to S.C. // The State – June 1, 2015

Hillary Clinton will return to South Carolina on June 17 in what will be the 2016 Democratic presidential frontrunner’s second trip to the Palmetto State in three weeks.

Details were not announced.

Her latest trip will come after Clinton formally launches her campaign in New York on June 13. She also will visit other early-primary states: Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada .

The former Secretary of State visited Columbia on Wednesday in her first visit to South Carolina since she ran for president in 2008.

Clinton’s South Carolina campaign is holding an open house with community leaders at its Columbia office on Tuesday.

Secret effort to sell Hillary Clinton to rich liberals // Politico // KENNETH P. VOGEL – June 2, 2015

Winning over such donors is seen as critical to Clinton's White House prospects.

Hillary Clinton's allies are working to win over unenthusiastic rich liberals by pitting her against the Koch brothers and prospective GOP rivals rather than more progressive Democrats, according to a draft of a secret memo obtained by POLITICO.

The memo was prepared for Clinton enforcer David Brock ahead of an April major donor meeting in San Francisco. But the concerns it reveals about liberal donors' coolness toward her presidential candidacy – with some even holding out hope for a robust primary challenge from the left – are just as acute today, Clinton allies say.

Winning over such donors is seen as critical to Clinton's White House prospects.

The Clinton forces are counting on a constellation of allied outside groups to raise as much as $500 million to take on a Republican big-money machine that has been raking in cash from dozens of super-rich and highly engaged partisans. By contrast, the main super PAC supporting Clinton, Priorities USA Action, has struggled to collect million-dollar checks.

Part of the reticence stems from liberal queasiness about the expanding role of big money in politics since the Supreme Court's 2010 Citizens United decision. But there's also some discomfort with Hillary Clinton, the former New York Senator and Secretary of State, who is seen as too hawkish on foreign policy and insufficiently progressive on key issues like fighting climate change, income inequality and the role of big money in politics. Additionally, Democratic finance operatives say, efforts to rustle up seven-figure checks are suffering from a lack of a single, unifying enemy on the right.

All those concerns are addressed in the Brock memo, which appears to have been drafted in preparation for his appearance at the annual spring meeting of the Democracy Alliance major liberal donor club in April in San Francisco. The memo is written as a question-and-answer exchange between Brock and Democracy Alliance donors .

The memo suggests that Brock, who has built a fleet of deep-pocketed groups aligned with Clinton, is taking a conciliatory approach to assuage donors' concerns – conceding she's not as liberal as some donors wish, but emphasizing her progessiveness in public service and minimizing the prospects of a vigorous Democratic primary.

"You say the Kochs represent all that is bad in this broken system, yet our presumptive nominee is in the pocket of big Wall Street banks," begins one of the memo's hypothetical donor questions. "Aren't we going to have a hard time going after the Kochs' big money when some could argue that Sec. Clinton is bank rolled by Wall Street and therefore there is a pox on both our houses?"

The answer Brock should give, according to the memo: "It is no secret that Sec. Clinton is fair-left and not far-left. I think it is safe to say that there will be a dramatic difference between Sec. Clinton and whoever is the Republican opponent. She has spent a lifetime advocating for women and children and fighting for the middle class and there is not one GOP candidate who has that record."

Brock did not dispute the authenticity of the memo, which leaves a pair of questions about the internal politics of the Clinton big-money effort unanswered. But he declined to comment on the memo, or whether it reflected his fundraising approach or his presentation at the Democracy Alliance, which was closed to the press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The three-day meeting of the Democracy Alliance — a group that includes more than 100 individual and institutional donors and various unions — took place at San Francisco's Four Seasons Hotel just as Clinton officially launched her campaign.

While some of the group's major donors — including billionaires George Soros and Tom Steyer — have displayed varying levels of support for Clinton, others have grumbled mostly privately that she doesn't reflect their worldviews. Many Democracy Alliance members supported then-Illinois Sen. Barack Obama over Clinton in the 2008 Democratic presidential primary and urged Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run in 2016.

The group's importance to Democratic big-money efforts was underscored by the attendance of Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta, who held a briefing on the sidelines of the San Francisco meeting. Podesta founded the Center for American Progress think tank, which has benefited from Democracy Alliance support, and he has close relationships with many club members. At least one – CREDO Mobile co-founder Michael Kieschnick – told Podesta during the side session that his campaign role made Kieschnick more supportive of Clinton.

Another donor who attended, Utah-based investor Art Lipson, told POLITICO that Podesta didn't overtly seek support for Clinton's campaign. "First of all, that would have gone over badly. And he is much too smart to say it and doesn't need to say it," said Lipson, who has donated about $2.5 million over the years to Democratic candidates and committees.

Lipson said he recently donated to a super PAC trying to draft Warren into the Democratic presidential primary. In an assessment that could apply to many Democracy Alliance members, he said "her message is exactly my message, so I am 100 percent behind her. But there is no chance she is going to run." Lipson plans to attend a fundraiser this month in Salt Lake City for Martin O'Malley's Democratic presidential campaign and said the former Maryland governor "comes across as being highly intelligent."

Lipson said he's "fine with Hillary" given "that it would take some sort of a national disaster to have some other Democratic candidate" win the nomination. But he said that, while he'll vote for her over prospective Republican rivals, he does not plan to donate to her campaign, let alone any supportive super PAC..

Brock has sought to rally donors who might not otherwise give to Clinton by highlighting expected attacks against her from the most reviled of liberal bogeymen – the billionaire industrialist mega-donors Charles and David Koch and their conservative political and policy network.

"They have their sights on Sec. Clinton," reads the memo prepared for Brock ahead of the meeting.

He spoke on a panel called "The Electoral Arms Race," focused on the unprecedented $889-million spending spree planned by the Koch network in the 2016 run-up, according to an agenda obtained by POLITICO.

At the meeting, sources say, Brock detailed a new initiative of his American Bridge political outfit to highlight key 2016 states in which Koch Industries, the brothers' multinational manufacturing conglomerate, could be used against GOP candidates. The model for this project, the sources said, were the attacks that Democrat Gary Peters and his allies leveled against the Kochs and Republican Terri Lynn Land in his successful 2014 Michigan Senate race.

"This is a brand new project and we project it will cost around $3 million," reads Brock's memo. "We think it is critical to start the project early and we are looking for support to get staffed up very soon. We are hoping to get immediate support coming in at the $250,000 level."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The memo also includes responses to questions about how liberals could justify their criticism of the Koch groups for not disclosing their donors when some of Brock's groups – including Media Matters and American Bridge 21st Century Foundation – also do not disclose the identities of their donors.

"How can we stand up here and expect to be taken seriously talking about what they are doing when we are doing the same thing?" reads one question. In the suggested answer, Brock expresses disapproval for the proliferation of so-called "dark money," which Clinton herself has criticized, but adds, "We will play by the existing rules in this election because we cannot unilaterally disarm – too much of what we care about is at stake." And he asserts: "There is a major difference here – the Kochs are flooding the political system with money for pure self interest and self gain," alleging Koch-backed groups back policies and candidates committed to "slash(ing) government regulations so they can pollute with abandon and increase their bottom line. People in this room are not motivated by personal gain, and often work against their own self-interest."

The Kochs' allies reject this argument on its face, contending that their activism is motivated by a belief that society as a whole stands to benefit from small-government policies that allow the free market to thrive.

Told of the characterization in the memo, James Davis, a spokesman for the Koch network umbrella group Freedom Partners, said its members are focused on "advancing a future with more economic opportunities for every American."

Davis accused the Kochs' liberal critics of "launching personal attacks and taking away those freedoms." And, alluding to support by Democrats including Clinton for reauthorizing the Export-Import Bank, which Freedom Partners opposes, Davis said "many of them are rigging the system to fatten their wallets with taxpayer-funded corporate welfare. This is the culture of corruption in Washington that we're fighting against."

Hillary Clinton Returning to L.A. for June 19 Fundraising Swing // Variety // Ted Johnson – June 1, 2015

Hillary Clinton is returning to Los Angeles on June 19 for a fundraising swing that includes an event at the home of HBO's Michael Lombardo and husband Sonny Ward, sources said.

The event will be a day after President Obama treks to L.A. for a fundraiser at the home of Tyler Perry. That event will raise money for the Democratic National Committee.

Other events are expected on her L.A. schedule.

Clinton's visit to L.A. will be her second since announcing her presidential bid in April. In May, she raised money at three different events, including one at the home of Steven Bochco and another at the home of Haim Saban.

The $2,500-per-person event at the home of Lombardo and Ward is aimed in part at LGBT donors. The couple hosted a DNC fundraiser at their home last year with guest First Lady Michelle Obama.

Clinton will officially announce her campaign on June 13, with a speech in New York at Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park, followed by treks to Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

Tobey Maguire among Hollywood players hosting Hillary Clinton in June L.A. swing // WaPo // Matea Gold – June 2, 2015

LOS ANGELES — Actor Tobey Maguire is among the Hollywood players who will host Democratic presidential contender Hillary Rodham Clinton later this month when she makes her second fundraising swing through Los Angeles.

Maguire, star of the “Spiderman” franchise, and his wife Jennifer are opening their home for one of two “conversations” with Clinton on June 19 that benefit her presidential campaign, according to an invitation obtained by The Washington Post. A similar event earlier in the evening is being held at the home of HBO executive Michael Lombardo and his husband Sonny Ward, who were top fundraisers for President Obama.

Tickets for both events cost $2,700, the maximum allowed donation to Clinton’s campaign. Co-hosts are asked to raise $27,000 and hosts are asked to bring in $50,000.

Clinton was just in Los Angeles May 7, when she headlined three fundraisers hosted by figures such as “NYPD Blue” producer Steven Bocho, “Homeland’s” Howard Gordon and billionaire media mogul Haim Saban. Those events together drew more than 800 people, generating at least $2.2 million for her campaign.

Clinton supporters target Vermont // Burlington Free Press // April Burbank – June 1, 2015

Presidential candidate and former Hillary Clinton's campaign surely can woo Vermonters away from their independent senator in a Democratic primary, supporters of the former U.S. secretary of state agreed at a campaign gathering in Burlington.

A group of several dozen people brainstormed ideas Monday: Emphasize her gender and the historic nature of a potential presidency. Underscore her experience. Appeal to Vermonters' pragmatic side. Stock house parties with Vermont beer.

And, perhaps above all, stay on friendly but noncommittal terms with a rival, Vermont's "almost native son," Bernie Sanders, the independent senator seeking the Democratic nomination.

Nearly everyone at the organizing event mentioned Sanders as a point of comparison.

"The slogan should be, 'Cheer for Bernie. Vote for Hillary,' " said Beach Conger of Burlington.

To the extent the strategy works in Vermont, Democrats suggested they'd drive across the river to stump for Clinton in the more influential New Hampshire primary.

"We all know that Vermont's primary somehow seems never to make or break presidential politics," said Gov. Peter Shumlin, who spoke at the organizing meeting at Main Street Landing on a rainy Monday evening. "Let's be honest about this. But let's also remember that to our east is a state with great people where they seem to have a great impact on the outcome of presidential primaries."

Vermont is among the 12 states holding a primary on Super Tuesday, March 1.

The state's Democratic establishment has lined up largely behind Clinton. In addition to Shumlin, former Gov. Madeleine Kunin spoke in Clinton's favor Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I've known Hillary through the years both personally as a very bright, competent and compassionate woman," said Kunin, who was Vermont's first female governor, "and in her public presence, the issues she's fought for all of her life."

Hillary Clinton back in Bay Area on June 20 // San Jose Mercury News // Josh Richman – June 1, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton will be back in the Bay Area to raise campaign money in a few weeks, just a little more than a month since her last sweep through the region.

Clinton will attend a brunch reception on Saturday, June 20 in San Francisco's Mission District, hosted by real estate broker, former planning commissioner, and attorney Rick Hills. Tickets start at $2,700 per person; co-hosts who raise $27,000 or more and hosts who raise $50,000 or more will be invited to a pre-reception and photo line with Clinton.

An email sent Monday to announce the event noted that Clinton's campaign recently unveiled a finance committee structure in which someone who raises $27,000 in 30 days will be a "Hillstarter" with a seat on the Northern California finance committee; someone who raises $50,000 by Dec. 31 will be a "Hillraiser" with a seat on the Northwest regional finance committee; and someone who raises $100,000 by Dec. 31 will be a "Hillblazer" with a seat on the national finance committee.

"We hope you will use this opportunity to help reach your goals and take part in the wonderful benefits (soon to be revealed) associated with each committee," the email said.

The former U.S. Secretary of State, U.S. Senator and First Lady held two fundraisers in San Francisco on Wednesday, May 6, one hosted by hedge fund billionaire turned environmentalist Tom Steyer and the other by longtime friend and support Susie Tompkins Buell, cofounder of Esprit and the North Face. She held three fundraisers on May 7 in Los Angeles before returning to the Bay Area on Friday, May 8 for a luncheon at the Portola Valley home of eBay President and CEO John Donahoe and Eileen Donahoe, global affairs director for Human Rights Watch and former U.S. ambassador to the U.N. Human Rights Council.

Clinton declared her candidacy April 12 and has been busily visiting early-primary states since, but her campaign announced Monday that she'll give her "official campaign launch speech" on Saturday, June 13 at the Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park on New York City's Roosevelt Island. The event is open to the public, and members of the public can register for tickets online. She has yet to hold any public campaign events in California.

Marco Rubio And Rand Paul Pose Greatest Threat To Hillary Clinton // The Federalist // Emily Ekins – June 1, 2015

A recent CNN/ORC poll finds 75 percent of Republican partisans prefer that their party nominate a "presidential candidate who can beat the Democratic candidate," while only 25 percent prefer a nominee who agrees with them on issues that matter most to them. This clashes with partisans' reported preferred candidates for the Republican nomination. Numerous polls find disproportionate support among partisans for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker; however, U.S. senators Rand Paul and Marco Rubio perform better in general election matchups against likely Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton.

Despite this, 2016 election coverage has tended to pay more attention to Bush and Walker over Rubio and Paul. In fact, a May Fox News poll even excluded Paul from its general-election matchups with Hillary Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One reason less attention is being paid to these candidates is that only a quarter of Republican voters believe either Rubio or Paul have the “best chance of beating the Democratic nominee in the general election,” according to another recent CNN/ORC poll. But the matchup data say differently.

To be sure, Clinton enjoys a sizable lead against all Republican contenders. That being said, Quinnipiac’s latest poll shows that in a hypothetical general-election matchup, Paul and Rubio come the closest to beating Clinton. Paul would garner 42 percent of the vote to Clinton’s 46 percent and Rubio would capture 41 percent to Clinton’s 45 percent.

Higher Heights, Lower Lows for Paul and Rubio

This poll is not an anomaly. In fact, an analysis of major polls conducted in 2015 shows that Paul has fared best against Clinton from January-March of this year, with Rubio pulling ahead in April. Quinnipiac found that Paul and Rubio are the only widely known candidates whose favorables are not “under water.”

If Republicans care about nominating a candidate who can beat the Democratic nominee in 2016, they might want to pay more attention to Rubio and Paul.

Why might Paul and Rubio lead other Republicans in match-ups with Hillary Clinton? There are a number of possible explanations. One likely explanation is that Paul and Rubio beat Clinton on empathy.

Perception of candidate empathy matters. Readers may recall going into the 2012 presidential election that Mitt Romney and Barack Obama were tied on several candidate qualities, including being honest and trustworthy and being strong leaders. But Obama trounced Romney on “cares about the needs and problems of people like you” 60 to 48 percent. In fact, a slim majority (51 percent) of Americans thought Romney did not care about the needs of people like themselves.

How could anyone honestly expect to win if a majority of the people doesn’t think he or she cares about them?

Hillary Clinton is not Barack Obama. The Quinnipiac Poll finds that only 48 percent of Americans think Hillary cares about the needs and problems of people like themselves and 47 percent think she does not care about them.

Republicans Who Care

But Paul and Rubio are the only GOP contenders who Americans are more likely to believe “cares about the needs and problems of people like [them]” than don’t. In this, Paul has a +6 point advantage and Rubio has a +3 point advantage. In fact, Paul and Rubio are the only Republican candidates in the poll who Americans believe care about their needs. For instance, Jeb Bush has a -7 point deficit, Walker has a -5 point deficit, and Donald Trump has a -53 point deficit on empathy.

Why might Americans think Paul and Rubio care about people like them? Perhaps because they have taken stands on issues most Republicans avoid. For instance, Paul has actively sought reform of the criminal-justice system and is an outspoken critic of police misconduct and the justice system’s disparate impact on African-American and Hispanic communities. Further, Paul has twice filibustered (or quasi-filibustered) over drone assassinations of citizens in the United States and renewal of the Patriot Act.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans have lost the popular vote in five of the six presidential elections since 1992. However, candidates like Rubio and Paul who expand their scope of issue ownership beyond conventional Republican issues may be expanding their base of support. It's worth noting that what Rubio and Paul's unique stances share in common is expanding freedom and choice, and this may be attractive to new GOP voters.

Pickups Among Independent Voters

Independent voters seem to largely drive these results. Paul (+5) and Rubio (+1) are the only Republicans who lead Clinton among independent voters. Instead, Walker trails Clinton by 2 points, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie by 3 points, Bush by 5 points, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee by 7 points, Sen. Ted Cruz by 8 points, and Trump by 15 points.

Who are these voters that would not vote for any other Republican candidate besides Paul or Rubio in a matchup with Clinton? Unfortunately, little raw data are publicly available, besides a December 2014 CNN/ORC poll available via the Roper Center that included Paul, but not Rubio. Furthermore, sample sizes are small so data should be interpreted with caution.

However, data from this survey suggest that national-security issues, such as the U.S. government's use of torture, may attract new voters into the Paul camp. Indeed, civil liberties are precisely the issues on which Paul has distinguished himself from the Republican pack. More publicly available data are needed to investigate Rubio's voters.

Examining respondents from a Gallup March 2015 survey who are not favorable of Republican presidential candidates besides Paul or Rubio provides further insight into these non-traditionally Republican voters. Paul seems to attract younger, white, male liberals who are non-religious, and Rubio seems to attract middle-age, Hispanic moderates, and particularly women. (Once again, sample sizes are small, so data should be interpreted with caution.)

Right-Wing, or Leftist?

Some might find it ironic that Rubio and Paul, who were catapulted to high elected office via what many call the "far right-wing" Tea Party movement, are also the very candidates posing the most formidable challenge to the potential Democratic nominee. In fact, Dana Milbank from the Washington Post even argued that Paul had taken a "left turn," and that his positions would work well if he were challenging Hillary for the Democratic nomination. How can one come from the "far right" and compete for the Democratic nomination at the same time?

While many Republican lawmakers are known by their stances on gay marriage, taxes, and spending, these issues are simply not a high priority for many outside of the GOP base. Instead, many Americans are more worried about being unnecessarily (and unjustly) hassled by the police than by the Internal Revenue Service. Many fear being profiled by law enforcement, worry their grandmother may be deported, and wonder if they will eventually be accepted by their communities.

Americans gravitate to politics of inclusivity, of empathy. This is not the same as handing out "gifts," as Romney suggested. Americans do not need to be bought—they want to be asked for their vote (well in advance of Election Day).

Dan Pfeiffer: Hillary Is 'Going To Have To Engage The Press' // Daily Caller // Al Weaver – June 1, 2015

On his first day as a CNN contributor, former Obama adviser Dan Pfeiffer argued that Hillary Clinton is "going to have to engage the press" if she wants to have a success in her presidential campaign.

Appearing on "The Lead" with host Jake Tapper, Pfeiffer said that her dealings with the press will be "critical to her success" as the campaign drags on.

JAKE TAPPER: Let's talk about Hillary Clinton who is obviously way favored on the Democratic side of the aisle. You said that the political world had lost its mind about the Hillary Clinton e-mails. You don't think that this is something the American people should care about? She wiped her server cleaned, she used a private server for official business?

DAN PFEIFFER: No. I don't mean that it's not something that should be looked at. I think it is. My point was when this all happened, every, you know, political prognosticator and pundit was saying that this is going to be an existential threat to her campaign, some said. We have a poll for out in Iowa last night, or the other night that said she's still doing quite well there. So I think it's a legitimate issue that people should look at, but not the threat to her long-term political viability and some say it is.

TAPPER: One could argue that reason that she's been able to avoid any harm from this is that she has avoided any questions about it. She has really kept the press at arms length during all of her various trips. She hasn't given any significant interviews. Is this a smart strategy or do you think it will ultimately backfire?

PFEIFFER: Over the course of time..she hasn't even done the official announcement of her campaign yet. Over the course of time, she's going to have to engage the press. I think it will be critical to her success. I think that whenever you're in a situation like this...you want to make sure you run your campaign strategy, and don't do it on the schedule the press sets. But what you can't do is go so long without talking to the press that it bubbles over into a world where every single little interaction you have becomes carried on live television. So you have to find the balance. As the campaign goes on I think they'll be able to do that.

20 things for Hillary Clinton to worry about // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 1, 2015

For a presidential candidate who is so "inevitable," Hillary Clinton is in an odd position. She's far ahead of any challenger but seems more vulnerable than ever. Here are 20 reasons for her to worry:

1. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is being taken seriously in the media and is drawing big crowds in Iowa.

2. Once Sanders breaks 25 to 30 percent, other, stronger candidates may consider getting into the race.

3. The war against the Islamic State is going poorly, making her decision to tie herself to President Obama's mast on foreign policy more problematic by the day.

4. Ditto for the Iran negotiations.

5. She has to re-launch her campaign, suggesting that it didn't get off the ground the first time.

6. The appearance of so many quality candidates on the GOP side who have interesting things to say highlights how little she offers in the way of new or interesting ideas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

7. The media buy that the Clinton Foundation scandals — with her greed and lack of candor front and center — are real scandals. Media discussion of her antics remains vicious. Not even her allies seem inclined to defend her. And to top it off, the monthly release of e-mails will give the media new fodder for months to come.

8. The premise of her campaign — working for everyday Americans — has been swamped by scandal and her own fear of freely interacting with everyday Americans.

9. Neither Sanders nor former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley has anything to lose, so they might as well go after her biggest liabilities — her character and staleness. They've begun already.

10. She still can't manage a one-on-one news anchor interview. Will she ever?

11. Other candidates are improving, but she shows no sign of doing so.

12. Bill Clinton continues to sound off and sound out of touch.

13. A listless economy does not offer impetus for a "third term."

14. The GOP not only has a lot of quality candidates, but also a lot of young ones. Whether it is age, longevity or simply cultural cluelessness, it's hard to see how Clinton generates excitement, particularly among young voters.

15. Republican operatives can still focus their fire almost exclusively on her, while Democrats can't yet single out one or even a couple of GOP targets. The general election campaign against Clinton is well underway.

16. There does not appear to be anyone in her inner circle willing to tell her hard truths about her campaign skills, strategy and unethical behavior.

17. She has reminded us that with the Clintons come a retinue of unsavory characters.

18. With 100 percent name identification, it is hard to imagine there are many persuadable voters out there. By contrast, many GOP contenders are largely unknown to the electorate and can gain followers. Clinton's plunging favorable ratings suggest she may have peaked already.

19. She doesn't have to lose the Iowa caucuses to get rotten headlines. She's flunking the expectations game.

20. She is charmless.

The Presidential Candidates' 404 Pages, Ranked // Yahoo // Daniel Bean – June 1, 2015

Career politicians are acutely sensitive to taking wrong turns. So it's no surprise that many of the 2016 U.S. presidential candidates are paying attention to where their campaign website visitors land when they veer off-course.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead of a simple error message, the 404 pages for the online headquarters of Marco Rubio, Hillary Clinton, Mike Huckabee, and others offer family photos, personal videos, and, of course, plenty of puns.

Below, we've ranked all of these novelty 404 pages with respect to creativity, technical prowess, and also arbitrariness. You probably should not base your vote in the upcoming election on this.

LAST PLACE: Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Ben Carson, Lindsey Graham, and Carly Fiorina

If you don't put any effort into making your 404 page fun at all, you make last place on our list. The candidates listed above feature standard "page not found" or "error" messages when visitors get lost on their campaign sites. In the case of Ted Cruz's website, trying to access a page that doesn't exist will simply spit you back out to the home page.

Thanks for not playing along, guys and gals!

6. Rick Santorum

We like 404s that are fun and lighthearted. So since former Pennsylvania senator Rick Santorum decided to use his as a nasty poke at the Hillary Clinton email scandal, we've pushed him down on our list. More demerits were calculated in for the Republican since his site ostensibly lifted the "mean Hillary Clinton joke 404" idea from his party's official website. (Also, the GOP's Hillary 404 is way funnier.)

5. Marco Rubio

Nothing is more American than throwing a little pigskin, right Marco? The Florida Senator's 404 page wants you to know that he's a big fan of family and football. It's a nice-looking and technically savvy landing page with an embedded video, but the charm of it all might be lost on its alignment with a sport that's under fire for safety concerns.

FUMBLE!

4. Martin O'Malley

Martin O'Malley's horse-mounted general 404 gives us too much of a Dukakis-on-a-tank feel to rank highly on our list. We get the joke, and it's good to see that the Maryland governor knows how to poke a little fun at himself. But if the Democrat wants to upend favorite Hillary Clinton for the 2016 party nomination, he'll want to bring something a little more relatable than looking regal on a horse.

3. Bernie Sanders

Senator Bernie Sanders' 404 redirection video message is no-frills personified. (Go watch it.) And it's helpful, even! We can appreciate those traits in and of themselves, but imagining the conversation Bernie had with some web designer intern just before filming the vid, that's the part that makes us smile the most.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“What’s that?! You want me to point at the bottom of the screen?!”

2. Mike Huckabee

The fishing Mike shown in Governor Huckabee’s 404 page cleverly reinforces the Republican’s good ol’ boy persona. The bonus points added for incorporating a dog bring him to second on our list. Simple and appealing. And a dog!

1. Hillary Clinton

Right now, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton’s cute and punny 404 gets our vote for number one. Hers, featuring a family picture at Disney with Bill and Chelsea, was the first we came across this election cycle and none of the other candidates have been able to dethrone the queen yet.

Of course, the party primaries leading up to the 2016 election are still a long way away, and plenty of candidates have yet to officially launch their campaign websites. (We hold high hopes for Donald Trump’s 404, for example.) So between now and then, we’ll be updating our ranking as other hopefuls launch their respective Internet campaign home pages.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

The race is on to become Hillary Clinton alternative // CNN // Eric Bradner - June 2, 2015

Washington – The race to become the liberal alternative to Hillary Clinton is on.

Thanks to a new poll, which shows Clinton has some serious vulnerabilities when it comes to trustworthiness and likeability, contenders like Vermont's Bernie Sanders and Maryland's Martin O'Malley may have more room to make their case than previously thought.

A more alarming sign for Clinton: Prospective Republican opponents have closed on her in head-to-head matchups, with Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker all now polling within the margin of error.

Clinton's favorability rating is now 46% -- down from 53% in March. And just 42% said they view Clinton as honest and trustworthy, compared to 50% in March, according to a new CNN/ORC poll.

The greatest threat to her chances of securing the Democratic nomination -- the potential for a Sen. Elizabeth Warren candidacy -- is apparently over. But the polling shows she'll still have to come to play against the likes of liberal folk hero Sanders and the willing-to-throw-a-punch O'Malley.

Clinton's share of Democrats' support has slipped from 69% in April to 60% six weeks later. Second, though, is Vice President Joe Biden, at 14%. Sanders is at 10%, double his support from March, while O'Malley still barely registers at 1%.

The former Maryland governor officially launched his campaign over the weekend, and Sanders made news by attracting crowds of hundreds to events on his first swing through Iowa.

"That was an indication of the fact that Iowa voters definitely want to get engaged," said Tom Henderson, the Democratic chairman in Polk County, Iowa's most populous county.

Though there are apparent cracks in the armor, top Democratic hands say Clinton is still on safe territory.

"If either one of them were to win, it would be the greatest upset in the history of politics," said Dan Pfeiffer, a CNN political commentator and former senior White House aide to President Barack Obama.

And Clinton's campaign is making as clear as it can that the former secretary of state is preparing for a real primary battle -- particularly in early-voting states like Iowa.

On June 13 -- the same day Clinton holds her first major speech and rally of the campaign in New York City -- she'll meet with key supporters and volunteers in the Hawkeye State, and simulcast that meeting to similar ones in nearly all 435 congressional districts across the country.

In the 2008 campaign, Clinton was stunned by a third-place finish behind Barack Obama and Sen. John Edwards. It's a lesson that seems to have been taken to heart for her 2012 campaign.

Team Clinton already employs 21 field organizers and six regional organizing directors in Iowa, and those organizers are working down to the precinct level. The staff includes state director Matt Paul and deputy state director Molly Schermann, who both worked for former Iowa governor and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, as well as political director Troy Price, the former executive director of the Iowa Democratic Party.

That said, her advisers know Iowa has always been a game of expectations, and they are doing their best to temper them.

Clinton campaign spokesman Jesse Ferguson on Monday highlighted a number many Clinton allies have cited: No Democrat who wasn't a sitting president, vice president or Iowa senator has ever topped 50% of the state's caucus vote.

Still, Clinton is far from a typical candidate.

Henderson, the Polk County Democratic chair, said it's unfair to compare low-profile candidates like Sanders and O'Malley with Clinton.

"We keep comparing these candidates to Hillary Clinton, who may be the most famous women in the world, and a lot of them are still emerging -- people are getting to know them," he said. "It's still early in the campaign."

The biggest danger to Clinton's candidacy is the emergence of a damaging narrative -- that she acts like she's above reproach when it comes to questions over her use of private email while heading the State Department or the controversial donations accepted by the Clinton Foundation. Or that she's completely untrustworthy.

Martin O'Malley's first challenge: Bernie Sanders // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – 6/1/15

Martin O'Malley was supposed to be the main liberal alternative to Hillary Clinton. But when he announced his candidacy Saturday in Baltimore, he found that spot already taken by someone else.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who is now Clinton's top rival in early polls, beat the former Maryland governor to a presidential announcement by exactly a month, and to a outdoor kickoff rally by five days.

Both men served two terms as mayor in the largest city in their states. Both were then elected statewide. And both returned to those cities this week to announce their underdog presidential campaigns. But the scenes were very different.

O'Malley had several hundred, perhaps a thousand, supporters to cheer him on Saturday at a park overlooking Baltimore's skyline. There were also about a dozen protesters, who heckled O'Malley over his policing policies as mayor.

Sanders, on the other hand, drew more than 5,000 supporters in Burlington, a city of 40,000. A sea of fans overflowed the lakefront park Sanders helped build as mayor, and packed in behind portapotties and platforms, where they had no hope of a view.

And it was just the kickoffs. Both candidates this week visited Iowa where Sanders drew 700 in Davenport for the biggest rally any candidate of either party has seen in the state this election season, according to the New York Times. In a tiny town of Kensett, population 240, Sanders drew 300.

O'Malley visited Davenport three days later and spoke to 50 supporters. He met another 200 in Des Moines later that night, according to the Des Moines Register.

Meanwhile, Sanders headed to Minneapolis, Minnesota, where he fired up an overflow crowd of more than 3,000 in a basketball gym, according to the Minneapolis Star Tribune. Hundreds more listed from outside, unable to get in.

On the Internet, 84,000 Facebook users generated 120,000 interactions about O'Malley in the 24 hours after his launch, according to the social networking company. In the same period after Sanders' announcement, Facebook record 10 times the interactions – 1.2 million – from 592,000 different users. (Hillary Clinton blew both of them out of the water with 10.1 million interactions from almost 5 million users.)

Craig Varoga, who served as O'Malley's chief strategist on his 2010 reelection campaign, but is not involved with the candidate today, said O'Malley needs to find a way to deal with Sanders soon.

"His first real challenge is dealing with Bernie Sanders' campaign, rather than directly going after Hillary Clinton," said Varoga.

Only perhaps 30-40% of Democrats are currently not supporting Clinton. If O'Malley and Sanders split that bloc, neither will be seen as credible, Varoga said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They have to find a way to talk about Sanders without talking about him. The worst thing is for one longshot to get in a fight with another longshot,” Varoga said.

O’Malley’s camp, however, insists they’re not concerned about Sanders – in fact they welcome his success.

As they see it, O’Malley’s more immediate challenge is breaking through the psychological barrier of Hillary Clinton’s inevitability. No candidate will be taken seriously until the idea that Clinton can lose is taken seriously. So the more any progressive alternative to Clinton rises in the polls, the better for everyone running to her left.

“I think it’s an encouragement to my candidacy,” O’Malley said of Sanders on ABC’s “This Week” Sunday. Why should progressive support O’Malley over Sanders? “Because I have a track record of actually getting things done, not just talking about things,” O’Malley added.

The former governor’s allies view Sanders as essentially a protest candidate, while O’Malley is presidential. If they can convince voters there’s a chance for an alternative to actually win against Clinton, they think Sanders’ supporters will flock to the more electable O’Malley.

Team O’Malley looks to the 2012 Republican presidential primary, in which nearly every candidate had a moment in the sun, and sees Sanders’ fling with Democratic primary voters as fleeting.

And O’Malley’s allies are pointing to another historical parallel as well. “Bernie Sanders is in some ways like Sen. McCarthy was in 1968,” said former Maryland governor Parris Glendening, who is supporting O’Malley.

The 1968 Democratic primary featured a thought-to-be-inevitable frontrunner in Lyndon Johnson, the incumbent president. None of the party’s top prospects dared challenge Johnson. But the Vietnam War created an opening for an anti-war progressive, exploited by underfunded longshot candidate Sen. Eugene McCarthy.

After McCarthy came shockingly close to winning the New Hampshire primary, Robert F. Kennedy sensed Johnson’s weakness and jumped into the race. That prompted the once-inevitable president to throw in the towel on his reelection bid entirely and quit. Kennedy won a string of contests, but tragically did not make it to the Democratic Convention when he was assassinated after winning the California primary in June.

In O’Malleyland’s eyes, Sanders is McCarthy and O’Malley is Kennedy, the young, handsome Catholic pol.

While they agree on most issues, Sanders is an anti-politician at a time when politicians are liked, while O’Malley looks like a central casting candidate. And without a critical issue like the Vietnam War where the candidates differ, it’s unclear if O’Malley can draw a clear contrast with his rivals and distinguish himself.

“O’Malley’s advantage is that he’s not just out there on these issues, but he’s been very effective on these issues,” Glendening said, pointing to O’Malley’s track record in Maryland. “His other big advantage is organization,” Glendening added, pointing to the former governor’s years as a political organizer and operative before he sought elected office himself.

“Sanders’ support is just a representation of the explosiveness of these issues,” he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, even many of Sanders supporters don't necessarily see him as presidential. And a danger for the self-proclaimed democratic socialist was on display this weekend, when he had to answer questions about a controversial 1972 essay, in which he wrote that women fantasize about being raped. Sanders called it "stupid" and said he was imitating the voice of the male chauvinist he was criticizing.

For the meantime, though, both candidates will be focused squarely on Clinton, not each other.

Martin O'Malley misses his chance: How Hillary Clinton closed off his biggest 2016 opening // Salon // Simon Maloy – June 1, 2015

After months and months of hemming, hawing, and dithering, Martin O'Malley is finally an official candidate for the presidency. He's entered the race with literally nowhere to go but up – his RealClearPolitics national polling average is, as of this writing, a clinically dead 0.8 percent. That puts him at the very bottom of the Democratic primary barrel. He's being badly outpolled by Elizabeth Warren and Joe Biden, neither of whom have taken any steps towards 2016 bids, and he's even behind bored vanity candidates Lincoln Chafee and Jim Webb. It's a weird position for an accomplished two-term governor of a reliably blue state to find himself in.

So what hope does O'Malley have of snatching the nomination away from runaway favorite Hillary Clinton? At the moment, not much, but he's at least going to try and make things interesting. Both O'Malley and Clinton's current chief rival, Bernie Sanders, have indicated that they're going to come at Hillary from the left and appeal to the slice of the Democratic base that is maybe a little uneasy over her perceived centrist tendencies. Unfortunately for O'Malley, Clinton has already moved to cut him off at the knees on one issue he clearly hopes to challenger her on: immigration.

Remember last summer's border crisis? Thousands and thousands of undocumented immigrant children were pouring over the southern border, straining the resources of immigration agencies and causing a major political controversy. The crisis had the weird effect of dividing Democrats on immigration, an issue that typically unites the party in the face of Republican fractiousness. At the time, the White House moved to accelerate deportation proceedings for the undocumented minors to send a message to Central American countries that there was no benefit in making the dangerous journey through Mexico.

O'Malley, who was still governor of Maryland, very publicly broke with President Obama and condemned the White House for pursuing a cruel and immoral policy. "It is contrary to everything we stand for as a people to try to summarily send children back to death," he said, "in a place where drug gangs are the greatest threat to stability, rule of law and democratic institutions in this hemisphere." It was smart politics for O'Malley, as he simultaneously galvanized liberals on a contentious issue, put daylight between himself and a president whose popularity wasn't so hot at the time, and directly challenged Hillary Clinton, who had said the undocumented minors "should be sent back as soon as it can be determined who responsible adults in their families are."

Picking a fight with Clinton on immigration made sense. She'd stumbled badly on the issue in 2007 when she refused to directly answer whether or not she'd back driver's licenses for undocumented immigrants. That experience, combined with her support for Obama's policy towards the border crisis, seemed to indicate that there'd be at least some space to attack her from the left on the issue. As for O'Malley's own record, he could point to legislation he signed allowing undocumented immigrants access to driver's licenses and his support for a state-level version of the DREAM Act.

But O'Malley waited too long, and while he sat on the sidelines, Clinton seized the initiative. Last month she laid out her own vision for immigration reform that preserves and expands upon the policies Obama has put in place through executive action. She spoke to the urgency liberals and Latino voters feel about passing immigration reform, and aggressively challenged the Republican presidential candidates, attacking them for not "clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship." At the very least, O'Malley could have used the issue to be perceived as the person who was forcing Hillary to the left. Instead, she went there on her own.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley still has a strong record on immigration issues, and he's hired Obama's former director of Hispanic media to help craft policy and conduct outreach. And all indications are that he's still going to make an issue of Hillary's response to the border crisis as part of a broader critique of her immigration stance. He's absolutely right to do that, but Hillary's already making moves to align herself more closely with the portion of the electorate that he'll be targeting. There wasn't a whole lot of room on Hillary's left to begin with, and if this keeps up, O'Malley could soon find himself with nowhere left to go.

O'Malley's Bad Timing // Washington Monthly // Ed Kilgore – June 1, 2015

When I was first in the vicinity of Martin O'Malley, right after he was first elected mayor of Baltimore (in 1999), the prevailing question wasn't if but when he'd run for president. In the New Democrat circles I ran in back then, he was a pretty hot property, interested in policy innovations on a wide range of issues that transcended his current position on the political career ladder. Even then, there was a sort of ambivalent feeling about him: he had a bit of the Bobby Kennedy aura about him—a prized quality for Democrats regardless of their ideological tendencies—but there were also questions about his depth and vision. And then there was the personal image: the wonky Irish rocker whom a lot of women found very attractive (I don't get the sense this last credential has survived the intervening decade-and-a-half, though I could be wrong).

So now after two ostensibly successful terms as mayor and then as Governor, the appointed time for the O'Malley presidential run has arrived, and you get the sense his timing is just completely off. His earlier time served in Hillary Clinton's orbit makes him an unlikely and very long-shot challenger to her nomination. His sudden emergence as a would-be "true progressive" champion is singularly undermined by the prior presence in the presidential field of Bernie Sanders, who has a few decades on O'Malley in rousing crowds with attacks on Wall Street and centrist "sell-outs." And he's definitely been wrong-footed by recent events in Baltimore, where fairly or unfairly the suspicion has been sowed that his supposedly wonky policing strategies fed a old-school habit of harassing young black men for who they were, and created a poisonous atmosphere that is now boiling over in violence and mistrust of government. It doesn't help O'Malley that his chief accuser on this front is television writer and producer David Simon, whose depiction of Baltimore in the HBO series The Wire probably represents 99% of what political and journalistic elites in the rest of the country know about that city.

Add in the disillusionment with O'Malley among Democrats in his home state after his tax policies helped sink his designated successor in 2014, Anthony Brown, and you have a guy who at the age of 52 should probably think about deferring his presidential ambitions until 2020 or 2024. For all I know, of course, this campaign is mostly strategic, aimed at positioning O'Malley to become HRC's running-mate or a lively prospect for the future. But right now he's in a position where if he doesn't get some attention by going after both Sanders and Clinton, his candidacy could sink like a stone.

At FiveThirtyEight Harry Enten put up a rather deadly post about O'Malley over the weekend that suggested the lack of support for his candidacy in Maryland made him a really unusual presidential aspirant compared to, well, just about everybody else past or present. He'll have a brief window of interest in his candidacy before it closes for the cycle (barring some calamity hitting Clinton). If he can reverse all the indicators pointing downward in that time, then the promise a lot of people saw in him back in the day can yet be redeemed.

O'Malley on changing his mind about Clinton: 'Times change' // Politico // Nick Gass – June 1, 2015

Martin O'Malley supported Hillary Clinton in 2008 and 2012, but "times change," the Democratic presidential candidate and former governor of Maryland said Monday in an interview with ABC News' George Stephanopoulos.

"I believe that the presidency is a sacred trust," O'Malley said, echoing remarks from his weekend campaign announcement in which he railed against Wall Street's preference for Clinton and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Democratic Party has not “delivered” on its promise to “make the American dream real again for more families,” O’Malley said in the interview aired on “Good Morning America.”

On Sunday, former top White House adviser David Axelrod tweeted that O’Malley’s support of Clinton in 2008 might make it “a bit awkward” to slam political “royal families” during his campaign. O’Malley responded, saying that while people don’t change, the times do, noting that his support of Clinton preceded the financial collapse.

“Well I was for Secretary Clinton in 2008. She and I both worked hard to elect the president and to re-elect the president. But times change, and different challenges require new leadership,” he said, noting that he keeps hearing from people that new leadership is necessary.

He also fired back at a Wall Street Journal editorial published Sunday that went after his gubernatorial record.

“Mr. O’Malley may attract some Democrats as an alternative to Clintonian inevitability and cynicism, but he has little chance at the nomination unless Mrs. Clinton unexpectedly washes out, and then other Democrats would join the race. Republicans would be only too happy to run against the Maryland progressive model,” the editorial said.

O’Malley touted his leadership of the state, mentioning the state’s Triple-A bond rating, the best public schools in America, the highest median income of any state, and a better rate of job creation than neighboring states.

O'Malley, stumping in N.H., sells himself as alternative to Clinton // Baltimore Sun // John Fritze – May 31, 2015

Attempting to push back on the idea that his presidential campaign is a nearly insurmountable long shot, Martin O'Malley arrived in New Hampshire on Sunday to sell himself as a fresh voice and progressive alternative to front-runner Hillary Clinton.

Visiting the key presidential primary state a day after announcing his long-expected candidacy in Baltimore, the former two-term Maryland governor used phrases like "new leadership" and "trying different things" almost immediately upon hitting the ground here — and it was a theme he repeatedly returned to throughout the day.

As he spoke with voters at a diner, addressed a small house party and delivered pizza to Dartmouth College students on the eve of their finals, O'Malley engaged in exactly the kind of retail politicking analysts say he needs to perfect in order to climb out of the single-digits in polls.

"I've always been drawn to the toughest of fights," O'Malley told a group gathered in Gilford, N.H., recounting his first run for mayor in 1999.

"The people I've met in New Hampshire refuse to be intimidated by big money, pundits, or the concentration of power [and] insisted on meeting every candidate, looking them in the eye, asking them questions and making up their own mind," he said.

O'Malley is far less well known than either Clinton or Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, the self-described democratic socialist who has carved out space on Clinton's left since announcing his own campaign in April. Perhaps because of that, O'Malley made himself perpetually available as he traveled the state — to voters, to elected officials and to reporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The informal, less scripted interactions stood in contrast to the view of O'Malley many have seen in national television appearances and the sometimes stilted speeches he has delivered during his career.

After eating a few spoonfuls of a cup of Milky Way ice cream, O'Malley worked a small crowd gathered inside the Goldenrod Drive-In Restaurant in Manchester. He walked from table to table, fielding questions on college affordability, the economy and the country's nuclear posture.

His message appeared to resonate with several people in the room.

"I don't think Hillary's a lock," said Peter Morin, a 55-year-old Manchester resident after speaking briefly with O'Malley. "I don't like to see anyone anointed."

But whether O'Malley's focus on his past executive leadership or his increasingly strong admonishments of Wall Street will be enough to build momentum for his campaign is an open question. More than 60 percent of Democrats in New Hampshire identified Clinton as their first choice in a Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm poll in early May.

O'Malley was the first choice for 3 percent.

The former governor spoke with several dozen Democrats gathered at the home of Jerry Slagle, a Maryland native who worked with O'Malley on Gary Hart's 1984 presidential campaign. He stuck mainly to lines from his announcement speech, but also took questions from attendees.

As he spoke from atop a piano bench —- so he could be heard in the back of the room — O'Malley did not mention Clinton or Sanders directly. But he addressed both of his declared rivals with subtle political code.

To draw a distinction with Clinton — a former secretary of state, senator and first lady — O'Malley repeatedly described himself as a next-generation leader and argued that elections should not be coronations for political royalty. To distance himself from Sanders, he notes he hasn't "just talked about" liberal ideals, but has achieved them.

O'Malley announced his presidential campaign in Federal Hill Park on Saturday, entering a race many believe he has been considering for years. During his address, O'Malley cast the election in broad economic terms, suggesting middle class families have not benefited from the recovery as much as they should have.

He reiterated that point in an interview on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday, while also suggesting he is no friend of Wall Street.

"I don't know what Secretary Clinton's approach to Wall Street might be. She will run her own campaign and I will run mine," O'Malley said. "I can tell you this. I am not beholden to Wall Street interests. There are no Wall Street CEOs banging down my door and trying to participate or help my campaign."

Another presidential candidate with Maryland ties, former Johns Hopkins neurosurgeon Ben Carson, also spoke on the program. The Republican was asked about a national poll that showed him tied for first place for his party's nomination with former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Whether I'm a front-runner or not doesn't matter," Carson said. "What matters is that the people themselves are starting to listen and evaluate for themselves rather than listening to what people say I said and what people say that I meant."

O'Malley will spend significant time in early primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. That's partly because the Iowa caucuses dramatically shifted the course of the race for the Democratic nomination in 2008, when then-Sen. Barack Obama upset Clinton there by running as a change candidate.

The trip Sunday was O'Malley's fourth to New Hampshire this year.

Patrick Gosselin, a Hooksett, N.H., resident, wondered whether O'Malley couldn't do the same next year. Gosselin spoke with the former governor at the diner for several minutes before revealing that he had come to hear him speak despite never before voting for a Democrat.

"I'm tired of the old politics, tired of the Democrats and Republicans getting entrenched with their old ideas," Gosselin said as O'Malley walked away. "It just seems like he has the right personality to challenge the status quo, to challenge Hillary."

Martin O'Malley is targeting Latino voters // WaPo // Arelis H. Hernández – June 1, 2015

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley is making a special effort to target Latino voters during the first week of his presidential campaign, appearing on the Spanish-language television channel Univision, offering interviews on immigration policy to major news outlets and speaking to the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

"I believe Latino Americans, like all Americans, want the American Dream to be truthful and real," O'Malley (D) told The Washington Post on Monday. "I believe my record speaks to my heart."

Immigration is among the issues where O'Malley has sought to draw distinctions between himself and Hillary Rodham Clinton, the overwhelming front-runner in the Democratic primary race. While he was governor, Maryland passed its version of the Dream Act, which extended in-state tuition benefits to undocumented immigrants at public universities and colleges provided their families meet certain conditions. The state also adopted a two-tiered system that allows undocumented immigrants to get limited driver's licenses that can't be used for other purposes, such as boarding an airplane.

During the battle over the state's adoption of the Dream Act, "we met every week with O'Malley," said Gustavo Torres, executive director of the advocacy group CASA of Maryland.

In April, after Clinton announced her support for providing immigrants with limited driver's licenses, O'Malley said he was "glad she's come around to that position now, too." He declined on Monday to name specific differences between himself and other Democratic presidential candidates, saying only that "the distinctions will be made clear."

O'Malley said that as president he would "forge a new consensus" and revisit the criteria used by law enforcement to lock-up and deport immigrants — a sticking point for immigrant advocacy groups who have criticized the Obama administration's record number of deportations.

In a brief interview with Maria Elena Salinas -- the well-known anchor on Univision, the nation's largest Spanish-language news network -- O'Malley said he doesn't think any candidate can win the White House "without the Latino vote." Asked what he would want to say to Spanish-speaking voters, O'Malley replied: "Por favor," or please. The rest of the interview with Salinas will air on Univision on Sunday.

On Wednesday, O'Malley is scheduled to participate in a question-and-answer session with Hispanic Chamber of Commerce president Javier Palomarez at the Newseum in Washington. The event is the latest in a series of forums with presidential candidates hosted by the organization, which says it represents 3.2 million Hispanic business owners.

O'Malley recently hired Gabriela Domenzain, director of Hispanic media for Obama's 2012 campaign, as his director of public engagement. His campaign launch on Saturday included remarks from Jonathan Jayes-Green, who worked on the governor's Hispanic affairs commission and is the son of undocumented immigrants.

Jayes-Green said his family came to the United States from Panama in 2005 and, after receiving erroneous legal advice, overstayed their visas and became undocumented. O'Malley, he added, "understands we are Americans, we just don't have documentation yet."

Last summer, O'Malley clashed with the White House last summer over what to do with migrant children streaming over the border from Central America, accusing the Obama administration — in which Clinton had served — of being too eager to return the children.

"When refugee children arrive on our doorstep, fleeing starvation and death gangs, we don't turn them away," O'Malley said in South Carolina in April. "We act like the generous, compassionate people we have always been."

At his launch on Saturday, he said "the enduring symbol of our nation is not a barbed wire fence, it is the Statue of Liberty."

When he talks about immigration, O'Malley recalls his own family history of coming to this country from Ireland. As governor, he kept an old sign in his office that says, "No Irish Need Apply."

"I have always seen, in the eyes of my Latino neighbors, the eyes of the great grandparents I never met," he said on Monday.

Martin O'Malley's ritzy taste can be off-putting // Page Six // Richard Johnson – June 1, 2015

Martin O'Malley's minions need a primer on populism.

When the Democratic presidential candidate's team tried to woo Allen Roskoff, president of the powerful Jim Owles Democratic Club, they invited the gay activist to breakfast at Norma's at Le Parker Meridien, where only the 1 percent of tourists can afford to nosh.

Oatmeal is $19, French toast goes for $25 and "The Zillion Dollar Lobster Frittata" — with 10 oz. of Sevruga caviar — costs $1,000. The menu notes: "Norma dares you to expense this."

Roskoff told me, “Trying to woo a ’60s lefty with a breakfast that could feed a homeless shelter was extremely dumb.” He’s leaning toward socialist Bernie Sanders.

Martin O'Malley: 2016 Democratic Candidate Says, 'We Need to Get Things Done Again' // ABC News // Maryalice Parks – June 1, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who announced Saturday that he will officially seek the Democratic Party's nomination for president, continued trying to separate himself from frontrunner Hillary Clinton, telling ABC News Chief Anchor George Stephanopoulos during an exclusive interview Monday morning that the "times have changed" and pointing to the 2008 crash on Wall Street as evidence for the country needing a new generation of leadership.

On the campaign trail, O'Malley has attacked Clinton for what he says is a close relationship to Wall Street.

O'Malley told Stephanopoulos that the "people of the United States, not Wall Street," should to decide the next president, and leaders on Wall Street allegedly seeming OK with a Clinton or a Bush in the White House should be "wake-up call for all of us."

In 2008, O'Malley supported Clinton's first run for president, a fact that former Obama adviser and campaign strategist David Axelrod noted this week on Twitter, saying, "O'Malley is a dynamic, accomplished guy. But he was all in for HRC [Hillary Rodham Clinton] in '08, so isn't it a bit awkward to rail against 'royal families' now."

O'Malley responded by saying the country faces "different challenges now." He told Stephanopoulos the most notable difference between then and now was the 2008 economic crash, adding that since then the country had failed to reign in the "excess of Wall Street."

"I believe we need new leadership," he said. "We need to get things done again."

He said that he called Clinton this week and said he told her he was looking forward to "a robust conversation about the issues that face our country."

O'Malley emphasized his experience as an executive, having served two terms as mayor of Baltimore and two terms as governor of Maryland. In response to criticism in the Wall Street Journal today that he raised taxes, O'Malley argued that the state enjoyed its highest median income while he was governor and had a AAA bond rating. He added that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which "hardly ever says nice things about Democratic elected officials anywhere," named Maryland No. 1 in innovation and entrepreneurship three years in a row.

For fans of his other talents -- singing and playing guitar -- O'Malley said stay tuned.

"When I go through Iowa and New Hampshire, guitars seem to fall out of the rafters," he joked, saying that supporters can expect to see him strumming again soon.

Martin O'Malley's Hometown Challenge // ABC News // Maryalice Parks – May 31, 2015

Martin O'Malley faces an uphill battle. The former Maryland governor and Baltimore mayor who officially announced his run for the Democratic presidential nomination Saturday is relatively unknown nationwide, polling around 1 percent among Democratic voters across the country, according to a new poll from Quinnipiac University this week. But perhaps his greatest challenge comes from his own backyard.

During his campaign kickoff event Saturday in downtown Baltimore, a small group of protesters made a scene, speaking out against police brutality and blaming O'Malley for what they see as the negative consequences of his tough stance on crime.

"If he wants to be president, if he wants to come home, he must atone," said Tawanda Jones, one of the protesters. "Our streets are not even safe no more, because of all of the anger in our city."

Gov. Martin O’Malley Announces Run for President

O’Malley Cites Executive Experience in Comparison to Obama

When he first ran for mayor of Baltimore in 1999, O'Malley promised to cut crime, and when he came into office he instituted a zero-tolerance policing policy. Supporters say that while arrests went up, even for minor offenses, crime came down.

But critics say his methods harmed the relationship between the city's residents and law enforcement.

In an exclusive interview with ABC News' Chief Anchor George Stephanopoulos, O'Malley defended his reputation. "I would not have been elected with 91 percent of the vote first time, or re-elected four years later with 88 percent of the vote, if we were not making substantial progress," he said.

"When I was elected in 1999, our city had become the most violent, and addicted, and abandoned city in America. It was a huge challenge. But we went on in the next ten years to achieve the biggest reduction of part one [or serious] crime of any city in America," he continued. "For all of the progress that we make, there's always so much more that needs to be done."

Last month the violent protests in Baltimore after the death of an African-American man at the hands of police reignited criticism of O'Malley's policies. And in a front page article in the Baltimore Sun the day of O'Malley's campaign kickoff event, a former head of the city's NAACP chapter hit the former mayor hard, saying, "He's going around now like [Baltimore] is his claim to fame. I think this should be his greatest embarrassment."

O'Malley called the unrest in Baltimore last month "heartbreaking" and said the country should learn from Baltimore and focus on issues like unemployment and poverty to rebuild American cities.

"What took place here was not only about race, not only about policing in America. It's about everything it is supposed to mean to be an American," he said during Saturday's rally. "The scourge of hopelessness that happened to ignite here that evening transcends race or geography. The hard truth of our shared reality is this: Unemployment in many American cities and in many small towns across the United States is higher now than it was eight years ago.”

He told Stephanopoulos, "A poet once wrote that the unemployment in our bones erupts in our hands and stones. We can do better as a country.”

Prior to leaving office as governor in October, O'Malley's approval ratings in Maryland were at an eight-year low (41 percent, according to a Washington Post poll), though his presidential announcement rally was full of energetic elected officials and supporters from across the state.

One fan, Baltimore City Councilwoman Rikki Spector, brought a rock with the word "Believe" etched in it as a gift for the governor.

Martin O'Malley, mild-mannered man: Why the media are yawning // Fox News // Howard Kurtz – June 1, 2015

On paper, Martin O'Malley should be a serious contender for the Democratic presidential nomination.

But on paper, the Washington Nationals should have won last year's World Series. And campaigns, like sporting contests, have to be fought in the real world.

And in that world, O'Malley is basically an asterisk—or at least being treated that way by the media. His official announcement on Saturday didn't make much of a pop.

The man was a two-term governor of Maryland and spent seven years as Baltimore mayor, but hardly anyone knows who he is. I've interviewed him and gone to his events and he's very fluent in policy, but the few outside politics who are familiar with him know him mainly as the model for a character in "The Wire."

His announcement in Baltimore on Saturday, delivered in shirtsleeves, hit all the liberal talking points, but O'Malley has a way of just reading his speeches and there were few emotional high points.

His media drought is partly because Hillary Clinton is a million miles ahead. It's partly because Bernie Sanders—who might be viewed as more of a gadfly candidate—has stolen the spotlight. And it's partly his own fault.

O'Malley is a careful and cautious guy, and that doesn't make him an inspiring figure. He has been highly reticent about attacking Hillary, limiting himself to some veiled jabs. And when you do that, you forfeit the coverage you might otherwise get for taking on the front-runner. And you fuel suspicions that you're just running to raise your profile and maybe land a job in the next administration.

Here's how the liberal New Republic puts it:

"Martin O'Malley has checked enough boxes as a prominent Democrat—big city mayor, mostly successful governor, chairman of the Democratic Governors Association—that he probably didn't expect to be trailing in presidential polls to a Vermont senator who serves as an independent and identifies as a democratic socialist. But for now he does trail, and pretty badly. O'Malley is more dependably liberal than Hillary Clinton has been, but the emergence of a crusading progressive like Bernie Sanders has convinced some analysts that O'Malley miscalculated, and let Sanders steal his thunder."

Sanders may be a socialist, but he feels like the leader of a crusade. O'Malley feels like the head of a good-government association.

And with Sanders polling as high as 15 percent and O'Malley stuck around 1 percent, it's all too easy for the press to write him off as a loser—especially since his lieutenant governor lost the race last fall to Republican Larry Hogan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Why do some progressives tend to dismiss him as a mere technocrat who doesn't inspire?" Politico asks. It's in part because he's a policy wonk and not a great speaker, as those watching the 2012 Democratic convention may remember.

The ex-mayor has the additional burden of being closely identified with Baltimore just as Baltimore has become identified with Freddie Gray, rioting and surging crime—and questions about O'Malley's zero-tolerance police strategy are being revived. He went to the city after the riots but didn't make much of an imprint on the national conversation. Even some of his longtime allies in the state aren't backing him.

One Baltimore Sun columnist is a big booster:

"Mr. O'Malley, unlike Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush, isn't linked to perpetual scandal and criticism, nor is he beholden to foreign donors, investment banks or a family surname."

Perhaps O'Malley, who worked for Gary Hart in 1984, envisions catching fire if Hillary stumbles. But he's going to have to raise the temperature for that to happen.

What are Martin O'Malley's chances of being Mr. Liberal 2016? // Yahoo News // Peter Grier – June 1, 2015

Elizabeth Warren isn't running. The left has tried and tried, but the anti-Wall Street firebrand senator from Massachusetts just isn't going to challenge Hillary Clinton for the Democratic Party presidential nomination. Progressives have moved on, for the most part. They're looking for another standard-bearer. So who's going to end up as Mr. (or Ms.) Liberal 2016?

Bill de Blasio seems to be auditioning for the role. The New York City mayor has lately had an active national travel schedule. But his quest seems quixotic – he's only been in office 16 months. Plus, he's got troubles back home.

Martin O'Malley might be more likely. He announced his run Saturday, and he's going to try and position himself to Mrs. Clinton's left. The former Maryland governor had a quiet meeting with a group of key progressives in New York City in May and promoted himself as Warren-like, but actually in the race. He said he opposes President Obama's Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal. That's a litmus test for liberals.

But as far as the left is concerned Mr. O'Malley might be a Martin-come-lately. His ideology seemed more moderate when he served as governor, which is unsurprising since state chief executives have to be pragmatic, even in a blue state. Then there's O'Malley's charisma gap. When you hear him speak, "firebrand" isn't a word that comes to mind, as it does with Ms. Warren.

So we'll go with the safe choice here: Bernie Sanders. The white-haired, articulate Vermont senator seems the favorite to win liberals' hearts. He's already declared his presidential intentions, and he's long resided at the left edge of the Democratic Party – or just beyond it. He's the only sitting US lawmaker who uses the word "socialist" to describe himself.

Mr. Sanders's liberal bent was on full display in a recent Reddit Q-and-A. He wants public college education to be tuition-free. He said National Security Agency surveillance was “Orwellian” and that the country needs a constitutional amendment to limit political campaign contributions. He advocated a guaranteed basic income and said climate change “is the most significant planetary crisis we face.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders is running at nearly 9 percent in HuffPost Pollster’s rolling average of Democratic nomination surveys. O’Malley gets about 2 percent. It’s early, but we’d say that’s indicative.

New Evidence That Bernie Sanders Is Gaining Ground in One Key State // Policy.Mic // Zeeshan Aleem – June 1, 2015

Presidential hopeful Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is conventionally considered to be a long-shot candidate for the Democratic nomination. But there are new signs that his message has been resonating in the crucial state of Iowa since kicking off his campaign in Burlington, Vermont, last week.

According to the New York Times, the hard-charging populist from Vermont can already claim a noteworthy achievement. Last week, he attracted a crowd of 700 people in Davenport, Iowa, in what the New York Times notes is the "the largest rally in the state for any single candidate this campaign season, and far more than the 50 people who attended a rally there on Saturday with former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland."

Sanders also generated other lively turnouts in the state on his first visit to Iowa since declaring his candidacy. In Ames, he drew a crowd that spilled out of a brewery, and held an event in Kensett where the size of the crowd exceeded the population of the town itself, according to the New York Times.

The spike in attention is reflected in recent polling. According to a new Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register poll of Iowa voters, Sanders has more than tripled his support among likely Democratic caucus-goers than he was in January, with 16% of likely caucus-goers saying Sanders is their first choice.

As you can see in the chart below, courtesy of Bloomberg Politics, Clinton is dominant among likely Democratic caucus-goers in Iowa — she's the first choice for 57% (one percentage point more than in January). Sanders ranks second at 16% — still far from Clinton, but notable for the leap from 5% in January. Vice President Joe Biden, who has not made any overt signals that he's considering a bid for the White House, came in next at 8%. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley was the first choice for 2%, as was former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb.

The Iowa caucuses, which are scheduled to be held in February, are the first contest of the presidential race, and mark a critical juncture for determining momentum in the early stages of the nomination race. Given that the voting is several months away, the specific numbers right now aren't as important as their changes.

Sanders' big bump in recent months reflects a hunger among the Democratic electorate for a candidate who can serve as an alternative to the Clinton dynasty. The self-avowed democratic socialist doesn't have a history in the national spotlight, but he is the king of Reddit, and he has quickly taken the anti-establishment mantle from Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, who shows no signs of interest in running for president.

Sanders still has his work cut out for him. While Clinton's campaign already has 30 paid staffers devoted to mobilizing caucus-goers in Iowa, Sanders only has two, according to the New York Times. If Sanders is to evolve into a formidable player, his organizing apparatus will have to match the size of his ambitions.

Toward that end, Sanders has called for additional early presidential debates this year, which would include both Democrats and Republicans. The debates would provide him with a major (and free) opportunity to make his case to the public in direct contrast to Clinton, and facilitate his ability to shed the label of outsider nipping at the heels of an inevitable heir to the throne. According to the Huffington Post, any such debates might be in violation of debate rules for Democratic candidates. Clinton is unlikely to benefit from such an arrangement, and her strategy so far has largely been to ignore Sanders' criticism. But as she knows all too well from 2008, she can never take her lead for granted.

Bernie Sanders pleads for more debates // Politico // Dylan Byers – June 1, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders has sent a letter to the Democratic National Committee requesting more primary debates, including inter-party debates among candidates from both parties.

In a letter to DNC Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz, the Vermont socialist argued that the candidates "should engage in a series of debates beginning this summer," in order to increase voter turnout. Inter-party debates could also be used to convince registered Republican voters that they would be better off voting for a Democrat, Sanders said.

"I am extremely concerned by the fact that many working-class Americans are voting against their best economic interests by supporting right-wing Republicans whose agenda represents the interests of the billionaire class, and not the needs of working Americans," Sanders wrote. "I believe that these inter-party debates would put in dramatic focus the shallow and at times ridiculous policies and proposals being advocated by the Republican candidates and by their party's platform."

For Sanders, a relatively little-known candidate with limited resources, more debates would mean more free air time and publicity. Sanders is currently polling 54.8 points behind Hillary Clinton in the latest RealClearPolitics aggregate.

In an email to the On Media blog, DNC spokesperson Holly Shulman effectively put the kibosh on Sanders' request: "We're thrilled to see the Senator is eager to participate in our debates," she wrote. "We've already released our primary debate framework, and we believe that six debates will give plenty of opportunity for the candidates to be seen side-by-side. We'll have more details in the coming weeks, and we look forward to Senator Sanders and other candidates participating. I'm sure there will be plenty of other forums for the candidates to make their case to voters, and that they will make the most out of every opportunity."

The DNC has sanctioned six primary debates for the 2016 cycle, which are scheduled to begin this fall. Host states will include the early caucus and primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina, though the committee has yet to announce which national broadcast media and local media outlets will sponsor and moderate these debates.

Both the Hillary Clinton and Martin O'Malley campaigns have confirmed that their candidates will participate in all six of the debates.

In his plea for more debates, Sanders argued that low voter turnout "has hurt progressive candidates all across our nation" and that "a larger number of debates beginning in the weeks ahead would encourage such voter participation."

Sanders also said inter-party debates between Democrats and Republicans would "serve to engage large numbers of voters who typically do not pay attention to the process until much later when the general election begins to come into focus. By engaging these voters early and raising the stakes around the election I believe we can get people to participate at higher levels which will undoubtedly benefit Democrats up and down the ticket."

Lindsey Graham on the Issues // NYT // Gerry Mullany- June 1, 2015

Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina announced Monday that he plans to seek the Republican nomination for president. In his three terms, he has focused on military and foreign affairs and developed a reputation for working together with Senate Democrats. Here are some of Mr. Graham's stands on important issues.

Foreign Policy

Mr. Graham has been skeptical of President Obama's efforts to reach a deal with Iran over its nuclear program, saying Congress should reject any agreement that does not include inspections of Iran's military facilities. He sees the group calling itself the Islamic State as a threat to the mainland United States, saying "the likelihood of an attack against our nation is growing by the day" and calling it a "fantasy" to think that it can be defeated without American ground forces. Describing Israel as the "best friend" of the United States, Mr. Graham has vowed that if the United Nations takes actions against Israel's interest he will use his powers in Congress to cut Washington's financial support of the organization. He has said the United States should provide lethal weaponry to the Ukrainian military to battle Russian-backed separatists, a step the Obama administration has resisted.

Environment

Unlike other Republican presidential contenders, Mr. Graham believes that climate change is a problem and that it is caused by human activity. But he is concerned about using federal laws to curb greenhouse-gas emissions, saying he wants to make an issue of whether "you have to destroy the economy to solve the problem" of global warming.

Same-Sex Marriage

He has supported a constitutional amendment defining marriage as between a man and a woman. Mr. Graham has spoken out against the possibility that the Supreme Court could strike down same-sex marriage bans, saying: "What's the legal difference between a ban on same-sex marriage being unconstitutional but a ban on polygamy being constitutional?"

Immigration

Mr. Graham differs from many of his fellow Republican contenders in that he is a strong proponent of making it possible for immigrants who are in the country illegally to become citizens. "If I were president of the United States, I would veto any bill that did not have a pathway to citizenship," he told USA Today, adding: "You would have a long, hard path to citizenship." He says Republicans have been losing Hispanic support because of hostility toward immigrants.

Economy and Budget Issues

Mr. Graham supported giving Mr. Obama "fast track" authority to negotiate the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal. He opposed the president's $789 billion stimulus package in 2009. He believes the federal government's debt limit should be increased only when that is accompanied by spending cuts, but he has not ruled out tax increases, as many other Republicans have.

Lindsey Graham, in announcing White House run, gets personal // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 1, 2015

CENTRAL, S.C. — He's spent a third of his life in Congress and is a fixture on the Sunday morning news-show circuit, making nearly 70 appearances in the past five years.

But as he announced his presidential bid Monday here in the tiny town where he grew up, Lindsey Graham sought to knock down the idea that he's a creature of Washington and instead told a personal story that's largely been overlooked over the course of his two decades in the House and Senate.

It's the tale of a son of pool-hall owners, who grew up near-impoverished in the back room of his parents' bar. As a college student, he raised, and eventually adopted, his little sister after their parents died, before going on to have a career as an Air Force lawyer and then rising to become South Carolina's senior senator.

"Those of you who've known me a long time know I had some ups and downs as a young man," he said. "I lost my parents, and had to struggle financially and emotionally … There are a lot of so-called 'self-made' people in this world. I'm not one of them. My family, friends, neighbors and my faith picked me up when I was down, believed in me when I had doubts. You made me the man I am today."

Graham's sister, Darline Graham Nordone, spoke proudly of her brother and late parents during a brief interview Sunday night before Graham's walk-through.

"Our parents were small-business owners here in the town of Central," she said. "As any other small-business owners, they understood the long hard hours that go into running a small business, and just the strong work ethic that we got from that and the values … It's just amazing that we come from this and went on to bigger and better things, but our roots are here."

The humble-origins narrative is a staple of presidential campaigning, but it's a fairly new device for Graham, who has only started to employ it in recent years. It wasn't until his 2014 Senate race, when he squared off with six primary challengers, that he slowly and sometimes reluctantly began to use that part of his biography in part to fight back against criticism that he had been in Washington too long.

Now, as a long-shot presidential candidate, Graham once again told that story in this sleepy speck of a town located about 45 minutes from Greenville, where Main Street consists of a thrift shop, a hair salon, and a restaurant or two — including the remnants of the Graham family's bar.

"I think it's a good idea for people to realize, he's certainly a self-educated, self-made guy," said Hank Scott, a major donor who is very close to Graham. "He worked hard to get where he is, he's not a person that grew up with privilege, like, say, [Jeb] Bush."

David Woodard, an operative and professor who managed Graham's first two House races in the 1990s, said he never heard Graham talk about his family's troubles, even when those issues were fresher for him.

"Did he talk about it? No, he never talked about it," Woodard said, adding later, "He's kind of a self-made story, but he didn't talk about it."

During his reelection last year, after some reluctance about getting too personal, Graham allowed his team to run an ad featuring his sister, Darline, who grew emotional in the spot when she reflected on how Graham helped raise her.

“It was hard when we lost my mom and my dad,” she said in the ad. “Lindsey assured me that he was going to take care of me, he was going to be there for me. He never let me down. Never. I don’t see how he did it, to take on the responsibility of raising a little sister. That came from within for Lindsey.”

Graham won that race just as he’s won every congressional contest in which he’s run, starting in 1994, many of them with the help of South Carolina’s top political talent. Yet as he begins his run for president, many of them are not on board. When he indicated he was serious about running for president, many of the state’s most well-respected operatives were caught off guard —and had already agreed to help other candidates.

“I’ve been involved in all of his Senate campaigns, and it was tough, but my ship has sailed,” said J. Warren Tompkins, a veteran South Carolina operative who is committed to Florida Sen. Marco Rubio. “I had committed long before I had any inkling he had any interest in running for president.”

In some state political circles, even where Graham is popular, there’s a sense of bewilderment about why he’s running — and some donors and operatives say privately that they wish he’d stick to the Senate. In a very crowded Republican field, Graham barely registers in the national polls; he has low name identification and his record on issues like immigration reform is still anathema to the grassroots conservative voters who are so critical in early-voting states like Iowa.

“I’ll always be supporting Lindsey any and every way I can,” said Scott, the donor, whose own divided loyalty is revealing — he says he’s supporting both his friend and Rubio. Noting how crowded the field is, “I tried to encourage him to play the Strom Thurmond role and stay in the Senate,” Scott added.

In his announcement speech Monday, Graham highlighted his national security credentials, another reminder that pushing a more assertive foreign policy is the core rationale for his run.

“I want to be president to defeat the enemies trying to kill us, not just penalize them or criticize them or contain them, but defeat them,” he said.

It’s unclear how well Graham is polling in South Carolina presidential surveys —an NBC News poll from February found him leading the pack but an April poll from local Winthrop University reported that more than half of his home state GOP voters would not considering voting for him for the nomination.

His South Carolina political colleagues aren’t lined up behind him either: GOP Gov. Nikki Haley has said she won’t be making any early endorsements and several of the state’s House members appeared at a presidential launch event for Rand Paul — Graham’s nemesis on foreign policy matters — though they stopped short of endorsing.

Graham’s supporters believe he will play a key role in pushing national security issues to the forefront, and that the senator — who at Republican cattle calls so far this year has impressed with his sense of humor and command of foreign policy — will expand his base as more people get to know him. He’s a natural, folksy campaigner and his hawkish foreign policy message plays well with a Republican base that’s grown increasingly anxious about instability in the Middle East and the rise of ISIS.

Despite the seemingly impossible path to the GOP nomination, Graham’s allies insist he is seriously interested in pursuing a White House bid and wouldn’t run if he didn’t see a path to victory, even as speculation abounds in South Carolina about whether he’s positioning for another job, like secretary of defense, or to be a kingmaker during the first-in-the-South South Carolina primary.

In the meantime, a super PAC supporting Graham, Security is Strength, is also gearing up and announced its staff over the weekend. It is largely driven by former Graham campaign and Senate staffers, and also includes former Minnesota Sen. Norm Coleman. Graham is a favorite of hawkish donors — mega-donor Sheldon Adelson co-hosted a fundraiser on Capitol Hill for him several months ago, and plenty of people aligned with other candidates showed up and even served on the host committee.

For Graham, the uphill climb ahead was obvious on Sunday night: a handful of interested bystanders who appeared in Central before Graham's walk-through said they supported him in his Senate bid — but none was ready to commit to him for president yet.

Graham Begins Foreign Policy-Focused Bid // Bloomberg // Mark Halperin – June 1, 2015

Style: Played the self-effacing hometown boy, keeping up his colloquial style even when talking about fearsome international threats. Quite low-energy for an announcement speech, although the typical Southern crowd whooped, cheered, and applauded throughout, allowing Graham to piggyback on their liveliness. Kept unscripted asides to a minimum (for him).

Substance: Heavy rhetorical emphasis on signature issues such as fighting terror, building alliances around the world, and enacting entitlement reform, but not much specifics there or anywhere else.

Best moment: Jazzed the audience by declaring he has more foreign policy experience than everyone else in the race, including Hillary Clinton.

Worst moment: Lapsed into reading his text for several minutes in the middle of his remarks, further sapping momentum.

Overall: The national security candidate chose to make national security the center of his announcement by starting with it, seeding it throughout, and ending with it. While he talked about working with Democrats, he didn't emphasize his past efforts on immigration reform and climate change, which have put him out of step with the party base. Instead, he focused on his long-time fidelity to the three-legged Reagan stool of national security, social issues, and the economy. The whole event felt more like a personal moment for Graham than the launching of a national movement, and he did not summon the determined air of someone who thinks he can actually win. Still, it was a well-written speech, and he can move on to life as an official candidate, where fundraising and poll challenges await.

Style: B- Substance: B- Overall: B-

Note: The overall grade is not an average of the style and substance grades, but takes into account other aspects of the announcement, such as staging and crowd reaction. In addition, a candidate's overall grade reflects the degree to which the candidate's standing in the race is improved by the event and performance.

Lindsey Graham has a plan to win the GOP nomination. If it works, it'd be a first. // WaPo // Jose A. DelReal – June 1, 2015

As a native South Carolinian, GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham's candidacy could shake up that early-voting state's primary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But that's not the same thing as shaking up the presidential race.

Graham certainly carries an advantage in The Palmetto State, where his name recognition is nearly universal after having serving the state as U.S. senator for more than 12 years. And a February NBC News/Marist poll of South Carolina voters showed Graham leading the GOP pack with 17 percent support. Former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R) followed Graham with 15 percent, while Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) placed third with 12 percent.*

“For a guy like me, it’s pretty simple,” Graham recently told Time Magazine. “I do well in Iowa and finish in the top tier in New Hampshire, I’ll win South Carolina. By the end of South Carolina there are three or four people left at the most.”

In other words, the strategy is: 1) Don't tank in Iowa or New Hampshire. 2) Come in strong in the home state. 3) ???

As of now, Graham is barely registering in polls anywhere else, including states he would need to compete in in the later stages of the Republican primary process. But let's start with Step 1.

A WMUR Granite State poll of likely New Hampshire voters has him far behind most of his would-be rivals, carrying the support of just around 1 percent of primary voters. For context, former Florida governor Jeb Bush leads the pack with 15 percent. Meanwhile, even longshot candidate Donald Trump has 5 percent.

And in Iowa, Graham is the first-choice candidate for just 1 percent of likely GOP voters, according to a May Des Moines Register poll. He completely fails to register in another poll by Quinnipiac.

History doesn't seem to be on Graham's side either. Presidential candidates who hail from early voting states have frequently failed to make a splash nationwide and have also occasionally been met with resistance from in-state allies who fear their state's primary could be rendered irrelevant by a home grown contender.

Put another way: in the modern era, there has never been a presidential nominee who hailed from Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, or Nevada.

Consider former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, who made a short-lived run for the 2008 Democratic nomination but quickly dropped out of the race – ending his campaign in February of 2007. Though Vilsack stood a strong chance of winning the caucuses if he had stayed in the race, Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama’s fundraising strength proved to be an intractable challenge nationwide. For what it's worth, The Iowa Democratic Party responded to Vilsack's candidacy by promising to remain neutral for fear that Vilsack’s candidacy would discourage candidates from competing in the state.

When former New Hampshire senator Bob Smith ran for the 2000 GOP nomination – also as a longshot – New Hampshire Republicans balked at the thought of the Granite State losing its sacred status as a must-compete contest. He too dropped out before the primaries actually began.

Iowa's Tom Harkin, who retired from the Senate last year, ran for the Democratic nomination in 1992 and swept the Iowa contest, receiving the support of nearly 80 percent of caucusgoers. But in New Hampshire the next week, Harkin took just 10 percent of the vote.

Of course, Graham's candidacy will largely rest on his clearly-defined, hawkish foreign policy positions in an election where foreign affairs have already taken center stage. That could bode well for him, particularly as Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul's strong critique of GOP hawks presents a headline-grabbing foil for Graham to pit himself against.

*The NBC News/Marist survey of 450 likely South Carolina GOP voters has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.6 percentage points.

The WMUR survey of 293 likely GOP primary voters has a margin of error of plus or minus 5.7 percent.

That survey of 402 likely caucusgoers was conducted between May 25 to May 29 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percentage points.

Lindsey Graham joins crowded 2016 presidential field // MSNBC // Benjy Sarlin – June 1, 2015

CENTRAL, South Carolina – Warning that "the world is exploding in terror and violence," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) announced a long-shot presidential campaign in his small home town on Monday predicated on aggressively confronting threats from the Islamic State and Iran abroad.

"I'm pretty sure no one here, including me, ever expected to hear me say, 'I'm Lindsey Graham, and I'm running for president of the United States,'" he told a cheering crowd of dozens of flag-waving supporters gathered just steps from the former pool hall on Main Street that he grew up in.

It's hard to talk about Graham's candidacy without mentioning his ideological archrival, Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), whose libertarian approach to civil liberties, dovish take on military conflict and deep skepticism of an active foreign policy runs directly counter to the South Carolina lawmaker's own stance.

"I want to be president to defeat the enemies that are trying to kill us," Graham said in his announcement.

Both candidates seem eager to play the mongoose to the other's snake as the 2016 presidential campaign heats up. Their conflict reached its peak in recent days after Paul successfully forced the temporary expiration of PATRIOT Act provisions that govern, among other things, the phone record spy program revealed by Edward Snowden. Graham favors a maximalist approach to counterterrorism.

Paul frequently fires up supporters by quoting Graham's latest jingoisms on the trail – this week he criticized Graham's boast that he would drone strike an American citizen suspected of terrorism rather than "call a judge." During Paul's PATRIOT Act filibuster, Graham gave an eye roll worthy of the surliest teenager and a clip of it from a live C-Span broadcast went viral. Paul went on to lambast the "eye roll caucus" in an e-mail to supporters last week and a pro-Paul super PAC responded with a web ad going after Graham.

Graham didn't mention Paul directly in his announcement Monday, but he alluded to conflicts with rival lawmakers back in Washington.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We’ve made some dangerous mistakes in recent years,” Graham said. “The Obama administration and some of my colleagues in Congress have substituted wishful thinking for sound national security strategy.”

Graham boasted that he has “more experience with our national security then any other candidate in this race – that includes you, Hillary.”

The tension put USC senior Anna Chapman, 21, in an awkward spot. A devoted Paul supporter, she volunteered at the event as a favor to her fellow College Republicans.

“I’m here to support Graham … kind of,” she said. “He is from South Carolina, it’s cool that he’s running. I’m not going to bash him, but I don’t think he’s going to win the nomination.”

Foreign affairs may be Graham’s calling card, but it’s hardly all he’s known for. At times he has split from GOP conservatives to broker bipartisan deals, most notably as co-author of the immigration reform bill that passed the Senate in 2013 but never came up for a vote in the House amid intense conservative opposition. Graham’s speech included a message for fellow Democrats, whom he pledged to work with the to make progress on areas of agreement should he win the White House.

“Our differences are real and we’ll debate them, but you’re not my enemy, you’re my fellow countrymen,” he said.

Language like this appealed to attendees like Jim Eshelman, an engineer in Greenville, who is interested in Graham but still not committed to backing him.

“I love his spirit of bipartisanship – the gridlock has been awful,” he said.

Graham’s advisers also see potential in showcasing his humble roots, which 2016 candidates like Scott Walker and Marco Rubio have used to great effect in campaign speeches to connect with voters. The senator grew up in the back of a bar owned by his parents, who died within 15 months of each other while he was in his early 20s, leaving him to raise his younger sister himself. Graham put himself through law school and took officer training in the Air Force, where he ended up serving as a judge advocate.

Graham, who was introduced by his sister, mentioned the Social Security benefits he received after his parents’ death in pledging to reform the program to sustain it in the long term.

“As president I will gladly do what it takes to save the program that once saved my family,” he said.

A fixture on Sunday political talk shows, Graham is among the most prominent and frequently quoted lawmakers in the national media on a variety of issues. Despite his high visibility, he’s considered well short of the top tier in the presidential race, and polls show he may have a tough time qualifying for primary debates, which will choose participants based on their support in national surveys.

He may have a bigger impact in South Carolina, however, a crucial early primary state that helped galvanize conservative opposition to Mitt Romney in 2012 by going for Newt Gingrich and sealed John McCain’s nomination in 2008 against Mike Huckabee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Many of the supporters who gathered here on Monday knew Graham personally or mentioned his dedicated constituent work. He once threatened to shut down the Senate to fast track a project deepening a major port. This attention to detail back home helped keep him safe from primary threats in his easy 2014 re-election despite major tea party opposition.

Vendors at the rally sold "Lindsey Graham: Native Son" buttons. If he takes even a sizable minority of votes, it's possible he could peel votes from other candidates in a way that affects the race. In 2008, for example, former Tennessee Sen. Fred Thompson was widely credited with pushing McCain past the finish line by splitting southern conservative support with Huckabee.

The Lindsey Graham record: A lot like John McCain, who also ran for president // Yahoo News // Meredith Shiner – June 1, 2015

On Monday, Republican Lindsey Graham of South Carolina will become the fifth sitting senator to formally announce a presidential bid, but his biggest challenge to prove he's a viable candidate likely won't come directly from the crowded field of colleagues he's currently running against. It will be from the one senator who already has waged (and lost) multiple bids for the White House: John McCain of Arizona.

For those who follow congressional politics, Graham and McCain have been inseparable — and practically indistinguishable — from each other for more than a decade, since Graham arrived to the Senate in 2003. Graham is often spotted just feet from the Senate floor, barking into a flip phone to a staffer about coordinating press strategy with McCain, meaning that "Statement by Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham on [foreign policy issue X]" is a frequent refrain in reporters' mailboxes. A search of McCain's Senate website, for example , found 239 press releases mentioning "Lindsey Graham" since 2005, many of which are from the past two years.

Graham and McCain also make up the core two-thirds of a group known colloquially in Washington as the "Three Amigos," which basically is a small nucleus of senators who have consistently advocated for more U.S. military intervention in the Middle East and have been searching for a permanent third "amigo" since "friend" Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., left the Senate in 2013. A Graham bid now completes an unofficial fraternity pledging ritual for the original group's triumvirate: a presidential run.

With a 2016 Graham campaign, four of the last five presidential elections have featured an "amigo" vying for a place at the top of the ticket (Lieberman, 2004; McCain, 2000, 2008). But there's no requirement for success in this political hazing process. Only once has a major party selected an amigo as its nominee — McCain in 2008 — and America has never elected one as president.

Little Sister Lauds Lindsey Graham, the Bachelor, for Raising Her // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 1, 2015

CENTRAL, S.C. — If elected, Senator Lindsey Graham would be the first bachelor to win the White House since Grover Cleveland. But that does not mean he will be on the campaign trail without any family members in tow.

Mr. Graham, 59, a Republican who is a hawk on foreign policy, featured his relatives prominently at his announcement here on Monday — none more so than his sister, Darline Graham Nordone, who introduced him. Ms. Nordone did her best to show Mr. Graham's softer side by sharing stories of how he taught her to ride a bicycle and recalling the pain of losing both their parents, one after the other, at young ages.

"Lindsey was always my parent," Ms. Nordone said in an interview in the bar on Main Street that their family once owned. "There was no doubt in my mind or anyone else's mind that Lindsey was my guardian."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Graham and his sister grew up in a small room behind the bar, which was then known as the Sanitary Cafe. They eventually moved into a trailer and then into a house next door. In 1976, when he was 20 and his sister was 11, their mother died of Hodgkin's lymphoma; 15 months later, their father died of a heart attack.

Ms. Nordone said she had kept a low profile during her brother's previous campaigns, but that she would be willing to attend events with him now and do anything she could to help him win the White House.

A mother of two whose occupation is helping people with disabilities find jobs, Ms. Nordone said that her brother's sense of responsibility, in caring for her, was why he had never married.

"He was a young man taking on a young girl and teenager to raise," she said. "He was just dedicating all of that time to raising me and going to school and trying to get an education. There's just only so much time in a day."

Mr. Graham later became his sister's legal guardian while he was in the Air Force, allowing her to qualify for his military benefits.

Mr. Graham's bachelorhood has been seized upon by his political opponents before, most recently last year, when a little-known conservative primary challenger called him "ambiguously gay."

Ms. Nordone said that such personal attacks were hard for her to take, but that she tried to tune out criticism of her brother — while showing people that Mr. Graham was much more than a politician.

"He's kind of like a brother, a father and a mother rolled into one," she said.

Paul: I was exaggerating on my terror attack claim // MSNBC //Aliyah Frumin and Anthony Terrell – June 1, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul is backtracking on a controversial suggestion he made over the weekend: that his opponents secretly want a terrorist attack on the U.S. so they can pin the blame on the Kentucky lawmaker and Republican presidential candidate.

When Paul was asked during a Monday morning appearance on Fox News who he was referring to when he made the comment on the Senate floor Sunday, the senator said, "Sometimes in the heat of a battle, hyperbole can get the better of anyone, and that may be the problem there." He added, "The point I was trying to make is that I think people do use fear to try to get us to give up our liberty."

The National Security Agency's controversial surveillance program allowing the government to collect Americans' phone data in bulk expired on Monday after Senate GOPers failed to reach an agreement to extend it.

Paul – an outspoken critic of the program – previously insisted "People here in town think I'm making a huge mistake. Some of them—I think—secretly want there to be an attack on the United States so they can blame it on me."

During the Fox interview, Paul called the expiration of key proponents of the Patriot Act a "big victory for privacy." Critics like Paul have spent years condemning the Patriot Act—which was instituted after the 9/11 terrorist attacks and allows the government to obtain telecommunication, financial and credit records without a court order—arguing it tramples on civil liberties and allows the government to spy on innocent people.

Meanwhile, some conservative critics have argued Paul sounds more like a Democrat on national security. Paul insisted on Monday, however, that may be the case among "Beltway pundits" but not when he's on the road talking to Americans.

"I think the American people are actually with me," said Paul on Fox News.

Paul's team recently highlighted a survey to msnbc that shows 60% of Americans want to change the Patriot Act. They further point out that 65% of millennials and 75% of Independent men are pushing for a modification of the Patriot Act.

Separately, Mallory Factor, a conservative political analyst who has helped Sen. Paul raise money, told msnbc that the GOP is "doing some soul searching" on national security and that the rift on the issue is causing some shifts in both parties.

"I see a whole realignment in the electorate if the general election is Rand Paul versus Hillary Clinton," Factor said, suggesting national security is changing allegiances in both the Democratic and GOP parties.

It's an issue that has divided the emerging Republican field.

Some like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie—who have not officially declared their 2016 intentions but are expected to run—have defended the programs, arguing they are vital to national security. Similarly, declared candidate, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida recently argued on the Senate floor that a perception has been created "that the United States government is listening to your phone calls or going through your bills as a matter of course," said Rubio. "That is absolutely and categorically false."

On the other side are candidates like Paul, Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee. Cruz said a recent federal appeals court ruling the NSA's collection of millions of Americans' phone records is illegal confirmed what many Americans already know—that the NSA "went to far in collecting the phone records." Huckabee has gone as far to suggest authorities should get a warrant if they want to listen in on Americans' phone calls.

The national security debate has also highlighted a bitter divide between Paul and fellow Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell, who wanted to extend the Patriot Act. On Sunday, Paul objected to the senate majority leader's proposal to extend less controversial aspects of the surveillance programs – but allow discussions on the telephone program continue. After Paul's objection, McConnell took to the Senate floor and in apparent aim at Paul, accused critics of a "campaign of demagoguery and disinformation."

Paul campaign video appears to run afoul of Senate rules // Politico // Burgess Everett – May 31, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul may have taken his stand against government surveillance a little too far in his presidential campaign.

In a campaign video released on Friday that includes explicit links to a campaign donation page, Paul (R-Ky.) extensively uses footage from his lengthy speech on the Senate floor on May 20 against bulk data collection and surveillance in the PATRIOT Act. The Senate "strictly" prohibits any use of its proceedings for campaign activities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The video, published under the "Official YouTube Channel of Rand Paul for President," says it is paid for by "Rand Paul for President" and includes a hyperlink to a secure donation page. According to the standing rules of the Senate, "The use of any tape duplication of radio or television coverage of the proceedings of the Senate for political campaign purposes is strictly prohibited."

The campaign video begins with a clip of Ronald Reagan, quoting him from a 1964 speech on individual liberty saying that "those who would trade our freedom for security have embarked on this downward course." The video then pivots to Paul's 10-hour speech earlier this month against the PATRIOT Act, three key provisions of which are set to expire on Sunday at midnight if Paul refuses to allow quick Senate votes.

"There comes a time in the history of nations when fear and complacency allow power to accumulate and liberty and privacy to suffer. That time is now," Paul says on the Senate floor in the video. "We should be in open rebellion saying, 'Enough's enough, we're not going to take it anymore.' We should be in rebellion saying to our government that the Constitution that protects our freedoms must be obeyed."

Paul has come close to running afoul of Senate rules before, using a Fox News clip of his 2013 filibuster in his campaign launch video, first reported by Time. But that video clearly showed a Fox News chyron in it, putting it in a grey area ethically. The most recent video includes no such indication that it is from news footage.

Campaign and Senate aides to Paul did not respond to a request for comment.

Rand Paul's "sugar daddy" problem: Billionaires don't love him — but that could be a blessing in disguise // Salon // Jim Newell – June 1, 2015

Citizens United and subsequent court decisions loosening campaign finance restrictions have made running for president easy-peasy: you can find one billionaire to give you tens of millions of dollars and then you just do whatever they tell you to do. It's a great country. There are billionaires all over the place nowadays looking to purchase politicians for themselves.

And yet Rand Paul, who has a slender but not-nil chance of winning the Republican presidential nomination can't find himself a single willing billionaire into whose pockets he can dive deep. Tragically, this might mean that he'll have to raise money in the boring, old-timey horse-and-buggy fashion: by soliciting donations from a lot of people instead of one. Who wants this?

Politico reports that Paul's inability to secure a "sugar daddy" or two, so to speak, has "led to considerable frustration in his campaign, which, amid rising concerns that it will not be able to compete financially, finds itself leaning heavily on the network of small donors who powered his father's insurgent White House bids." The obvious first choice was billionaire tech libertarian Peter Thiel, who gave Rand Paul's father a bunch of cash in 2012. Thiel is hesitant to play a similar role again for Ron's considerably more viable spawn, and staffers don't know why. Some suggest he's "become tired of political giving," which is understandable, because politics is bullshit and he could buy all other sorts of cool stuff with that money like boats and cars and things.

Sean Parker, the Napster cofounder who also made a bunch of money off of Facebook, was also solicited but may give his money to Hillary Clinton instead because his politics make no sense.

GOP senators tear into Pau l // Politico // Manu Raju and Burgess Everett – May 31, 2015

The Rand Paul pile-on session began a few hours before sunset Sunday evening.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Behind closed doors in the Senate's Strom Thurmond Room, Republican senators lashed out at the junior Kentucky Republican's defiant stance to force the expiration of key sections of the PATRIOT Act, a law virtually all of them support. Indiana Sen. Dan Coats' criticism was perhaps the most biting: He accused the senator of "lying" about the matter in order to raise money for his presidential campaign, according to three people who attended the meeting.

The message may have gotten through to Paul except for one thing: The libertarian-minded senator skipped the hour-long meeting. That only infuriated his colleagues more.

"Anything that goes against anything he believes, he never comes," Coats said in an interview. "It's always helpful if you're in there working to have your position understood, and we all learn a lot and we all try to come to a much better understanding of what we're trying to do."

"He needed to be there," said Sen. Dean Heller (R-Nev.). "He really needed to be there."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) noted that Paul has missed "a number of meetings" Republicans have held on the PATRIOT Act in recent weeks. He contended there was an obvious political reason for Paul's stance, pointing out how his colleague was tweeting supporters taking "selfies" of themselves next to Paul speaking on TV.

"I know what this is about — I think it's very clear – this is, to some degree, a fundraising exercise," McCain said Sunday. "He obviously has a higher priority for his fundraising and political ambitions than for the security of the nation."

The stinging personal criticism of Paul showed just how unpopular the Kentucky Republican's demands to kill the surveillance law is among party elders — and portended how this battle is likely to continue to hover over his presidential campaign, for better or worse. It marked the first time in Paul's brief tenure in Washington where he's become the scourge of much of his party — not unlike how the party establishment turned on Ted Cruz over his role in the 2013 government shutdown.

Like Cruz, Paul is clearly relishing it.

"Tonight begins the process of ending bulk collection," Paul said proudly on the Senate floor, just hours before the expiration of key provisions in the law. And in a sign of the ill will between him and his colleagues, Paul took a personal whack of his own.

"People here in town think I'm making a huge mistake," he said. "Some of them, I think, secretly want there to be an attack on the United States so they can blame it on me."

Since becoming a senator, Paul has long railed against the PATRIOT Act, arguing it's a blatant violation of Americans' constitutional privacy rights. His position gained steam among many civil libertarians after Edward Snowden exposed the National Security Agency's bulk data collection program of Americans' phone records.

Buoyed by Snowden's leaks, a bipartisan majority in the House moved to overhaul the bulk data program through the USA Freedom Act by proposing that phone companies — not the federal government — maintain those records, though the NSA could access them via a secret court order.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Paul contends that the USA Freedom Act would be an expansion of the PATRIOT Act and could torpedo a lawsuit aimed at ending the bulk data program. The phone companies, he said, “may do the same thing” as the NSA.

Republican leaders in the Senate, after initially resisting the USA Freedom Act because of concerns it would hamper intelligence gathering, on Sunday reluctantly accepted it. They did so with a midnight deadline to extend the surveillance law hours away, their backs against the wall.

That made Paul even more isolated than he was already.

“I think there are some legitimate debates going on in the country over who should hold the documents,” said Sen. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), a member of GOP leadership and the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. “I think there aren’t very many people in Sen. Paul’s place that believe that none of these provisions need to be extended or held onto in some way.”

After skipping the GOP meeting, Paul appeared for a tense floor debate between him and his colleagues, including the man who has endorsed him for president: Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, a fellow Kentuckian. The GOP leader was incensed at Paul’s refusal to allow a two-week renewal of far-less controversial provisions of the PATRIOT Act: The use of roving wiretaps for terrorism suspects that change phone numbers quickly and “lone wolf” provisions that allow tracking of suspects who are not affiliated with known terrorist groups.

Just as McConnell attempted to pass a short-term extension, Paul launched into his own impassioned speech—only to be shouted down by his colleagues.

“One of the promises that was given when the PATRIOT Act was originally passed was that in exchange for allowing a less than constitutional standard, we would only use the actions against …” Paul said before he was interrupted by Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.), who pounded his desk while presiding over the Senate.

“Is there objection?” Wicker asked as Paul tried to continue on. A number of Republican senators began yelling over Paul to restore order in the chamber and prevent another lengthy speech.

“Regular order!” shouted Sens. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) and Tom Cotton (R-Ark.), among others.

“I object,” Paul responded. That prompted McConnell to launch his own speech. At times glaring at Paul, the Senate leader blasted what he called “a campaign of demagoguery and disinformation launched in the wake of unlawful actions of Edward Snowden, who was last seen in Russia.” Paul sat at his desk quietly, holding his glasses in his hand.

McConnell never named Paul in his passionate speech, but it was clearly aimed at the man who had been a close political ally — until now.

Other colleagues did criticize Paul by name.

“I don’t stand with Rand on this,” said Sen. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.). “I want to make sure the ability to monitor terrorists continues uninterrupted.”

"I think he's nestled in with a very large bunch of very radical people – from the left to the right," said Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch, the president pro tempore. "I don't know if he feels comfortable being with all those leftists who hate the PATRIOT Act. But he has a right to do what he's doing."

Paul ended up delaying a final Senate vote on the USA Freedom Act until later this week. After blocking that bill before the Memorial Day recess, McConnell and GOP leaders agreed to move the House's measure, saying they had no other choice. By a 77-17 vote Sunday, the Senate broke a filibuster and moved to begin debate on the bill.

To overcome Paul's delay tactics, McConnell was forced to employ a rarely used prerogative to force senators to debate after a filibuster has been broken, allowing him to move to final passage as early as Tuesday.

As that vote was occurring, Paul was sitting at his desk. He huddled with two libertarian-minded House members: GOP Reps. Justin Amash of Michigan and Thomas Massie of Kentucky. His fellow 2016 rivals, Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida, were yukking it up nearby with a small group of senators. (Rubio voted against proceeding to the House bill, while Cruz supported it.)

In an interview, Amash said Paul's positions are supported "overwhelmingly" by voters of "all political affiliations."

"It's not politically risky to stand with the vast majority of Americans," Amash said. "I'm astonished when I hear Republican candidates in particular speak as though people want the PATRIOT Act. They don't."

"He's exposing the country to the Constitution," Massie added. "And the senators that think that's dangerous are saying the Constitution's dangerous."

Several dozen Paul supporters sat in the Senate gallery on Sunday night clad in red "Rand" T-shirts.

But Paul didn't have many other defenders in the halls of the Senate.

Rubio called the expiration of the PATRIOT Act's provisions the result of "political posturing."

"There are other ways this could have been done," said Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.).

One way Paul could have handled the matter would have been to simply object to short-term extensions of current law, rather than giving a nearly 11-hour floor speech on the floor before the Memorial Day recess, Heller said.

"It accomplished just the same, but he couldn't raise money objecting," Heller said. "He could only raise money filibustering."

Mike Huckabee to Rand Paul: Decide what job you want // CNN // Gregory Wallace – June 1, 2015

(CNN)Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee wants Rand Paul to make a choice: Protest the Patriot Act either on the Senate floor or on the campaign trail.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He joined a chorus of Republican presidential hopefuls weighing in on the Kentucky Republican senator's protest of the Patriot Act, key provisions of which lapsed Sunday.

Paul claimed credit for blocking parts of the renewal of the controversial law, and his protests included an 11-hour speech on the eve of the chamber's Memorial Day break, as well as objections to several short-term extensions of the Act.

In response to a question about Paul, Huckabee said on Fox News Monday morning that 2016 contenders must "decide what they want to be when they grow up."

"If you want to be a governor, be a governor. If you want to be a senator, be a senator," Huckabee said. "If you want to be president, then let go of what you're doing, because it's a full time pursuit to run for the presidency."

Those in government positions owe a responsibility to the taxpayer, he continued.

"If you want a different job, then say I don't want this one anymore. I'm bored with it," he said. "But be honest about it and go out and give the taxpayers a break, and let them have someone on the job full time."

Huckabee added in a follow-up question that he did not mean to "impugn his (Paul's) motives" because "this is not something he just took up because it's a political cause."

Many of those running for president are out of office, though two of Paul's Senate colleagues -- Marco Rubio of Florida and Ted Cruz of Texas -- are in the race, and Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina is expected to announce a bid on Monday. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont is running for the Democratic nomination. Several sitting governors -- including Chris Christie of New Jersey, John Kasich of Ohio, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and Scott Walker of Wisconsin -- are considering joining the GOP field.

Unlike several other Republicans who have hammered Paul for blocking the Patriot Act renewal, Huckabee believes the original law went too far.

He said the original law was "hastily passed" in the wake of 9/11 without extensive debate. Public opinion has shifted now, he said.

"Fourteen years ago, we were worried about terrorists. Now we're worried about our government," Huckabee said, singling out controversies around the IRS and Justice Departments.

Rand Paul's Stand Against the Patriot Act Is About More Than Mass Surveillance // Policy.Mic // Mark Kogan – June 1, 2015

On Sunday night, controversial elements of the Patriot Act were allowed to expire for the first time since its passage following the Sept. 11 attacks in 2001.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), whose procedural maneuvers prevented the Senate from renewing the bill in its entirety, declared in a press release that "tonight begins the process of ending bulk collection" of data for mass surveillance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul's efforts, whether motivated by personal beliefs, presidential aspirations or a healthy mix of both, mark an important moment in American politics, not just for the debate over mass surveillance, but for congressional gridlock in general.

In recent decades, as congressional politics became increasingly polarized and meaningful compromise became less common, the practical challenge for legislators was the sheer impossibility of moving legislation through the system without some sort of forcing function.

Legislators began pushing fewer individual bills, instead packing their projects and policies into "omnibus" bills that addressed entire sectors of government rather than individual pieces. These amalgamated bills were often funding bills and therefore "must-pass" legislation. Voting against omnibus bills became too risky because failing to pass the larger bill over disagreements with one or two relatively minor provisions carried the threat of tremendous collateral damage (both real and political).

As this process of smashing through "must-pass" bills became standard operating procedure, the political leadership made another cynical discovery. By waiting until the last second and using the subsequent fear of imminent expiration to force passage, politicians were able to avoid debating elements of the bill that put them at risk while simultaneously ensuring passage.

The lead-up to this year's renewal of the Patriot Act played out similarly: Everyone from President Barack Obama to Senate Republicans warned of the dangers of failing to pass the bill wholesale.

Urging the Senate to act this week, Obama warned of the dangers of letting surveillance authorities expire.

"I don't want us to be in a situation in which for a certain period of time those authorities go away and suddenly we are dark," he said. "And heaven forbid we've got a problem where we could have prevented a terrorist attack or apprehended someone who is engaged in dangerous activity but we didn't do so simply because of inaction in the Senate."

Others in the administration pushed the same message. In an interview with CBS, newly minted Attorney General Loretta Lynch declared that failing to renew the Patriot Act would make us "less safe" and cause us to "lose important eyes on people who have made it clear ... that their mission is to harm American people here and abroad."

Republicans also joined in on the fear-mongering as the vote deadline approached. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said on the Senate floor that failure to pass or extend the act "would mean disarming completely and arbitrarily."

Others were even more direct. "To go dark on this," said Sen. Dan Coats (R-Ind.), NPR reported, "is a risk on Americans' lives."

Historically, this was a tried and true formula that would have ensured immediate passage or at least temporary extension while the requisite arm-twisting was done to secure passage. But for the first time in a long time, it didn't work.

"The people who argue that the world will end and we will be overrun by jihadists tonight are trying to use fear... They want you to fear and give up your liberty," said Paul in his statement. "They tell you if you have nothing to hide, you have nothing to fear. That's a far cry from the standard we were founded upon."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now, with two more days of mandatory debate forced by Paul, the contentious issue of mass surveillance will be brought to the forefront of civic discourse. This will almost certainly result in meaningful reforms as the Senate takes up the House-passed USA Freedom Act, which curtails contentious mass data collection powers while leaving other elements of the Patriot Act in place.

When Paul rose to speak on Sunday, he knew that his opposition was a beginning, rather than an end. "The Patriot Act will expire tonight," Paul said, but, "It will only be temporary. They will ultimately get their way."

Yet even if they do get their way, this shock is good for the system and will serve as a reminder that the politics of fear and pressure are not necessary and are in fact anathema to good governance, doing far more harm than good.

By forcing expiration and debate, the public has been given an opportunity to nudge public dialogue away from partisan grandstanding toward more meaningful discussion of serious issues. Hopefully, we take advantage of it.

Rand Paul is getting way too much credit for killing 3 Patriot Act powers // Vox // Timothy B. Lee – June 1, 2015

When three controversial provisions of the Patriot Act expired at midnight on Sunday, May 31, 2015, news organizations put Rand Paul (R-KY) front and center. We at Vox did that ourselves, with a story titled "Rand Paul has forced three Patriot Act powers to expire."

This isn't wrong — it's true that Paul's obstructionist tactics helped ensure that the Patriot Act powers would lapse before the Senate had time to pass a replacement. And Paul's dramatic 10-hour speech two weeks ago made for a good story, which is why it got so much media attention. But the media's focus on Paul has led to the Kentucky Republican getting way too much credit for the ultimate outcome of this week's surveillance fight.

The fight is likely to result in the passage of the USA Freedom Act — which seeks to place stricter limits on NSA surveillance but which some privacy advocates say doesn't go far enough — later this week. Paul has opposed this legislation. And if Paul hadn't engaged in his theatrics, the most likely outcome would have been exactly the same. The only difference is that the USA Freedom Act might have passed a few days earlier.

If the USA Freedom Act passes in the Senate, credit (or blame) should go to the 57 senators — mostly Democrats — who supported the legislation a week ago, and to the 54 senators — again mostly Democrats — who voted down a straight renewal of the Patriot Act during the same Friday-night session. Rand Paul's filibuster was wildly successful at getting Rand Paul's name in headlines. But it ultimately had little effect on the outcome of the legislative fight.

The Republican leadership of the House also deserves a lot of credit for reining in the NSA. If the lower House had not passed the USA Freedom Act several weeks ago, Mitch McConnell might have convinced a majority of the Senate that renewing the Patriot Act was the only realistic option.

The Patriot Act powers died because 54 senators wanted them to die

The crucial moment in the Patriot Act fight wasn't Rand Paul's filibuster on Wednesday, May 20. It was a series of votes taken two days later, on Friday, May 22. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-KY) wanted to force the Senate to renew the Patriot Act without changes. His plan was to bring the USA Freedom Act up for a vote, let it fail, and then tell senators their only alternative was a short-term renewal of the Patriot Act with no changes.

The first part of this plan worked. The USA Freedom Act got 57 votes, just short of the 60 votes required to overcome a filibuster. But when McConnell then called a vote on extending the Patriot Act for two months, the senators didn't flinch — 54 of them voted no.

At this point the question was who would blink first. Would pro-privacy senators agree to extend the Patriot Act without changes? Or would pro-surveillance senators agree to support the USA Freedom Act? On Sunday night, it was McConnell himself who blinked, concluding that the USA Freedom Act he had opposed a week earlier was now "the only realistic way forward." This time 77 senators voted for the USA Freedom Act.

"The Senate will pass a reform that just got 77 votes," says Julian Sanchez a privacy advocate at the Cato Institute (where I worked from 2003 to 2005). He notes that Paul joined "16 of the most hardcore NSA cheerleaders in the Senate" in opposing the legislation.

McConnell's capitulation was a real victory for pro-privacy senators. But Paul deserves little, if any, credit for it. After all, if Paul had backed the USA Freedom Act and convinced two of his fellow Republicans to join him, the legislation could have moved forward sooner. Paul's decision to break with the overwhelming majority of pro-privacy senators and oppose the USA Freedom Act delayed the legislation's passage and created a risk that McConnell would be able to stampede the Senate into renewing the Patriot Act.

Even if Paul's defiant tactics didn't change the outcome of the debate, Sanchez says they helped illustrate that "scaremongering" by surveillance hawks no longer works. "Americans aren't afraid of the dark anymore," he says. "A sunset can't be used to coerce legislators into capitulation with unchecked surveillance powers."

Other members of Congress deserve more credit than Rand Paul

Rand Paul's tactics have gotten him a lot of press attention — and, therefore, a lot of undeserved credit — for the outcome of the legislative fight. But a larger share of the credit should go to other senators. Sanchez points to Senators Ron Wyden (D-OR), Patrick Leahy (D-VT), and Mike Lee (R-UT) as three examples of senators who did the hard work of building a consensus for the USA Freedom Act in the Senate.

And even more credit should go to House leaders such as Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-WI) who passed the USA Freedom Act in a lopsided, bipartisan vote several weeks ago. The fact that the House had already passed the USA Freedom Act made it a lot easier for pro-privacy senators to position it as a reasonable alternative to renewing the Patriot Act.

"It is valuable that Paul is using his platform as a presidential candidate to drive attention to this issue," Sanchez says. But "Paul hasn't ultimately done much to drive the substantive policy outcome."

Dick Cheney and Daughter Push Hawkish Stances for G.O.P. Hopefuls // NYT // Jonathan Martin – June 1, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The rise of the Islamic State in the Middle East has pushed Republicans toward embracing a more interventionist foreign policy, and now one prominent Republican family wants to be sure the party stays that way.

Former Vice President Dick Cheney and his daughter Liz Cheney are planning to make their presence felt in the 2016 presidential campaign through their advocacy group, Alliance for a Strong America.

The organization is planning online and perhaps television ads pushing a muscular line on national security, according to a Republican strategist familiar with the group's planning. The initiative may also pay for polling to help nudge Republican candidates toward hawkish stances in the primary season.

What is not clear, though, is whether the Cheneys intend to train their fire on Hillary Rodham Clinton or whether they plan to target Senator Rand Paul, the libertarian-leaning Kentuckian who has recently sought to bolster his White House campaign by trying to block a renewal of parts of the Patriot Act.

Mr. Cheney criticized Mr. Paul as "an isolationist" in an interview published online Sunday in The Wall Street Journal, which first reported the Alliance for a Strong America's plans.

Asked about the assessment, Mr. Paul's top political adviser questioned Mr. Cheney's conservative credentials.

"Anyone who defends warrantless spying on innocent U.S. citizens, like President Obama, has no right to call themselves a freedom-loving conservative," said Doug Stafford, the adviser to Mr. Paul. "Worse is these people are defending and supporting a program that the courts have said is illegal and the F.B.I. reports hasn't led to a single terrorist arrest or thwarted terror plot. It has only resulted in the trampling of Americans' rights."

The harsh back-and-forth between the Cheneys and Mr. Paul's orbit illustrates not only the tension in the party over how to balance defense and civil liberties, but also, as Mr. Stafford notes, basic questions about what it means to be a conservative on matters of national security.

The resurgence of radical Islamic terrorism in the Middle East may have pushed many primary voters toward a more hawkish orientation, but Mr. Paul's success in at least temporarily stopping the N.S.A.'s use of metadata suggests that Republicans are uneasy with some of the intelligence policies put into effect during Mr. Cheney's time as vice president.

Republicans who have spoken with Mr. Cheney, who represented Wyoming in the House for 10 years and who maintains an intense interest in both policy and political intrigue, say he is plainly concerned about the party backing away from intelligence programs.

Selective about his public appearances, Mr. Cheney is engaged in the 2016 presidential race behind the scenes. When aides to many of the leading Republican candidates descended on Wyoming this year to make their pitch to a group of wealthy donors, some of the staff members were surprised to find Mr. Cheney in the audience.

How Bobby Jindal lost everything: A one-time GOP hope, gutted by Grover Norquist worship and his own ambition // Salon // Stephanie Grace – June 1, 2015

These are not happy times in Baton Rouge, where government officials are desperately trying to plug a $1.6 billion budget shortfall. But even by that standard, Wednesday, April 22, was particularly fraught.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the imposing state capitol that Huey Long built, the Senate Finance Committee was wrestling with a complicated cost-cutting scheme to repeal an inventory tax that businesses pay to local governments and that the state rebates to the businesses, all while promising to somehow make stressed-out local leaders whole.

Just down the road, Louisiana State University President and Chancellor F. King Alexander said that the state's flagship university, which could lose 80 percent of state funding after years of already deep cuts, was developing a worst-case scenario plan for financial exigency—basically the academic equivalent of bankruptcy.

In the midst of it all came a message from Republican Governor Bobby Jindal, whose policies and priorities have contributed mightily to the state's fiscal mess.

"Help wish my friends Willie, Phil and Si a happy birthday," said the tweet, which was accompanied by a photo of Willie Robertson, whose family is featured on the popular homegrown reality TV show Duck Dynasty. It then directed readers to the website for the American Future Project, a 527 issue advocacy group that Jindal has set up in advance of his anticipated presidential run.

If the tweet suggests a stunning disconnect from the dire budget situation that's unfolding on his watch, well, that's how it is these days.

A Pure Record on Taxes

Jindal, a hard-charging former Rhodes Scholar, has always nursed grander ambitions, and voters generally gave him a pass. That was when things were going well.

These days they're not, and Jindal's focus on the upcoming presidential primaries has taken a toll back home. While he was popular and powerful enough to avoid a reelection fight in 2011, by 2015 his approval rating had sunk to 27 percent, according to one poll; a friendly survey by his own consulting firm pegged the number at 46 percent, hardly a resounding vote of confidence.

It's not just his frequent trips to places like Iowa, New Hampshire, and Washington, D.C., that have angered his constituents. (He spent 165 days out of state in 2014, according to The Advocate newspaper.) Nor is it only his odd forays into international and national affairs, from the tall tales in London about Muslim no-go zones, to his op-ed in The New York Times accusing companies that oppose religious freedom laws inspired by the spread of gay marriage of forming an unholy alliance with the "radical liberals." It's not even his need to bask in the Robertsons' reflected glory.

More than any of that, his constituents are frustrated that their governor can't be bothered to do his day job—and when he does, that his actions are often transparently designed to build a national profile rather than meet Louisiana's needs.

That's clear in his refusal to take federal money to expand Medicaid—which, of course, would mean acknowledging there are benefits to Obama's health care law. But nowhere is it more obvious, or more damaging, than in Jindal's stewardship of fiscal affairs.

Jindal chalks up the current budget shortfall to the drop in oil prices, and that's definitely contributed. A larger piece of the puzzle has been his determination to maintain a pure record on taxes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal hasn't always been reckless about taxation. In the midst of a budget surplus early in his first term, Jindal tried to quietly head off the Legislature's move to roll back a big income tax increase that had been enacted several years earlier. It was only after lawmakers seemed like they might eliminate the income tax entirely that he got on board with the rollback, and he soon was boasting that he'd signed the biggest tax cut in state history.

The first real glimpse of the future came in 2011 when Jindal fought tooth and nail against extending a temporary four-cent levy on the state's cigarette tax—at 36 cents, including the levy, the third lowest in the nation. His reasoning? If the tax rate is scheduled to automatically drop and the state acts to prevent that from happening, it amounts to an effective tax increase.

The stance left his constituents cold, but impressed Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform (ATR), who would endorse Jindal as Mitt Romney's running mate the following year.

Even Republicans Are Bristling

These days it's hard to think of anyone who has as much influence over what Jindal's willing to do than Norquist, whose rigid rules for what constitutes a tax increase line up perfectly with Jindal's. In practice, that means the governor has insisted that the budget be balanced without tax increases, despite the prospect of devastating cuts to higher education and health care, the two main areas that don't enjoy constitutional or statutory protection.

And it means some revenue-enhancing ideas the Republican-dominated Legislature might support, specifically a reexamination of giveaways to specific industries, are off limits—because eliminating a tax exemption without an offset that reduces another tax or cuts spending, according to ATR, is raising a tax.

That's how the inventory tax wound up in everyone's crosshairs, despite the fact that eliminating the rebate but not the underlying tax would hurt businesses, and getting rid of the tax would devastate some parishes (that's Louisiana for county). Many companies, it turns out, receive rebate checks that exceed their state tax liability, and in Jindal's view that makes eliminating the payouts a spending cut, not a tax increase. "Corporate welfare," he labeled it in his opening address to the Legislature, prompting chuckles from those who've watched him promote business incentives for years.

In fact, perhaps the most remarkable aspect of the frustration with Jindal is that it transcends partisanship.

It's not just the Democrats who are bristling. It's many a Republican.

Nothing Left to Cut

Republicans who belong to an informal group dubbed the "fiscal hawks" have been sharply critical of Jindal's reliance over the years on one-time money transfers and accounting gimmicks to balance the budget without making even deeper cuts.

One reason everything's hitting the fan is there's not much left. Gone are $800 million from the Medicaid Trust Fund for the Elderly and $450 million for providing development incentives, and the rainy day fund has dropped from $730 million to $460 million on his watch.

Republicans like state Rep. Jay Morris, who, after hearing Jindal's vow to veto any measure that didn't have

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Grover Norquist's blessing, declared the approach "insane." And like state Sen. Jack Donahue, who chairs the Finance Committee and who passed a bill last year seeking to determine how much the state spends on tax exemptions, only to watch Jindal veto it.

And perhaps most tellingly, the Republicans running to replace Jindal in this fall's election. All three—Lt. Governor Jay Dardenne, U.S. Senator David Vitter and Public Service Commissioner (and former Jindal aide) Scott Angelle—say they will look for a way to accept the Medicaid money and take a open-minded approach to examining tax exemptions.

"What this state needs right now is a leader solely focused on Louisiana," Dardenne said in a recent speech. And in a clear swipe at Norquist, he added that, "I represent the people of Louisiana; I don't represent someone who lives in D.C."

And Vitter said he'd take a good, hard look at tax incentives and other giveaways, even if it means raising revenue.

"Gov. Jindal should be doing this now," he pointedly said. "I'll do it the minute I'm sworn in."

UPDATE: Walker backs 20-week abortion ban with or without exemption // NBC 15 – June 1, 2015

UPDATED Monday, June 1, 2015---10:35 a.m.

DELAVAN, Wis. (AP) -- Gov. Scott Walker says he will sign a 20-week abortion ban whether or not it includes an exemption for cases of rape or incest.

Walker was asked Monday about the bill following a speech at a Boys and Girls Club event in Delavan.

Walker says a ban on abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy is "rational and reasonable" because he believes after that point the unborn child can feel pain.

A bill banning abortions after 20 weeks is slated for a joint public hearing Tuesday in the Legislature. It does not include an exemption for rape or incest.

Walker says he will sign the bill with or without an exemption, saying "it's an unborn child, that's why we feel strongly about it."

The joint hearing announced Wednesday is scheduled for Tuesday before Assembly and Senate health committees.

The bill was introduced last week and its sponsors have said they want to pass it before debate on the state budget begins later in June. Gov. Scott Walker has said he will sign it into law.

Under the bill, doctors who perform an abortion after 20 weeks in non-emergency situations could be charged with a felony and subject to up to a $10,000 in fines or 3 1/2 years in prison. The bill doesn't provide an exception for pregnancies conceived from rape or incest.

Senate Minority Leader Jennifer Shilling in a statement said the bill would jeopardize women's health.

Physicians who perform an abortion after 20 weeks in non-emergency situations could be charged with a felony and subject to up to $10,000 fines or 3 1/2 years in prison.

Gov. Scott Walker on Thursday said he supports the bill and hopes the Legislature could move forward with the abortion ban while it works on the budget.

Jeb Bush Faces Challenge in Winning Over Brother's Team // NYT // Peter Baker – June 1, 2015

WASHINGTON — When George W. Bush first ran for president, he liked to say he had inherited half of his father's friends and all of his enemies. For Jeb Bush, now preparing his own bid for the White House, that may ring familiar.

His brother's enemies have made themselves known in recent weeks as Jeb Bush has struggled to formulate his own take on the decisions made during the last Bush presidency. But perhaps just as important for the fledgling candidate has been the challenge in winning over his brother's friends.

While George W. Bush himself and many in his circle, especially those closest to the family, are enthusiastic about the prospect of a third Bush presidency, many of the Republican foot soldiers who worked for the former president in his campaigns and his administration have not rushed to back his brother's emerging operation.

A sampling conducted largely by email of about 120 people who worked for George W. Bush — from cabinet secretaries to foreign policy advisers to advance aides — found about 25 who said they were supporting his younger brother. Fifty others said they were neutral or supporting another candidate, while the rest did not respond, passing up a chance to declare allegiance to the next Bush candidacy.

Some harbor the same reservations that other Republicans do about the notion of a dynastic presidency passed from one member of a family to another. Some simply want a fresh start, concluding that the party would make a stronger case against Hillary Rodham Clinton, the likely Democratic candidate, by nominating a new figure like Senator Marco Rubio of Florida or Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin. Some nurse doubts about Jeb Bush specifically, even on policies he shares with his brother.

"I'm neutral," said Matt Latimer, a former White House speechwriter. "If pressed, I'm inclined to adopt the Barbara Bush philosophy — enough Bushes." (Mrs. Bush, the mother of the two brothers, who initially did say that, has since taken it back. "I've changed my mind," she said.)

Another former White House official who worked closely with former President Bush said it would be a mistake for the country for his brother to become president. "I happen to believe the U.S. is Bushed and Clintoned out," said this official, who like many others asked not to be named to avoid offending his former boss. "It is time for others to lead."

A spokesman for Jeb Bush, a former governor of Florida, said he did not take any support for granted. "Governor Bush realizes that should he decide to move forward, he's going to have to work to earn support across the party — just as the other prospective candidates will," said Tim Miller, the spokesman.

Many of the Bush veterans unwilling to back him cited work reasons, explaining that their current employers would not want them to take sides publicly. Some are now working as academics, party officials or television pundits, and said they wanted to retain a professional detachment from any one candidate. Some said they hoped to be able to advise several of the Republican candidates, and there was no consensus for any of Mr. Bush's opponents.

Others held back not because they oppose Mr. Bush, but because they worried that publicly supporting him would only hurt his chances by reinforcing his ties to his brother. They were acutely aware of the criticism he received when he released a list of foreign policy advisers that included many who had worked for his brother, like Paul D. Wolfowitz, the former deputy defense secretary.

Whatever the reason, the mixed emotions in the 43rd president's team underscore a vicious quandary for Jeb Bush. Much as he wants to present himself as his own man, he cannot assume that his brother's supporters will automatically transfer to him. So he must make the case for their support, and for that of the broader electorate, even as he labors to avoid being branded a copy of his brother.

"It is fair to say that those who are inclined to support Jeb out of loyalty to 41 or 43 have already jumped in," said Stephen Yates, who worked on national security in the George W. Bush White House and is now chairman of the Idaho Republican Party. "Everyone else is up for grabs. He'll be able to get some of the remainder, but no advantage over others."

Neil Patel, a Bush White House official and publisher of The Daily Caller, a conservative news site, said the Republican field had many good choices.

"I don't think anyone, including Jeb Bush, should expect to automatically pick up support to become president — especially by virtue of being related to a past president. And I doubt he would disagree with that," he said. "Lots of former colleagues are lined up behind Jeb but many are also with Rubio, Walker and others."

The distance kept by some from the 43rd president's team reflects the reality that the two brothers have long traveled in separate political orbits, with the elder based in Texas and the younger based in Florida. There has been relatively little overlap over the years beyond family retainers.

And so some of George W. Bush's former aides were willing to publicly criticize Jeb Bush a few weeks ago when he stumbled over the question of whether he would have invaded Iraq had he known there were no unconventional weapons there.

Karl Rove, the former president's longtime political strategist; Andrew H. Card Jr., the former White House chief of staff; and Ari Fleischer, the former press secretary, all expressed concern at the handling of the issue.

"I don't think it would have taken his brother that long to clean it up," Mr. Card said on MSNBC. But Mr. Card was among those who offered unstinting support for Jeb Bush. "I am proudly for Jeb," he said by email.

Others offering their backing were some of the Republicans who were closest to his brother, including Margaret Spellings, the former education secretary, who runs the George W. Bush Presidential Center, and Donald L. Evans, the former president's longtime Texas friend and commerce secretary.

"I very much support Jeb and he would be a great president if he decides to run," Mr. Evans said.

Ms. Spellings said she was "enthusiastically supporting" him. "As you might imagine, Jeb and I have a relationship independent of his brother given our shared interest in education reform, and we have worked together for many years," she said.

For some, though, it seemed as much obligation as fervor. "Yes," a longtime friend and financial donor to George W. Bush said when asked if he was supporting the former president's brother. "Do I have a choice?"

One who decided he did have a choice was Wayne Berman, an official in the administration of the first President George Bush, and a friend and fund-raiser for George W. Bush and whose wife worked in the 43rd president's White House. This time around, Mr. Berman is a senior adviser to Mr. Rubio.

Among those declaring neutrality rather than publicly embracing Jeb Bush's candidacy is former Vice President Dick Cheney, who with his daughter Liz Cheney has started the Alliance for a Strong America to advocate tough national security positions among various candidates.

Others include former Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, although she is leading Mr. Bush's education foundation; Mr. Rove, who comments on Fox News and in The Wall Street Journal; Mr. Fleischer; Michael Gerson, a former senior White House adviser now writing for The Washington Post; Ed Gillespie, a former presidential counselor; Mark McKinnon, a campaign strategist for the former president; and cabinet secretaries like former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Paul J. McNulty, who served as George W. Bush's deputy attorney general and is now president of Grove City College in Pennsylvania, said he was torn between Jeb Bush and former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas. "I've always been a big fan of Jeb," he said, "but I worry about his electability."

Ryan Streeter, a former domestic policy aide to George W. Bush, said the issues had changed since his former boss left office. Fiscal concerns are greater, and Republicans are more skeptical of enlarging the federal role in setting education standards for schools or expanding Medicare to cover prescription drugs, as the former president did.

As a result, said Mr. Streeter, who now directs the Center for Politics and Governance at the University of Texas at Austin, "lots of 43 staffers' views reflect those changes since many of them have stayed engaged in policy and politics."

"These issues, more than anything," he said, "will affect who they get behind in 2016."

Huckabee: Two-State Solution Is "Irrational, Unworkable" — Room For Palestinian State Elsewhere // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski – June 1, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. and Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee argued over the weekend a two-state solution is "irrational and unworkable" and that if a Palestinian state is created, it must exist outside of Israel. Huckabee said there's plenty of land elsewhere in the world for a Palestinian state.

"The two state solution, if we mean two governments holding the same piece of real estate is irrational and unworkable," Huckabee told Arutz Sheva TV on Sunday during an appearance at the Israel Day Concert in Central Park, New York.

Huckabee, who refers to the area commonly called the West Bank as Judea and Samaria, called arguing for the two-state solution a "pretentious game."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“And I think it’s time for us to quit playing this pretentious game that there’s gonna be a two-state solution where both sides share the same country and real estate and streets ‘cause they’re not,” said Huckabee. “One of the sides the Palestinians continue to say that Israel doesn’t have a right to exist. You can’t forge an alliance with that.”

Huckabee cited there being “plenty of land in the world” to find a place for a Palestinian state outside of Israel.

“If there’s a two-state solution, the Palestinians state needs to be outside the boundaries of the nation of Israel. There’s plenty of land in the world where we can find a place and say, ‘Okay, let’s create a Palestinian state.’ But not within the confides of a secure Israel.”

Speaking at the event, Huckabee said “we never can accept the notion that Israel will be divided,” citing the boundaries of Israel being given “not by the United Nations but by almighty God.”

In his interview, Huckabee added he could not “explain why there is a harsh anti-Israel sentiment that exists in the administration.”

Huckabee said if Israel was attacked he doesn’t know what the Obama administration would do.

“I think if the Israelis were under attack right now, I’m not sure what this president would do,” said Huckabee when asked about Israel taking military action against Iran.

Marco Rubio's appealing ambiguity // The Week // Michael Brendan Dougherty – June 1, 2015

Marco Rubio is an older Republican's idea of a younger Republican, we've been told.

In a fun bit of racial and generational essentialism, Ana Marie Cox went through the senator's positions and claimed that "the only demographic Rubio can plausibly claim to represent is old white guys." This is not a surprise. It isn't new. People jostle over these questions of identity all the time: Sarah Palin isn't a real woman; Barack Obama isn't really black.

But a very diverse democracy makes ambiguous, line-crossing identities an asset. And Rubio presents the most intriguing kind of biography to the race.

In fact, Rubio is running on his biography more than he is running on position papers, which is a good move. The heart of his campaign announcement speech wasn't a list of policy proposals, it was a story about being an immigrant, about being working class, about rising to a position of prestige and power. Most of Rubio's big speeches are variations on themes drawn from his biography.

The multiplicity of Rubio's identities doesn't make him illegible, it makes him intriguing. And it gives different groups of voters different ways of relating to him.

Rubio traverses a wide range of experience in his economic background. "My father became a bartender. My mother a cashier, a maid, and a Kmart stock clerk. They never made it big. But they were successful. Two immigrants with little money or education found stable jobs, owned a home, retired with security, and gave all four of their children a life far better than their own," he says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In American Son and some speeches, he talks about the burden of student loan debt that crushed his monthly budget as a young father and that seemed to be leading him away from his dream of pursuing a life in public service. And yet, Rubio proved more than successful at rising.

This diversity of experience extends to his religion, where Rubio manages to present himself almost simultaneously as a lifelong ethnic Catholic, an Evangelical convert, and a Catholic convert. And that's because basically, he is those things. He was raised Catholic. But he and his wife eventually began attending an Evangelical church where she grew spiritually, and they heard the Biblical preaching they hungered for. And then he can talk about his attachment to the liturgical life and sacraments of the Roman Church.

A few listeners will find this all a bit too exotic, or even confused. But when he conveys these stories he can touch on little details that ring in a very personal way with different groups of voters. They hear something of their own story in his, and then they hear something more.

This is what presidents do. John F. Kennedy managed to be the first electable Catholic candidate for president, and could connect to the massive pool of voters who descended from the Great Wave of Immigration in the late 19th century. But the Kennedys lived in a style and fashion that was far removed from the hardscrabble roots of Al Smith, the former New York governor and unsuccessful presidential candidate. Smith seemed to stink of New York's fish markets. Kennedy lived like a WASP scion.

Barack Obama's identity was similarly mixed by the circumstances of his birth. He was black and white. He was raised in Hawaii, where racial politics were entirely different from those of America's South or cities. But he had adopted Chicago as his home, and put himself at the center of urban organizing.

Like Obama and Kennedy, Rubio seems to have sensed at an early age how his personal identity could make for an attractive political persona, and then shaped his resume, his policy-profile, and experiences to emphasize the point. Politics at this level is almost like a casting call. The life of a nation is a kind of drama and voters are the audience. Politicians put themselves forward as a stage-character, a protagonist who can meet the moment.

As a protagonist in America's drama, Rubio's role is to represent the rise of the last great wave of immigration to this country, and his role is to reconcile the Republican Party with the future that includes these immigrants and their descendants not just as beneficiaries of America's generous immigration policy and dynamic economy, but as full Americans with a full say in the nation's future.

That older white Republican voters like Marco Rubio is only going to help Marco Rubio. He gives them hope that their ideals will outlive the Nixon-Reagan coalition. And the voters that matter in battleground states are not always so ideological as journalists think.

There is no chance that, like Ana Marie Cox, voters will quickly roll through a known rolodex of Rubio's political positions and then re-classify him as old, rich, and white. People in a diverse democracy want "one of us" to represent them; sympathetic voters will find the part of Rubio that matches their own self-conception.

Of course there is an element of fakery to political personas at this level. Rubio's own biography is sometimes messier than presented. But fakers have a way of becoming what they present, at least in America.

In Marco Rubio vs. Jeb Bush fight, will other GOP candidates compete in Florida's March 15 primary? // Miami Herald // Adam C. Smith – May 31, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Leave it to Florida to host the best political soap opera of the presidential campaign.

The mega-state that all but delivered the Republican nomination to Mitt Romney in 2012 and John McCain in 2008, likely won't reprise that role again because as many as two dozen states will weigh in before Florida. But the March 15 Sunshine State primary is shaping up as potentially spectacular theater nonetheless.

Jeb Bush versus Marco Rubio.

Two Florida favorite sons, longtime friends, mentor and protege, near neighbors in Miami-Dade facing off in America's most important battleground state. What many viewed as almost unthinkable a few months ago — Rubio beating Bush among Florida Republicans — no longer seems far-fetched.

Other leading candidates already are pondering whether even to compete in Florida's primary.

"I don't think there's a state out there we wouldn't play in — other than maybe Florida, where Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio are in some of the polls essentially tied, and they are going to eat up a good amount of that financial advantage that Gov. Bush is going to have," Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said on Laura Ingraham's radio show last week.

We may see a preview of that Bush/Rubio campaign contrast Tuesday at Disney World when Gov. Rick Scott hosts an "economic summit" that will include speeches by presidential prospects Bush, Rubio, Govs. Walker, Chris Christie of New Jersey, Rick Perry of Texas and Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who now lives in Florida's Panhandle.

That so many candidates would commit to a forum hundreds of miles away from early voting states like Iowa and New Hampshire is testament to Florida's lofty status as a critical battleground and fundraising mecca. But Florida is treading on new ground this election cycle in fielding two frontrunners for the GOP nomination and deciding for the first time in several cycles against holding one of the earliest primaries in the country.

In 2008 and 2012, state Republican leaders blatantly defied national party rules by holding earlier-than-allowed primaries, arguing that the country's biggest and most diverse battleground state deserved more say in picking the major party nominees. The Republican National Committee responded by cutting in half the number of delegates, but that didn't stop the leading candidates from campaigning ferociously in Florida.

This year, with Bush looking increasingly likely to run, Republican legislative leaders chose not to risk losing Sunshine State delegates. Ultimately it takes about 1,235 delegates to win the nomination.

Florida legislators earlier this year scheduled the primary for March 15, the earliest date in which a state can hold a "winner-take-all" primary. That means whoever wins the primary would win all 99 of Florida's delegates. Another candidate could spend millions, fall just behind the winner, and walk away with zero delegates.

At the time that was widely seen as a gift to Bush. Now, with Rubio off to a strong early start and Bush struggling to generate widespread excitement with the base of the party, it's not so clear.

"The winner-take-all primary was a very good thing for Jeb — before Marco got in," said Ana Navarro, a Bush supporter in Miami who is friendly with both. "When people, including me, were calling their legislators, telling them to make it winner-take-all, we were all still under the mistaken impression that Marco wasn't going to run."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The cost of campaigning in winner-take-all Florida provides a significant incentive for candidates to focus their efforts elsewhere. But that's a risk, too.

"Tactically, looking past Florida could make sense to some of the other candidates not named Jeb or Marco," said Republican strategist Kevin Madden. "But Florida, as a major swing state, is still an important test for any candidacy looking to make an argument that you can win a general. It puts a lot of pressure on a campaign to really perform in Ohio and the other contests."

Eight months is an eternity in presidential politics, and the landscape is likely to look far different by the time any actual voting begins next year. Former 2012 Republican frontrunners Rick Perry, Herman Cain, Michele Bachmann and Newt Gingrich can attest to how quickly the ground can shift.

Making it even harder for 2016 candidates to decide whether or not to spend time and money in Florida is the prevalence of early voting. Florida's primary may be in mid-March, but half the votes will be cast by then. Overseas absentee ballots start going out by Jan. 30 — before Iowa voters cast a single vote — and in-state mail ballots are sent starting Feb. 9.

Not only should Florida's primary feel different from its recent contests, but so should the entire primary season.

Party leaders concluded that the protracted and contentious 2012 primary season put Mitt Romney at a disadvantage heading into the general election. The mandate for 2016 was fewer debates and a shorter primary season. Rather than a late August nominating convention like Tampa hosted, the 2016 convention will be July 18-21 in Cleveland.

The season is expected to kick off in February, rather than January. And after the initial four states cast their votes, the campaign for the nomination is likely to be defined by a series of election days featuring multiple states voting.

Come March 15, Florida probably will share the stage with Ohio, Missouri and Illinois.

"It's not going to be longer, it's going to be more intense," Sean Spicer, communications director for the RNC, said of the 2016 nominating season.

Florida won't be the first big prize after the earliest contests in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina, as it was in the last two presidential election. By March 15, at least 20 states will have voted and probably half of all the available delegates awarded. March 1 is expected to serve as a Southern primary with half a dozen or so states voting.

All those pre-Florida states, however, will allocate their delegates proportionally rather than winner-take-all, which means no candidate may have a big lead in delegates by March 15.

Another huge question for 2016? Money versus momentum. The advent of political committees accepting unlimited contributions and billionaires bankrolling campaigns has knocked aside some of the old assumptions about presidential campaigns and made it easier for candidates to keep pushing ahead into state after state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“In the past, if you couldn’t raise money, couldn’t raise enough donations of $2,500 or less, that told you something politically,” said Republican strategist John Weaver, another veteran of several presidential campaigns. “Now you only need one person to back you up and you can go deep into the calendar whether you deserve to or not politically.”

Bush is expected to have a vast fundraising advantage over the rest of the field, which means he likely would have the resources for a long slog of a campaign. Even an unlimited campaign account is not necessarily enough to overcome a string of losses, however.

Rubio has at least two billionaires, Oracle founder Larry Ellison of California and auto dealer and former Philadelphia Eagles owner Norman Braman of Miami, supporting his campaign.

The 2016 primary calendar is in constant flux and will remain so for months, but Republican campaign officials say the rough, tentative schedule leading to Florida is shaping up along these lines:

Feb. 1: Iowa

Feb. 9: New Hampshire

Feb. 20: South Carolina

Feb. 23: Nevada

March 1: Georgia, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Massachusetts, Vermont, Minnesota, possibly Alabama, Wyoming, Virginia

March 5: Kansas, Louisiana, possibly Washington State

March 8: Hawaii, Idaho, Michigan, Mississippi, possibly North Carolina and American Samoa

March 12: Virgin Islands, Guam, Puerto Rico

March 15: Florida, Ohio, Missouri, Illinois, possibly Northern Mariana Islands

Trump: I won’t do straw poll if everyone backs out // The Des Moines Register // Josh Hafner – June 1, 2015

Donald Trump, the reality TV star, businessman and serial flirter with presidential campaigns, recently announced that he’ll declare his 2016 ambitions on June 16 in New York City.

Before he heads to Iowa this week with visits in Mason City and Coralville, Trump spoke with The Des Moines

Register about the Iowa Straw Poll, his “beautiful” solution to the Islamic State, and discerning between celebrity and political appeal.

Are you going to announce that you’re running for president this month?

A lot of people think that now. Don’t forget they never did think it. I do well in the polls and nobody thinks I’m running. The theme of my campaign is “Make America Great Again.” We’re going to make America great again. That’s what people want.

When you’re Iowa testing the waters, how do you gauge whether these big crowds you draw are people wanting to see a reality TV star or wanting to see someone they think could run the country?

I don’t know the answer to that. You say to yourself: “Does it translate?” It may not translate, I don’t know. But I know one thing that translates: The politicians — and I know all of them — they’re never going to make this country great.

You’re doing well enough in polls now to nab a spot in the televised presidential debates. In our latest Iowa Poll, however, 85 percent of likely GOP caucusgoers said they would “never” support you for president.

That’s because they don’t think I’m running. When they think I’m running, they go through the roof. I see it even on Twitter. I have millions of people on Twitter and Facebook, like 6 million people on Twitter and Facebook. They say: “Please run, but if you don’t run, well, just leave me alone.” You know, it’s sort of interesting. But they want me to run.

You’re getting better numbers in some polls than several candida—

I’m the most successful person ever to run for the presidency, by far. Nobody’s ever been more successful than me. I’m the most successful person ever to run. Ross Perot isn’t successful like me. Romney — I have a Gucci store that’s worth more than Romney.

What’s your commitment to the Iowa Straw Poll, here?

If people got together and wanted the Iowa Straw Poll, I’m fine with it. But it looks to me like it’s not doing so well right now. If it’s good for Iowa and good for the poll itself, I think it’s an institution, I’d be in favor of it.

So you might not play in the Iowa Straw Poll if enough players don’t show up?

Well if everyone’s going to drop out? What’s the purpose? It loses its meaning, you understand that.

Specifically, what would you do to address the Islamic State (ISIS) in Iraq and Syria?

I have an absolute way of defeating ISIS, and it would be decisive and quick and it would be very beautiful. Very surgical.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Military on the ground? Drone strikes?

If I tell you right now, everyone else is going to say: “Wow, what a great idea.” You’re going to have 10 candidates going to use it and they’re going to forget where it came from. Which is me.

Do you have advisers on issues like this?

With very successful people, we sort of have our own ideas. A lot of people hire consultants. Well, if the consultant's so smart, why aren’t they rich?

Senate to Take Up Spy Bill as Parts of Patriot Act Expire // NYT // Jennifer Steinhauer – June 1, 2015

WASHINGTON — The Senate will reconvene at midday on Monday to consider changes to a House bill that would curtail the government’s authority to sweep up vast quantities of phone records after the program, which began after the 2001 terrorist attacks, expired at 12:01 a.m.

Senator Rand Paul, Republican of Kentucky, blocked an extension of it during an extraordinary and at times caustic Sunday session of the Senate.

Hamstrung by procedural rules that require the consent of all lawmakers, the Senate is unable to restore the lapsed authorities until at least Tuesday. The Senate was on recess last week.

After senators pass a procedural measure on Monday to consider the House bill, they will begin amending it, a process that could take one to three days.

Mr. Paul’s stand may have forced the temporary expiration of parts of the post-9/11 Patriot Act used by the National Security Agency to collect phone records, but he was helped by the miscalculation of Senator Mitch McConnell, the majority leader, who sent the Senate on a weeklong vacation after blocking the House bill before Memorial Day.

Mr. McConnell, also of Kentucky, relented on Sunday, setting up a final round of votes on Tuesday or Wednesday that will most likely send a compromised version of the House bill to President Obama for his signature. Even Mr. Paul, using the procedural weapon of an objection, conceded he could not stop that.

“Little by little, we’ve allowed our freedom to slip away,” Mr. Paul said during a lengthy floor soliloquy.

The expiration of surveillance authority demonstrates a profound shift in American attitudes since the days after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, when national security was pre-eminent in both parties. Fourteen years after that attack, even as American conflicts continue abroad, a swell of privacy concerns stemming from both the vast expansion of communication systems and an increasing distrust of government’s use of data has turned those concerns on their head.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While it would represent a retrenchment on the part of the government, it does not end the argument over the dual imperatives of security and individual liberty brought to light by Edward J. Snowden, the former contractor for the National Security Agency.

The expiration of three key provisions of the Patriot Act means that, for now, the N.S.A. will no longer collect newly created logs of Americans' phone calls in bulk. It also means that the F.B.I. cannot invoke the Patriot Act to obtain, for new investigations, wiretap orders that follow a suspect who changes phones, wiretap orders for a "lone wolf" terrorism suspect not linked to a group, or court orders to obtain business records relevant to an investigation.

However, the Justice Department may invoke a so-called grandfather clause to keep using those powers for investigations that had started before June 1, and there are additional workarounds investigators may use to overcome the lapse in the authorizations.

Mr. McConnell and other national security hawks who failed to continue the program badly underestimated the shift in the national mood, which has found its voice with Democrats and the libertarian wing of the Republican Party. The moment also put him at odds with Mr. Paul, whom he has endorsed for president.

"I remain determined to work toward the best outcome for the American people possible under the circumstances," Mr. McConnell said. "This is where we are, colleagues — a House-passed bill with some serious flaws, and an inability to get a short-term extension to improve the House bill."

Mr. Paul's effort clearly angered many of his Republican colleagues, who met without him an hour before the Senate began to vote Sunday night. Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who sparred with Mr. Paul on the floor over procedure, said later that Mr. Paul was not fit for the White House job he seeks. "I've said on many occasions that I believe he would be the worst candidate we could put forward," he said.

Even as senators were trickling into the Capitol from the airport, Mr. McConnell attempted to extend some aspects of the law. He asked senators to consider a two-week continuation of the federal authority to track a "lone wolf" terrorism suspect not connected to a state sponsor and to conduct "roving" surveillance of a suspect, rather than of a phone number alone, to combat terrorists who frequently discard cellphones.

But Mr. Paul objected, and Mr. McConnell denounced from the Senate floor what he called "a campaign of demagoguery and disinformation" about the program.

Mr. McConnell then moved to a second option, a procedural move to take up the bill passed by the House, which he said the Senate would amend this week. It was unclear Sunday how many amendments, including any from Mr. Paul, would be considered and whether any could pass the Senate or be adopted by the House.

The House bill would overhaul the Patriot Act and scale back the bulk collection of phone records revealed by Mr. Snowden. Under the provisions of the House bill, sweeps that had operated under the guise of so-called national security letters issued by the F.B.I. would end. The data would instead be stored by the phone companies and could be retrieved by intelligence agencies only after approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court.

President Obama and his director of national intelligence, James R. Clapper Jr., have made dire warnings in recent days about the perils of letting the law expire and called for immediate approval of a surveillance bill passed by the House. The C.I.A. director, John O. Brennan, echoed the president on Sunday during an interview on the CBS show "Face the Nation," saying there had "been a little too much political grandstanding."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a statement issued Sunday night, the White House said: “We call on the Senate to ensure this irresponsible lapse in authorities is as short-lived as possible. On a matter as critical as our national security, individual senators must put aside their partisan motivations and act swiftly. The American people deserve nothing less.”

Speaker John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, also urged the Senate to act, citing the threat of groups like the Islamic State. “Al Qaeda, ISIL and other terrorists around the globe continue to plot attacks on America and our allies,” Mr. Boehner said in a statement. “Anyone who is satisfied with letting this critical intelligence capability go dark isn’t taking the terrorist threat seriously.”

Mr. McConnell had sought to get a series of short-term extensions passed so that Congress could continue to work on a compromise — like giving the phone companies more time to adapt to the new law — but that effort collapsed under the objections of Mr. Paul and two Democrats, Ron Wyden of Oregon and Martin Heinrich of New Mexico. Further, members of the House rejected extending the current law, given the support for their bill.

After a middle-of-the-night vote for a short-term extension failed on the Saturday before Memorial Day, senators left for a weeklong recess as the clock ticked. Senate Republican leaders sought a compromise that would make a new bill acceptable to both hawkish lawmakers and Mr. Paul. “I still have deep concerns,” said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine.

Over the week, negotiators on the House and Senate Intelligence Committees had laid out a series of options to revise the bipartisan USA Freedom Act, including the addition of a certification process to ensure that the technology is ready to move metadata storage to the phone companies and allowing for a longer transition to phone company storage of the data. The House negotiators were skeptical of all efforts.

Democrats were critical of Mr. McConnell on Sunday. “The job of the leader is to have a plan,” Senator Harry Reid of Nevada said on the Senate floor. “In this case, it is clear the majority leader simply didn’t have a plan.”

Muslim Woman Denied Job Over Head Scarf Wins in Supreme Court // NYT // Adam Liptak - June 1, 2015

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday revived an employment discrimination lawsuit against Abercrombie & Fitch, which had refused to hire a Muslim woman because she wore a head scarf.

“This is really easy,” Justice Antonin Scalia said in announcing the decision from the bench.

The company at least suspected that the woman, Samantha Elauf, wore the head scarf for religious reasons, Justice Scalia said, and its decision not to hire her was motivated by a desire to avoid accommodating her religious practice. That was enough, he concluded, to allow her to sue under federal employment discrimination law.

The vote was 8-to-1, with Justice Clarence Thomas dissenting.

The case started in 2008, when Ms. Elauf, then 17, applied for a job in a children’s clothing store owned by Abercrombie & Fitch at the Woodland Hills Mall in Tulsa, Okla. She wore a black head scarf but did not say why.

The company declined to hire her, saying her scarf clashed with the company’s dress code, which called for a “classic East Coast collegiate style.” After the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission sued on Ms. Elauf’s behalf, the company said it had no reason to know that Ms. Elauf's head scarf, a hijab, was required by her faith.

In its Supreme Court brief in the case, E.E.O.C. v. Abercrombie & Fitch Stores, No. 14-86, the company argued that job applicants should not be allowed "to remain silent and to assume that the employer recognizes the religious motivations behind their fashion decisions."

After the case was argued in February, an Abercrombie spokesman said the company "has a longstanding commitment to diversity and inclusion, and consistent with the law has granted numerous religious accommodations when requested, including hijabs."

The Supreme Court ruled that Ms. Elauf did not have to make a specific request for a religious accommodation to obtain relief under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits religious discrimination in hiring.

At the trial, Ms. Elauf said she loved movies, shopping, sushi and the mall. "It's like my second home," she said. Her experience with Abercrombie, she said, made her feel "disrespected because of my religious beliefs."

"I was born in the United States," she said, "and I thought I was the same as everyone else."

A jury awarded Ms. Elauf $20,000.

But the United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit, in Denver, ruled for the company.

"Ms. Elauf never informed Abercrombie prior to its hiring decision that she wore her head scarf, or 'hijab,' for religious reasons," Judge Jerome A. Holmes wrote for the court.

Supreme Court Overturns Conviction in Online Threats Case // NYT // Adam Liptak – June 1, 2015

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday made it harder to prosecute people for threats made on Facebook and other social media, reversing the conviction of a Pennsylvania man who directed brutally violent language against his estranged wife.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., writing for the majority, said that prosecutors must do more than prove that reasonable people would view statements as threats. The defendant's state of mind matters, the chief justice wrote, though he declined to say just where the legal line is drawn.

Chief Justice Roberts wrote for seven justices. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. voted with the majority, though he said that a defendant's recklessness should suffice. The majority opinion took no position on that possibility.

"Attorneys and judges are left to guess," Justice Alito wrote.

Justice Clarence Thomas issued a similar criticism in his dissent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Our job is to decide questions, not create them," he wrote. "Given the majority's ostensible concern for protecting innocent actors, one would have expected it to announce a clear rule—any clear rule. Its failure to do so reveals the fractured foundation upon which today's decision rests."

The case concerned threatening rap lyrics that arose from domestic troubles. Anthony Elonis, a Pennsylvania man who had adopted the rap persona Tone Dougie, posted long tirades in the form of rap lyrics on Facebook.

Mr. Elonis wrote that he would like to see a Halloween costume that included his wife's "head on a stick." He talked about "making a name for myself" with a school shooting, saying, "Hell hath no fury like a crazy man in a kindergarten class." He fantasized about killing an F.B.I. agent.

Some of the posts contained disclaimers or indications that they aspired to be art or therapy. At Mr. Elonis's trial, his estranged wife testified that she understood the posts as threats.

"I felt like I was being stalked," she said. "I felt extremely afraid for mine and my children's and my family's lives."

Mr. Elonis was convicted under a federal law that makes it a crime to communicate "any threat to injure the person of another." He was sentenced to 44 months.

The Supreme Court has said that "true threats" are not protected by the First Amendment, but it has not been especially clear about what counts as such a threat.

The question for the justices in the case, Elonis v. United States, No. 13-983, was whether prosecutors had done enough to prove Mr. Elonis's intent. Prosecutors had argued that the words and their context were enough, saying that people should be held accountable "for the ordinary and natural meaning of the words that they say in context."

Mr. Elonis's lawyers said more was required. Ideally, they said, prosecutors should have to prove that the speaker's purpose was to threaten someone. Failing that, they said, prosecutors should at least have to prove that the speaker, whatever his or her purpose, knew that it was virtually certain that someone would feel threatened.

The lower courts sided with the government. All the prosecution had to prove, the trial judge ruled, was that a "reasonable person" would foresee that others would view statements "as a serious expression of an intention to inflict bodily injury or take the life of an individual."

"This is distinguished," the judge said, "from idle or careless talk, exaggeration, something said in a joking manner or an outburst of transitory anger."

Caitlyn Jenner, Formerly Bruce, Introduces Herself in Vanity Fair // NYT // Ravi Somaiya – June 1, 2015

In April, Bruce Jenner spoke about her transition to being a woman in a television special that drew nearly 17 million viewers.

On Monday, that woman revealed her new identity, appearing as Caitlyn Jenner on the cover of Vanity Fair. The photograph of Ms. Jenner in a corset, shot by Annie Leibovitz and accompanied by the headline "Call Me Caitlyn," immediately became a sensation on social media when the magazine posted the article online.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ms. Jenner, 65, who won an Olympic gold medal in the decathlon, has had a long public life. As Bruce Jenner, she had been on the cover of Playgirl, an author, an actor and most recently a part of the Kardashian family's reality television empire. Earlier this year, reports emerged that Bruce Jenner was in the process of becoming a woman.

The Vanity Fair article represents the latest in a carefully calibrated series of public steps by Ms. Jenner and her team, as she moves toward the debut of a new reality show on the E! network that will begin at the end of July, and a new public life as a woman. A Twitter account, in the name of Caitlyn Jenner, was started at the same time that the Vanity Fair article was published online. Within hours, the account had more than 1.1 million followers.

When asked about the perception from some that the article was part of an orchestrated campaign by Ms. Jenner, Vanity Fair's editor, Graydon Carter, said that "all stories are part of some coordinated rollout, all stories everywhere," citing movie releases and even presidential campaigns.

The article was written by Buzz Bissinger, a Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter and the author of the acclaimed book "Friday Night Lights," about a high school football team in Texas. The magazine had first thought of running an article on Ms. Jenner last year, a spokeswoman said, but it began taking shape this year when a publicist for Ms. Jenner contacted an editor at Vanity Fair.

A truly news-making magazine cover story has become increasingly rare in the digital age, though Mr. Carter said that the covers of magazines remain cultural touchstones. (The online rollout of the article seemed to tacitly acknowledge that rarity; the physical copy of the magazine with Ms. Jenner on the cover won't be available at newsstands until June 9. The online version of the article could be purchased for $4.99, and the website had broken its traffic record in just a few hours, with more than 6 million unique visitors.)

Vanity Fair went to extraordinary lengths to keep its scoop a secret, a spokeswoman said.

Only a few people at the magazine knew about the article. It was held on a computer that was kept in a locked office and not connected to the magazine's server. There was security at the photo shoot and at the plant where the magazine is printed.

Mr. Bissinger said in a telephone interview that he was assigned to write the article because "of the sports connection, and my own journey into the world of cross-dressing," referring to a revealing article he wrote for GQ magazine in 2013 in which he detailed his fondness for designer clothing intended for both genders.

He first met with Ms. Jenner in February, he said, and was allowed "pretty much carte blanche to be there, to soak him up, to have access to other people in his life," he said. "It was the kind of journalism you don't see any more." Mr. Carter said the magazine was not forced to leave any details out.

Mr. Bissinger, who describes himself in the article as "a cross-dresser with a big-time fetish for women's leather," wrote that he spent hundreds of hours with Ms. Jenner over three months, and that it was an occasionally surreal experience.

Ms. Jenner had started to make the transition in the 1980s, the Vanity Fair article reveals, shortly after winning the gold medal at the Montreal Olympics in 1976. Even as she traveled the United States, making speeches and starring in commercials, she wore pantyhose and a bra underneath her suit. She stopped, fearful of the public reaction, but began again recently when her marriage to Kris Jenner, the matriarch of the Kardashians, ended.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If I was lying on my deathbed and I had kept this secret and never did anything about it, I would be lying there saying, ‘You just blew your entire life,’ ” she told Mr. Bissinger. Bruce Jenner was always lying, she said; Caitlyn can be honest.

“Is she doing a TV show? Sure,” Mr. Bissinger said. “Is she doing it for money personally? Sure. This is America. But I saw a person transformed into a woman, who is joyous and happy and free and living life in a way that Bruce Jenner never did.”

California Senate votes to raise state minimum wage to $13 in 2017 - LA Times // LA Times // Patrick McGreevy – June 1, 2015

The state Senate on Monday approved a bill that would raise the minimum wage in California from $9 to $11 an hour on Jan. 1 and boost it again to $13 in 2017, with supporters saying it is necessary to lift millions of workers out of poverty.

Sen. Mark Leno (D-San Francisco) introduced the measure out of concern that a quarter of the state’s 38 million residents live in poverty, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

“It is time that we make it illegal to pay sub-poverty wages in California,” Leno told his colleagues during the heated floor debate.

He said the wage increase would boost the economy because working families would be able to spend more money at local businesses. “Its going to be spent immediately to meet daily needs in our community," he said.

The Senate approved the bill on a 23-15 party line vote.

Sen. Jeff Stone (R-Murrieta) predicted raising the minimum wage would force businesses to cut their number of workers. The proposal “hurts the economy by causing job losses," he said.

Added, Sen. Tom Berryhill (R-Modesto), “Minimum wage was never meant to be a living wage. It is a start-up wage for kids.”

An employee working full time and earning $9 per hour takes home $18,000 annually before taxes, Leno said, noting that is 75% of the federal poverty line for a family of four.

A bill approved two years ago has the minimum wage increasing to $10 on Jan. 1 in California. His new bill would have set raises and then increase wages with the rate of inflation starting in 2019.

Leno failed to win legislative approval last year of a bill similar to his new proposal. But since then, action has been taken by some California cities, including Los Angeles, where the City Council is scheduled this week to boost the city's minimum wage to $10.50 on July 1, 2016, and then gradually increase it to $15 in 2020. San Francisco recently approved a phased-in minimum wage increase that tops out at $15 in 2018

California’s bill also gained momentum after minimum wage ballot measures passed in Alaska, Arkansas, Nebraska and South Dakota, which are more politically conservative states. Lower wages force the state to provide financial assistance to families, he said.

"We taxpayers subsidize employers who pay sub-poverty wages," Leno said before the vote to approve his bill, SB 3, which now goes to the Assembly for consideration.

Islamic State Advances Further Into Syria's Aleppo Province // WSJ // Raja Abdulrahim – June 1, 2015

BEIRUT—Fierce battles raged between Islamic State and rebel fighters in Syria's Aleppo province on Monday, the day after the militant group seized villages close to the Turkish border and came within miles of the main highway connecting Syria's largest city to Turkey.

Fighting sprawled along a 35-mile front line as rebels worked to stop the advance of the extremist militant group, which is now just 7 miles from the main supply route for aid and weapons coming from Turkey.

In Aleppo villages seized by Islamic State, the group beheaded several rebel fighters and took some of their family members hostage, said Col. Abu Firas, a former Syrian air-force colonel who defected and now serves as spokesman for the Levant Front, a local coalition of rebel groups.

Turkish officials expressed concern Monday, as the group advanced within 30 miles of Bab es-Salam, one of the main border crossings between Syria and Turkey.

Also known as Oncupinar, Bab es-Salam is the gateway to the Turkish border city of Kilis, a way station for jihadists making their way in and out of Syria.

Turkey closed the crossing in early March, citing security concerns. It reopened in May to commercial trucks and humanitarian aid deliveries, but not to Syrian civilians wanting to cross into Turkey.

A Turkish official at the crossing said Turkey was preparing to receive an additional 60,000 Syrian refugees should the group manage to seize the Syrian cities of Mare and Tel Rifat, located about 13 miles from Kilis.

Rebels in northeast Aleppo have been fighting Islamic State for a year and a half in northeast Aleppo province. The battle has become a microcosm of Syria's increasingly complicated war, with rebels, Islamic State and the regime vying for territory on interconnected front lines.

In an increasingly partitioned country, areas controlled by Islamic State abut areas held by the regime and opposition, with civilians often caught in the middle of the warring sides' territorial gains and losses.

Islamic State's latest advance, in the wake of its May conquests of the strategic central Syrian city of Palmyra, and Ramadi, the capital of Iraq's largest province, showcases its growing strength against a fractious opposition and weakening Syrian regime forces.

Following the capture of Palmyra, the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, an opposition monitoring group, said Islamic State now controls 50% of Syria.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the heels of its speedy capture of Palmyra, the group's advance into Aleppo has rebel fighters questioning the U.S.'s commitment to containing the group.

"The dependability and seriousness of the West is questionable," said Ahmad Qura Ali, spokesman for the Aleppo-based Ahrar Al Sham faction.

The timing of Islamic State's Aleppo offensive has also prompted rebels to allege that it has been coordinating with the Syrian regime.

Opposition fighters had been planning to launch an offensive against regime forces in the city of Aleppo, in an attempt to finally win a yearslong battle of attrition that has severely damaged Syria's onetime economic hub.

But the arrival of Islamic State delayed those plans, as rebels scrambled Monday to divert reinforcements from the city to the new front lines.

Rebels said plans to strike regime strongholds in central Syria and the western coast, President Bashar al-Assad's ancestral homeland, have also been put on hold as fighters focus on curbing Islamic State's gains in the north.

"The timing of this serves the interests of the regime completely," Mr. Ali said.

Residents said Monday that government planes have increased their shelling of opposition-held areas in Aleppo city and province since April, killing and wounding hundreds of civilians.

What's actually in Obama's secret trade deal? // Politico // Michael Grunwald – June 1, 2015

Vietnam slaps tariffs of 70 percent on U.S. cars and machinery, 35 percent on U.S. chemicals, 30 percent on U.S. biscuits and baked goods, and 25 percent on U.S. recording equipment. Japan marks up our oranges 16 percent from June through November and 32 percent from December through May; it marks up our beef exports 38.5 percent all year long. Cars made in America face a 30 percent tariff in Malaysia, which might not seem stiff compared to 50 percent on motorcycles or 35 percent on plywood, except that cars made in Japan and other Asian nations don't face any tariff in Malaysia.

These burdensome overseas tariffs, provided to POLITICO by US Trade Representative Michael Froman, are the kind of problems President Obama hopes to address with the free trade deal known as the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which has not yet been finalized but has recently erupted into one of the most contentious topics on Washington's agenda.

The public debate has focused on the adequacy of TPP's environmental and labor safeguards, its potential to feather the nests of well-connected pharmaceutical, software and finance interests, and the secrecy of its negotiations. But the heart of the deal is an effort by the twelve participating countries to phase out tariffs and other export barriers for more than 11,000 categories of commodities, and Froman is frustrated that isn't getting more attention. In an interview with POLITICO, he said export-supported U.S. jobs pay 13 to 18 percent more than the average job, and argued that freer trade along the Pacific Rim would create a lot more of them.

So I asked if Froman would give me a rundown of actual tariffs he's trying to remove, and he agreed. Global tariffs are not secret information—they're kept on file at the World Customs Organization, and Froman has mentioned a few in speeches—but they're rarely seen in large quantities outside technical reports, and Froman hopes that taking a bunch of examples public will help build support for TPP. The deal is not done yet, so Froman can't discuss how much the various import restrictions he cited will be reduced, but the point of the negotiations is to reduce them. There are plenty of legitimate concerns about free trade and TPP that have nothing to do with tariffs, some of them highlighted in a critique in POLITICO last week by a Democrat who read a draft, but Froman believes most Americans would at least back the administration's efforts to tear down these tariffs.

"It's been a lot easier for our critics to focus on this controversial element or that controversial element, rather than what we're trying to achieve," Froman told me.

Froman and I spoke last Friday in his office a block from the White House; I noticed the 1934 law repealing the notorious Smoot-Hawley tariffs, which helped drag America into the Great Depression, hanging on the wall of his anteroom. Critics like New York Times columnist Paul Krugman and MIT economist Simon Johnson have suggested that TPP isn't really about breaking down Smoot-Hawley-style barriers, because previous trade deals over the last three decades have already created a low-tariff world. But while that's mostly true of the U.S., which imposes no duties on 70 percent of our imports—80 percent from TPP nations—Froman offered a slew of data and examples suggesting that's not always true abroad.

Overall, the U.S. imposes an average tariff of 1.4 percent on foreign goods, less than half the average for the rest of the nations Froman is negotiating with, barely a fourth the average in Vietnam and Malaysia. And it can get much worse for specific industries and products. TPP nations have tariffs ranging up to 100 percent on textiles, 87 percent on corn, and 75 percent on consumer goods, not to mention selected Japanese tariffs that amount to 189 percent on U.S. shoes and a don't-even-think-about-it 778 percent on U.S. rice above a certain annual quota.

Even our friendly trading partner to the north has some brutal anti-American protectionism on its books. The North American Free Trade Agreement of 1994 broke down a slew of barriers between the U.S. and Canada, but it exempted the poultry and dairy industries, which is why U.S. eggs face tariffs of up to 163.5 percent—and not less than 79.9 cents per dozen—in the land of ice hockey and eh. U.S. yogurt, milk, cheese, and frozen chicken all face tariffs between 237.5 percent and 249 percent in Canada.

In some TPP countries, tariffs not only make U.S. exports more expensive, they make U.S. exports more expensive relative to goods from other countries. For example, America's construction equipment only faces a 5 percent tariff in New Zealand, but construction equipment from Southeast Asia faces no tariffs there. Vietnam slaps tariffs of 20 percent on beauty and skin products from the U.S. while importing similar products from its Asian neighbors duty-free. Vietnam's tariffs for U.S. poultry are also twice as high as for Australian poultry, and its tariffs for switches, relays and fuses made in America are four times as high as for the same products made in China. Our polymers and tree nuts face similar discrimination in Malaysia, as do our aluminum bars and frozen potatoes in Japan. American vineyards are among the biggest losers from Japanese protectionism, facing a 50 percent wine tariff while their Chilean and Australian rivals face none.

Froman provided a wide-ranging list of categories where TPP countries still maintain tariffs, from health products to communications technologies to high-tech instruments to fish. The biggest category was agriculture, where U.S. farmers and ranchers face tariffs on apples, cotton, wheat, soybeans, fresh and processed vegetables, pork, feeds, and just about everything else. Overall, American exporters shipped more than $700 billion worth of stuff to TPP nations last year, so better access to TPP markets could bring a lot of additional revenue into the United States.

While global tariffs clearly have not disappeared, it's true that they're generally much lower than they were decades ago, even where they're much higher than ours. The U.S. already has bilateral trade deals with many TPP nations. But Froman says the TPP will also tear down the kind of "non-tariff barriers" that countries have used to protect their industries without violating the earlier deals, like sudden declarations that U.S. turkey products are unsafe for Australian consumers, or selective laws restricting U.S. express delivery services from doing business in Malaysia. The TPP is also expected to prohibit laws requiring foreign businesses to locate their computer servers in the country, as well as excessively burdensome regulations on global e-commerce. These kinds of barriers can be particularly troublesome in finance, data processing, engineering and other service industries where U.S. firms tend to be prominent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It must be said that removing some non-tariff barriers—for example, forcing TPP nations to respect patents for expensive U.S. pharmaceuticals, or copyrights for U.S. software—would not necessarily be good for the world's consumers. But they would be good for the U.S. industries in question. It should also be mentioned that some U.S. industries—notably textiles, footwear, sugar, and dairy—still enjoy trade protections that would be reduced through TPP. But Froman said the administration is working hard to make sure their concerns are addressed, and the textile industry actually came out in favor of the Trade Promotion Authority "fast-track" bill that is considered a prerequisite for TPP's passage.

Froman made TPP sound so rosy for U.S. companies that I finally asked him: What's in it for the other countries? The answer, he said, is a combination of improved access to U.S. markets, greatly improved access to Japan, the opportunity to lure U.S. businesses away from a restrictive China, and a kind of Good Housekeeping seal of approval as a member of the free-trade club. I also suggested to Froman that if TPP will really do so much more to lower trade barriers abroad, it must seem weird to his negotiating partners that the deal is so hotly disputed in the U.S., especially among members of Obama's party. He said the fraught domestic debate actually bolsters the U.S. negotiating position, because those partners are savvy enough to understand that a deal without strong support from the U.S. agriculture and business communities and strong labor and environmental protections would have no chance of passing.

"They follow our politics. They read POLITICO Pro," Froman said. "They know we're not bluffing, and that has helped us strengthen this deal."

Froman refused to discuss what the final TPP will do to any of the specific tariffs and general tariff categories we discussed, but he hinted that just about all of them will be cut or eliminated. In any case, when the deal is done, the text will be published at ustr.gov —and POLITICO will do a follow-up comparing the before and after tariffs on U.S. products.

"I cannot wait," Froman said. "It's going to clear up a lot of misconceptions."

The more the merrier: Democratic candidates for 2016 // CNN // Dan Pfeiffer – June 1, 2015

(CNN)This is something I don't find myself saying very often: I agree with Karl Rove.

In a recent post on Medium, the former strategist for President George W. Bush made the case that the historically large size of the GOP primary wasn't a disadvantage, rebutting some conventional wisdom that a 20-candidate field would be a net negative for the Grand Ole Party. There are so many candidates running that some have compared it to a clown car and not just because Donald Trump is thinking of running.

While the Democratic primary doesn't resemble the clown car nature of the Republican field (in part because it's not filled with clowns), it did get a little bigger this weekend, with former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley joining Hillary Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont in the race. And what Rove wrote about the Republicans is even more true of the Democrats. A competitive primary is not just not a disadvantage as Rove writes; it will actually be an advantage. A fight for the Democratic nomination is good for the party and will help us, not hurt us, next year in November.

First, competitive primaries make better general election candidates. As divisive, heated and long as the 2008 Democratic primary was, there is no question that Barack Obama was a much stronger nominee because of Clinton. He honed his skills as a candidate, sharpened his message and became a stronger debater. He learned how to take a punch and throw one right back. Most importantly, he faced political adversity time and again and learned how to handle it.

If Clinton is our nominee, which is at this point the overwhelmingly most likely scenario, she will be better prepared to take on Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio or whoever else the Republicans nominate because Sanders and O'Malley made her that way.

Second, competitive primaries make better general election campaigns. In 2008, Obama won Indiana, North Carolina and Virginia in large part because we ran hard in those states in the primaries. The primary gave us the opportunity to build large grass-roots organizations with well-trained organizers and volunteers.

We were able to try out our get out the vote machinery in almost every state in the country months before the election. Iowa and New Hampshire may decide the presidency in 2016, and the Democratic nominee will be better positioned to win those states because of the organizations built and tested in the primaries.

Finally, competitive primaries make better political parties. Many of the issues that have driven the Democratic Party in recent decades -- health care, the Bush tax cuts, the Bush wars -- have been largely resolved during the Obama presidency. The party is grappling a bit with what comes next -- with which issues and solutions are going to animate us as Democrats.

Unlike the Republicans, Democrats are not a collection of competing and often contradictory interests. We are unified, we know what we stand for and are confident in our ideals, but how do we apply those ideals to a new set of evolving challenges?

Historically, these questions have been answered in robust primary debates. If O'Malley and Sanders run good, idea-driven campaigns, there will be a robust debate about the future of the Democratic Party that will make us better in the 2016 general election and in years to come.

It's clear that the Clinton campaign understands this. They are running very hard and building the sorts of campaigns in Iowa and New Hampshire that are designed to win tough races. They are running like an underdog, not the biggest favorite in history.

There is an important caveat -- one that Rove hints at in his column about the Republican side: Competitive, hard-fought primaries are good until they aren't. There is a moment where they can go from competitive to irreparably divisive. The Obama-Clinton race came close to crossing that line a couple of times, but never did because both candidates worked hard to repair the breach.

There should be robust debate about ideas and issues, about who would make a better president and leader of the party. But when Democrats use Republican talking points to describe other Democrats, that crosses a line. If that happens, it will be incumbent on the whole party -- from President Obama on down -- to call foul. Fortunately, the risk of this primary getting out of hand is very small, given the individuals involved and the shared sense that winning this election is critical for the future of the issues that matter to Democrats.

Reporters, pundits and people who own television stations in places such as Iowa are rooting for a fight for the Democratic nomination, and Democrats should be, too. A competition, not a coronation, is what's best for our chances in 2016.

Why Hillary should stop running as the incumbent // WaPo // Joel Achenbach – June 1, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jack Shafer nailed it when he wrote recently in Politico that Hillary Clinton is not running for president, but running as president. She rarely takes a question from a reporter. News organizations spend a small fortune dispatching reporters and photographers and camera crews to follow her around, but they're treated like carry-on baggage.

One can understand why anyone in the Clinton camp would have a jaundiced view of the news media and might view news in general as something that should be planned and crafted in advance, protected against unsupervised nuances and unhelpful twists, and approved by at least four layers of management, including the candidate herself, Bill, the folks at the Foundation and their various foreign benefactors. I'm sympathetic, in other words. Still, the obvious downside is that it makes the candidacy uninteresting. As a citizen, you have to force yourself to pay attention. The Democrats don't have much of a contest, with all due respect to firing-on-both-cylinders candidates Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley.

Successful candidacies and successful presidencies have a point to them; inevitability isn't enough. Here's a question that I throw out in all sincerity: Why is Clinton running? No doubt she has explained her candidacy many times and in many ways, and I just missed those news reports (and I am not being sarcastic here, it's just, you know, I've been distracted by other stuff, like the destiny of the species and the fate of the universe and whatnot). She certainly has an impressive résumé and most folks who are not hard-core haters would view her as qualified to be president. But what's her candidacy about?

Those of us who have been around awhile remember the telling moment when Roger Mudd asked Teddy Kennedy why he wanted to be president. The senator fumbled the answer. The real answer was: Because he could. Because he might win. Because he was a Kennedy.

"Hillary: It's My Turn" is Clinton's campaign motto, my friend and colleague Marc Fisher joked the other day at a panel discussion at our alma mater.

Meanwhile, on the Republican side, there are 137 people running for president (including Lindsey Graham, who is announcing today). Do we have to pay attention to all these folks? No, not all of them. Not Donald Trump, for example. But the standard that should guide us is not how well a candidate is doing in the polls. Richard Just, another of the panelists, and the editor of National Journal, made a great point about news coverage of presidential candidacies: What they say matters, even if they have close to zero, or literally zero, chance of winning.

This is how political parties are shaped, Richard said. This is how a party defines itself and how ideas get into circulation even if they will take many years to gain traction. Goldwater was trounced in 1964, but his conservative ideals found their way to the White House when his acolyte Ronald Reagan won in 1980.

Dana Milbank correctly notes that many of Sen. Rand Paul's statements in recent months sound more like Democratic positions than Republican positions, and this will make it hard for Paul to capture his party's nomination. But I suspect he is playing a longer game. His people told me (when I did my profile on the senator) that they don't think the GOP can win a national presidential election unless they expand the coalition, bringing in more young people, minorities and people who are normally disaffected and don't go to the polls. The Republican candidate has won a popular-vote majority only once in the past six elections. That's likely a multi-election project. And it's why Paul is an interesting candidate — even if he's not likely to be the Republican nominee in 2016.

Populism Strains Both Parties; Can They Adapt? // WSJ // Gerald F. Seib – June 1, 2015

Is a third political party straining to break out in America?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Listen to the early sounds of the 2016 presidential campaign, in which candidates of the left and the right sound almost identical populist, anti-Wall Street, antiestablishment themes, and the idea doesn't seem so crazy.

When you have Republican presidential contenders opposing free-trade agreements, and at least one backing an increase in the minimum wage; when Democratic firebrand Bernie Sanders (technically an independent to begin with) is speaking to overflow crowds; and when left and right come together to halt a prominent national-security program backed by the foreign-policy establishment—well, something is going on.

Let's stipulate up front that a serious third party isn't likely to emerge, at least not in this cycle. A viable third party requires money and an outsize personality (think Ross Perot), and it isn't clear those elements exist right now.

Still, it's possible to see the ideological foundations for one. Similar populist refrains are coming from a diverse cast of political characters with real followings: Mr. Sanders and Sen. Elizabeth Warren on the left, and Rick Santorum, Mike Huckabee and Sen. Rand Paul on the right. Listen to the remarks of declared 2016 contenders and you can almost hear a potential third-party platform emerging. Here would be its main elements:

Big banks and Wall Street have too much power in Washington. "We have come to take our country back from the special interests that use Washington as their personal piggy bank," Mr. Paul said in opening his presidential campaign. Said Mr. Sanders: "When we talk about power, we talk about Wall Street. In my view, it is time to break up the largest financial institutions in this country."

The economic system is stacked against the middle class, and government policies are making that worse. In his announcement, Mr. Santorum referred to "workers" and "working families" a dozen times, and said they have suffered because of the policies of "big government and big business." He has broken with GOP orthodoxy by supporting a "modest" minimum-wage increase and continuation of the Export-Import Bank to bolster manufacturing.

Free-trade deals are bad for America and U.S. workers. Speaking from the right, Mr. Huckabee declared: "We don't create good jobs for Americans by entering into unbalanced trade deals that forgo congressional scrutiny, and then looking the other way as the law is ignored so that we can import low-wage labor, undercut American workers, and drive wages lower than the Dead Sea." From the left, Mr. Sanders declared: "The bottom line of these trade agreements is to force American workers to compete against people in countries around the world who make pennies on the hour."

Big money is corrupting politics. "Working families don't need another president tied to big government or big money," Mr. Santorum said in announcing his candidacy. Said Mr. Huckabeein announcing his: "I never have been and I'm not going to be the favored candidate of those in the Washington-to-Wall Street corridor of power." He added that his campaign will be "funded and fueled not by billionaires but by working people."

The U.S. is overextended abroad. "I am vigorously opposed to an endless, perpetual war in the Middle East," said Mr. Sanders. Said Mr. Paul: "Let's quit building bridges in foreign countries and use that money to build some bridges here at home."

Big brother is dangerous. The effort to stop the National Security Agency's collection of cellphone bulk data has, of course, become a signature issue of Mr. Paul, who has tied the Senate in knots over the issue and finds himself aligned with many liberals as a result. But he isn't alone; Mr. Huckabee said on Fox News over the weekend that U.S. officials should get a warrant before collecting phone data: "If this is so effective, how come it hasn't resulted in the foiled terrorist plots?"

Obviously, there are many core issues on which the antiestablishment forces of left and right disagree, climate change and the virtues of Obamacare prominent among them. Still, it's worth noting that Mr. Sanders packed a hall with 3,000 enthusiastic supporters over the weekend in Minneapolis, with more waiting outside because there wasn't room for them. Meantime, Mr. Santorum's overtures to the working class help show that the Republican Party now includes a sizable blue-collar, Wal-Mart wing.

At a minimum, mainstream candidates in both parties will have to hew to some populist themes emerging from the antiestablishment crowd. "There are votes in both primaries to be found for the candidates that say, 'We want to change the system and level the playing field,' " says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who helps conduct The Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll.

How to Kill the Background Briefing // National Journal // Ron Fournier – June 1, 2015

I've got a plan to bust the background briefing racket. Of the many ways that modern journalists cede power to authority, none is easier to fix than the notion that government officials are allowed to gather several reporters in a room or on a conference call, spew their clever lines of lies and spin, and declare it all "on background"—shielded from accountability "on condition of anonymity."

Reporters are increasingly allowing public relations teams to set the terms for coverage of politics, business, sports, and even entertainment. It's a troubling trend for an industry in flux. But the media in Washington are the most unnecessarily and dangerously cowed.

When reporters call the shots, anonymous sources are vital to uncovering government secrets and wrongdoing (Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein used Mark Felt and other whistleblowers to chase Richard Nixon out of office). When government officials call the shots, there is no incentive to tell the truth, no punishment for deception, and the journalism itself is diminished by canned news.

In rare cases, approved in advance by journalists, an anonymous source talking to a bunch of reporters might serve a public service. For instance, security details for a presidential trip to a war zone may need to be shared privately with the traveling media corps. Most editors would consider that a good case for a briefing that shields the identity of the government officials and embargoes news of the trip itself.

But in recent years, public relations officials have been allowed to assume that they get to decide the terms for briefing reporters, and what was one a unique courtesy is now a daily disservice to the public. Just last week, the Obama administration sought to to build public support for extending post-911 domestic spying programs it lied about until Edward Snowden blew the whistle.

The New York Times reported:

> "What you're doing, essentially, is you're playing national security Russian roulette," one senior administration official said of allowing the powers to lapse. That prospect appears increasingly likely with the measure, the USA Freedom Act, stalled and lawmakers in their home states and districts during a congressional recess.
> "We're in uncharted waters," another senior member of the administration said at a briefing organized by the White House, where three officials spoke with reporters about the consequences of inaction by Congress. "We have not had to confront addressing the terrorist threat without these authorities, and it's going to be fraught with unnecessary risk."

Now ask yourself: If these scare tactics are legitimate, why wouldn't administration officials allow their names to be public? (Josh Earnest had the chance today, and wouldn't.) When they refused, why would the Times and several other news organizations publish the quotes?

The standard rule for using anonymous sources, published in Associated Press stylebooks used in almost every newsroom, is: "Whenever possible, we pursue information on the record. When the source insists on background or off-the-record ground rules, we must adhere to a strict set of guidelines."

First, the material is information "and not opinion or speculation, and is vital to the news report." Second, the information is not available on the record. Third, the source is reliable.

The White House briefing was a total rule-breaker: 1) The material was opinion and speculation; 2) There is no shortage of on-the-record hyperbole about the National Security Agency program; 3) The Obama administration, like the Bush White House, routinely deceives the public about NSA's activities.

These are not credible sources.

Just last week, reporters wrote and broadcast material from a background briefing conducted by Hillary Clinton advisers who insisted they not be identified. This from Politico:

> At Clinton campaign headquarters, meanwhile, senior campaign officials told reporters Thursday at a background briefing that Hillary Clinton has not been damaged or distracted by the revelations about her family's foundation.

Again: If that paragraph is true (it's not), why wouldn't the Clinton advisers put their names behind it? Why did the media report anonymous, inaccurate spin? Google the Bush White House. Watch how the GOP presidential campaigns deal with the media. The background briefing is a bipartisan racket. So why do journalists let their sources get away with it?

Fear: Reporters and editors don't want to get beat by competitors who bow to the terms of a public relations team. They don't stop to realize very little news comes from these briefings, and none of it is worth ceding precious leverage to the government.

Habit: It's a lazy way out. I know, because it's a route I've taken. As a reporter and editor, I've also taken part in countless (and useless) protests against background briefings.

Vanity: There actually are some reporters who prefer anonymous sources over named ones, because they believe "on condition of anonymity" creates the perception that they're plugged into their beats. They're fooling themselves and, worse, their audiences.

Access: Reporters are increasingly kept apart from the people they cover. They don't recognize that the way to get access is by raising hell—by making yourself such a source of surprise and disruption that the people you cover realize they need to get to know you.

Jonathan Allen of Vox, one of the better reporters on the beat, explained why he accepted the Clinton ground rules last week. "These officials are people who could easily avoid interacting with reporters for the entire campaign if they chose," he wrote. "Given the option of talking to them or not, major news organizations chose the former."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I get it. I used to think that way. But I've learned over the years that I don't need to talk to campaign people. They need to talk to me. Freeze me out? Fine—that's just more time to talk to rival campaigns, political scientists, and the best sources on any campaign: voters.

Even the dimmest public relations officials eventually learn that they can't put a good reporter on ice and, even if they could, they would be freezing themselves out of the reporter's stories.

Second, why would I let the Clinton campaign—or any entity I cover—give me "the option" to choose? On this and so many other ways the media has ceded power, I say flip the script. Make them choose. Put them on the sorry end of a devil's choice.

Which gets me to my plan to bust the briefing racket.

If you're a reporter who gets sucked into a "background briefing," don't let anonymous spin creep into your stories. Ignore it (National Journal attended the Clinton briefing but didn't write it up). Or call it out, as John Harwood did here: "How's Hillary Doing? Wish We Could Tell You"

> Wish I could tell you more. But they said very little.
> Notice that I typed very little and not "very little," because under the ground rules of Thursday's briefing reporters were not allowed to quote their words directly.
> You're not missing much.

For all its understated brilliance, Harwood's column won't put a dent in the background briefing racket. It was, after all, a retroactive hit directed at just one PR team on behalf of just one reporter.

The media should be more proactive, like Adam Nagourney of The New York Times, who tweeted today the details of Clinton's presidential announcement event and directly attributed them to spokesman Jesse Ferguson. The aide had emailed the information to reporters, presuming that he could deem the material "on background."

Wrong.

If you're a reporter, go to your email now and write to the director of communications for whatever beat you cover – a campaign, an agency, a business, a sports team, whatever.

"Dear ____," your note starts.

> "I just wanted to remind you of a long tradition in journalism: Everything a reporter sees and hears is on the record and attributable directly to the source unless the reporter and source mutually agree in advance to other terms."
>
> "That means, of course, that every briefing I attend, in person or on conference call, will be on the record unless you get my permission in advance. (Knowing my editor's commitment to transparency and accountability, I suspect permission will only be granted in extreme cases.)"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congratulations. You just forced the PR types to choose: Do we want a briefing bad enough to play by this person's rules? The answer will almost always be yes, and when it's not, you won't miss much. Hell, you're a good enough reporter to find out what's said at briefings you don't attend.

You might want to add to your note:

> "Same applies to every email you send me. Writing "OFF THE RECORD" at the top doesn't make it so.
> "I'm always open to using anonymous sources, but only when we're dealing with important information (not spin) and when my editor and I determine it's in the best interest of our audience."

If you're an editor, consider giving your reporters cover (these are your rules, after all). Email the communications director at every beat your newsroom covers, and tell them:

> "If the briefing material is important and true, there's no good reason to hide the source's identity. Unless you get prior permission from one of my reporters, all briefings are on the record. Same for your emails.

Remind them who's in charge.

NYT The Upshot: G.O.P. Women in Congress: Why So Few? // NYT // Derek Willis – June 1, 2015

The rising number of women in Congress can obscure another trend: The number of Republican women has remained roughly stagnant for more than a decade.

Although women in both parties have increased their numbers in Congress during the past 25 years, the share of Democratic women — now nearly 33 percent — has continued to climb, while the Republican female share has leveled off since hitting 10 percent during the mid-2000s. And political polarization seems to be a major reason.

Moderate Republican women — think of Olympia Snowe, the former Maine senator, or Connie Morella, the former Maryland congresswoman — were once common in the party, according to research by Danielle Thomsen, a political scientist at Duke. But moderate Republicans of both genders are nearly gone from Congress today. Some conservative women, like Senator Joni Ernst of Iowa, have been elected, but there are relatively few of them in a traditional pipeline to Congress: state legislatures. In other words, the gap is likely to persist for some time.

As one measure of the gap, 17 Republican women have served in the Senate in its history, and 14 Democratic women currently serve in the Senate.

The pattern is part of a larger gender disparity in American politics, of course. In 2012, 55 percent of women voted for President Obama, while 52 percent of men voted for Mitt Romney, according to exit polls. The gap figures to continue, if not widen, in 2016, with Democrats seeming likely to nominate a woman for president and Republicans likely to nominate a man.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is plenty of research that the presence of women in legislative bodies makes a difference, particularly on the policies that many female lawmakers prioritize, such as health care and children's issues. Interviews with women in Congress by the Center for American Women and Politics have found that many see themselves as "surrogate representatives" for women in general.

A root cause of the gap is that Democratic women who are potential congressional candidates tend to fit comfortably with the liberal ideology of their party's primary voters, while many potential female Republican candidates do not adhere to the conservative ideology of their primary voters.

But it's not just moderate Republican women who have been affected by the polarization of the parties. "If you look at the moderate men, they're not there, either," she said, and conservative Democrats in state legislatures also aren't running for Congress.

Ms. Thomsen found that one in five Republican state legislators of either sex could be described as moderate, based on their voting history and donors, but moderates were not nearly as eager as conservatives to run for Congress.

Isn't the real reason there are less females in Congress the fact that less of them aspire to go into politics?

"Conservative Republican men and women state legislators are equally likely to run for Congress, but women are outnumbered five to one," Ms. Thomsen said.

Separate research, by Shauna Shames, a political scientist at Rutgers University, suggests that women with fiscally conservative and socially liberal views particularly struggle to find a party home. "A whole lot of women who could run are not running, because they know they will not be supported and don't feel that they fit in the party anymore," Ms. Shames said.

The Republican women who have run in congressional primaries over the past 25 years have been as conservative as Republican men, according to a study produced this year by Political Parity, a program that pushes for more women in Congress. (Ms. Thomsen and Ms. Shames both worked on the study). There simply have not been very many highly conservative female candidates, compared with men.

On the Democratic side, the situation is different. Female candidates for Congress were more liberal on average than their male counterparts, the study found, helping them do well in party primaries, which emphasize ideological purity.

Ms. Thomsen's research does suggest that the number of conservative women in Congress will increase in coming years, because the number of conservative women in state legislatures has recently risen, albeit slowly. The three most recently elected female Republican senators —

Ms. Ernst, Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia and Deb Fischer of Nebraska — are all conservative and all served in their state legislatures.

Yet the share of congressional Democrats who are female may also continue rising, which could keep the current gap from shrinking.

What is the logic behind state laws that deny the vote to people who have been convicted of a felony, even after they are released from prison? The short and easy answer is: there isn't any.

For a longer, nonsensical answer, ask Gov. Larry Hogan of Maryland, who on May 22 thwarted strong majorities in both houses of the state legislature to veto a bill that would have restored voting rights to about 40,000 Maryland residents currently on probation or parole.

Some of these people never went to prison at all. Those who did are now in the process of reintegrating themselves into their communities. Restoring their ability to have a say in choosing their elected representatives — the most fundamental of all democratic rights — should be an obvious element of that reintegration. But to Mr. Hogan, a Republican, people on probation or parole are "still serving their time as a debt to society for their actions," and so it is appropriate to continue to bar them from the ballot box.

This is terrible reasoning. Voting bans "defy the principles — of accountability and rehabilitation — that guide our criminal justice policies," as former Attorney General Eric Holder said last year in calling for their repeal.

There has never been a whit of evidence that restoring voting rights has any negative impact on society, and yet disenfranchisement laws have a long and often racist pedigree in American history. States passed them in the 19th century to block African-Americans from voting. Today about six million people nationwide are disenfranchised because of a criminal record, with blacks disproportionately burdened. In Maryland, nearly two-thirds of people who can't vote because of a felony conviction are African-American.

The governor's veto was all the more vexing given what has been happening in Baltimore, where residents — mostly poor people of color — have erupted in outbursts of anger and frustration because they feel they have little say in the direction of their communities. Mr. Hogan could have supported the law and reaffirmed that Maryland values the voices of all its citizens. Instead his veto means that 40,000 of them will have to wait until the Legislature reconvenes next January for a veto override vote.

Mr. Hogan's action is out of step not just with common sense, but with a growing segment of his own party. In recent years both red and blue states — from Texas to Connecticut to Alabama to New Mexico — have reduced or eliminated barriers to voting for people coming out of prison. Maryland ended its own lifetime ban on voting for those with felony convictions in 2007.

This is a moment of great promise for new efforts to reform the nation's criminal-justice system. Disenfranchising people who are already back in their communities is nothing but punitive and counterproductive, and dismantling such laws should be an easy call.

Congress Should Extend PATRIOT Act Provisions to Keep Us Safe //Medium // Jeb Bush – June 1, 2015

The failure of President Obama and the U.S. Congress to preserve key counterterrorism authorities before they expired is an abdication of their responsibility to protect the United States.

Today we have lost the metadata program, authorized by Section 215 of the USA PATRIOT Act, an important tool in helping law enforcement and the Intelligence Community connect the dots between known foreign terrorists and potential operatives in the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congress still has the opportunity to remedy this mistake and extend these important tools that have kept us safe. They should do so.

It is incredible that we would weaken our ability to protect the Homeland as ISIL, Al Shabbab, Al Qaeda, and other affiliated terrorist groups expand their reach.

Even President Obama, who spoke often about protecting civil liberties, supported these authorities as Senator and preserved the program when he came into office. Backing down in the face of liberal interest group pressure is just another failure of presidential leadership.

In 2013 new safeguards were put in place—including requiring the government to seek an individual court order every time it queried the database—but maintained the essential structure of a database of call records that can be searched in the event we have intelligence warnings of plots to the homeland.

That was the right call. Because in total, the PATRIOT Act has kept us safe, plain and simple.

Despite the fear-mongering of some, there is no evidence the bulk metadata program has ever been used to violate civil liberties.

The terrorist threat to the United States is growing. It is incredible that we would weaken our ability to protect the homeland as ISIL, Al Shabbab, Al Qaeda, and other affiliated terrorist groups expand their reach.

East Hampton Star (N.Y.): “Hillary Fever Grips Hamptons”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Lucia Akard

August 21, 2014, 12:38 p.m. EDT

Though Hillary Clinton was not expected at BookHampton until 5 p.m. on Saturday, the line to see her began to form that morning. Edna Lanieri-Dewitt, who was first in line, arrived at 10 a.m.

“I’m excited about just meeting her,” Ms. Lanieri-Dewitt said. “It’s a once in a lifetime opportunity, and I’m thrilled that she’s in this world.”

By 5 p.m., the line stretched down Main Street and wrapped around to John Papa’s Café on Park Place. The book signing was sold out by Friday, with all 1,000 tickets secured in advance by buying a copy of Mrs. Clinton’s book “Hard Choices” from BookHampton, said Charline Spektor, the store’s owner.

Mrs. Clinton began signing books a little after 5. Though she reportedly signs 400 books per hour, she still took the time to greet each person, even pausing to have conversations with some. She spoke to one woman about her injured leg, saying, “I broke my elbow a few years back and did physical therapy for it. Have you started physical therapy yet? I hope it goes well for you.” She also shared a moment with a friend, Patti Kenner, and the two posed for a photo.

The crowd was filled with admirers of Mrs. Clinton, many of whom were sporting “Ready for Hillary” stickers in reference to her presumed 2016 presidential campaign.

Barbara Macklowe, an East Hampton artist and author of the book “India In My Eyes,” said, “I never anticipated a line this long. . . . I think it’s because there are a lot of politically involved, liberal-minded people in this town.”

Ms. Macklowe met Mrs. Clinton previously at an event held by a women’s organization, and said she supports her because, “I think she’s the most impressive person I’ve ever heard speak.”

There were a few unexpected supporters waiting in line. Aubrey Peterson, who is 11, is already a big fan, and said that he was willing to wait all day to see Mrs. Clinton. “Meeting Hillary Clinton in like meeting the Queen of England,” he said.

A group of four British teenagers were also in line, unperturbed by the long wait. “We want to see her because she’s an inspirational woman. We really admire her success,” Bella Charlton said.

“I’ve been coming here for ages,” said Martha Meshoulam, “and Book?Hampton is the place to go. I want to support the bookstore and support printed books.”

Ms. Spektor was very pleased with the outcome of the event, and said “We are very honored that

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary Clinton put us into her schedule. She came to a bookstore, and that says a lot."

Ms. Spektor was notified that Mrs. Clinton would be coming to the store about six weeks ago, but said that she and her employees had "been crossing their fingers for over a year." Preparations for the event went smoothly, in part because of help from the East Hampton Village police.

"Chief Larsen and Captain Tracey couldn't have been kinder, and were enormously helpful, so that everyone would be safe and comfortable," Ms. Spektor said.

Not everyone, though, was happy to see Mrs. Clinton in town. Ruth Vered, the owner of the Vered Gallery in the alley behind BookHampton, protested during the signing. Dressed in all black, she stood in front of Starbucks for the entirety of the event, holding a handmade sign that read "The Worst Sec of State." Vered is Israeli, and holds dual citizenship in the United States and Israel. She was an Israeli paratrooper during the 1960s.

"Every move she made was bad," Ms. Vered said. She is not someone I would want as a role model for my daughters." She cited Mrs. Clinton's involvement in Cairo and her relationship with her aide, Huma Abedin, as two of her biggest shortcomings. Ms. Abedin is married to Anthony Weiner, a former Democratic congressman. Ms. Vered was the only protester that day.

Howard Dean, a 2004 candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination and a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, was spotted at the event and posed with Mrs. Clinton for a picture. (His mother has a house in East Hampton, and he is a frequent visitor.)

"I'll wait forever for her to be president," said Linda Fuller, a former English teacher at the East Hampton Middle School. "We need American women in power."

Politico: "Bill Clinton library plans 10th anniversary event"

By Maggie Haberman

August 21, 2014, 9:53 p.m. EDT

The presidential library honoring Bill Clinton in Little Rock, Arkansas, is planning for a major event in November to honor its tenth anniversary, sources familiar with the planning said Thursday.

The event is expected to fall on Nov. 14, according to emails circulating among potential attendees. That's four days before the anniversary of the Nov. 18, 2004, unveiling. It was not immediately clear if the event would be limited to one day.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is also right after the midterm elections end, at a time when Hillary Clinton will be in the process of deciding whether to run for president in 2016.

Clinton aides did not comment on the anniversary plans.

The library is part of a network of Clinton-related projects in Arkansas, where the former president served as governor. There is also a Clinton School of Public Service at the University of Arkansas.

Politico: “Priorities USA cuts check to DGA”

By Maggie Haberman

August 21, 2014, 3:04 p.m. EDT

The pro-Hillary Clinton super PAC Priorities USA is sending a $250,000 donation on Thursday to the Democratic Governors Association, the latest round of giving to a committee engaged in battle in midterm races, an official with the group told POLITICO.

The group has also sent money in the past to House Majority PAC and Senate Majority PAC, the outside groups seeking to elect House and Senate Democratic candidates.

After a dust-up over whether it would get involved in the midterms, Priorities USA made clear earlier this year that it did not plan to raise money this year, other than in order to give to targeted committees. The decision was designed to avoid competing with fundraising efforts geared toward the 2014 elections. Priorities officials urged their donors to give to midterm-focused groups as well.

The group is not expected to raise funds for itself until after the midterms.

Clinton herself is set to host fundraisers for all four major Democratic campaign committees in the next two months, including the DGA, which Bill Clinton hosted an event for earlier this year as well.

Fundraising committees use big-name surrogates to help raise money, with the Clintons and President Barack Obama, Michelle Obama and Vice President Joe Biden among the biggest draws. Biden has hosted two events for the DGA recently.

Bloomberg Businessweek: “Romney Says Clinton Can’t Distance Herself From Obama”

By John McCormick

August 22, 2014

Republicans Mitt Romney and Paul Ryan, on a public stage for the first time since their ticket lost the 2012 White House race, derided recent efforts by Hillary Clinton to differentiate herself from President Barack Obama.

“Hillary Clinton tries to distance herself from the foreign policy of the president,” said Romney, 67, his party’s presidential nominee two years ago. “That would work better were she not his secretary of state for four years.”

Ryan, 44, the Wisconsin U.S. representative who Romney picked as his vice presidential nominee, criticized the size of the federal government during the joint appearance yesterday in Chicago and said a Clinton administration would “keep these things going.”

Clinton, who polls show is the overwhelming favorite for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, took a step toward breaking with Obama in an interview published earlier this month that suggested he lacked a world view in his foreign policy.

“Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle,” she told the Atlantic’s Jeffrey Goldberg, referring to a phrase Obama has used to describe his foreign policy.

The comment triggered a fight between a White House eager to defend itself in the face of multiple foreign crises and a Clinton operation eager to separate the potential candidate from some of the administration’s actions. While such efforts may hurt her among Democratic primary voters should she run for president, it may help her win support in a general election campaign from independents and Republicans focused on national security.

Romney Vindication

Romney also claimed vindication for himself in Clinton’s comments to Goldberg.

“She was very critical of the president’s foreign policy, and basically said ’he doesn’t have one,’” Romney said. “I used to say that during the campaign.”

Romney’s appearance with his ex-running mate for a dinner-time conversation in front of about 350 people at the Union League Club of Chicago was part of Ryan’s national tour this week to promote his new book. The conversation focused heavily on government spending, although Romney was eager to talk about foreign policy.

In his book, “The Way Forward: Renewing the American Idea,” and at the Chicago event, Ryan avoided speculation about whether he’ll seek the White House.

Senate Races

Though some Republican leaders have suggested Romney might consider another run, he has denied any interest in such an effort.

He has been an active presence on the midterm campaign trail this year. His travels earlier this week included stops in West Virginia, North Carolina and Arkansas, all states with U.S. Senate races in which Republicans are vying to capture Democratic-held seats.

Democrats panned the Chicago appearance, saying the two men and their views were rejected by 2012 voters.

“In 2012, Americans rejected the Romney-Ryan plan that ended Medicare as we know it, shifted the tax burden onto American families or gut programs for the most vulnerable members of society,” Michael Czin, a spokesman for the Democratic National Committee said in a statement.

Wall Street Journal: “Missouri Gov. Jay Nixon's Political Ambitions Tested”

By Janet Hook and Peter Nicholas

August 21, 2014, 9:28 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Ferguson Turmoil May Be a Hurdle on the National Stage

Just as Democratic Gov. Jay Nixon of Missouri was angling for attention as a potential national political leader, the turmoil in Ferguson has abruptly catapulted him from obscurity into a national spotlight of a more problematic sort.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Nixon, who recently hinted of aspirations beyond Missouri with trips to Iowa and other dog whistles of ambition, has been criticized for moving too slowly and ineffectively to manage the crisis after a police officer shot an unarmed 18-year-old African-American on Aug 9.

The governor's office counters that Mr. Nixon has been "heavily engaged" in the situation in Ferguson, citing his call for an independent investigation, his meetings with local officials and clergy, and his order for the state highway patrol to handle security.

"He continues to work around the clock to bring peace to Ferguson so that justice can ultimately be achieved," said Nixon spokesman Scott Holste.

The situation is a fresh example of how disasters both natural and man-made have the potential to damage a political career.

"When these events occur, it is a test you can either pass or fail," said Tad Devine, a Democratic strategist who worked as a senior adviser to the Al Gore and John Kerry presidential campaigns. "The way you deal with it has long-term repercussions for political leaders."

One of the governor's most vocal critics has been fellow Democrat Maria Chappelle-Nadal, a state senator who tweeted profanities at the governor and complained that he hadn't showed up at "ground zero."

Hogan Gidley, who worked for Republican Rick Santorum's 2012 presidential campaign, said the violence in Ferguson would "blemish" Mr. Nixon's record should he run for higher office.

Voters measure candidates on the basis of whether they can be effective—and the unrest in Missouri won't help Mr. Nixon make his case, he said.

There have been a range of responses from state and local politicians, as well as national leaders.

Democratic Sen. Claire McCaskill jumped in quickly with Twitter TWTR +0.11% messages of sympathy for Michael Brown, who was fatally shot by Ferguson police officer Darren Wilson, 28 years old. She went to church in the community and was photographed hugging a protester. She spoke to President Barack Obama and Attorney General Eric Holder about the case, and tweeted frequently about her outreach to state and federal officials.

Sen. Roy Blunt (R., Mo.) was more restrained in his response, deferring to state officials and emphasizing the importance of a thorough investigation rather than engaging on the emotional grievances that were surfacing on the streets.

"While the federal government can assist with that investigation, the federal government should not assume the state and local governments' responsibilities," he said after speaking to Mr. Obama by phone

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monday.

As the state's chief executive, Mr. Nixon responded both with operational actions and efforts to address the emotions of the moment.

He asked the Justice Dept. on Aug. 11 to conduct an independent investigation and appeared with faith and civic leaders on Aug. 12, telling them, "We stand together tonight, reeling from what feels like an old wound that has been torn open afresh."

His office said he met Mr. Brown's mother on Aug. 15. And Thursday he rejected critics' calls to replace St. Louis County Prosecuting Attorney Robert McCulloch who is turning to a 12-member grand jury to determine whether criminal charges should be filed in the fatal shooting.

Mr. Nixon also moved to shore up the law enforcement response.

On Aug. 14, after nights of looting, he ordered the state highway patrol to direct security under the supervision of Capt. Ronald Johnson, an African-American native of the Ferguson area.

Mr. Johnson initially was warmly greeted by protesters. But when looting resumed, Mr. Nixon on Aug. 16 ordered a midnight to 5 a.m. curfew. When that failed to quell violence, he dropped the curfew and called in the National Guard on Monday to help with security.

The community still saw regular protests and arrests, though those have diminished and the governor ordered the withdrawal of the National Guard on Thursday.

Mr. Nixon easily won re-election in 2012 in a state that Mr. Obama lost twice, suggesting that, should he look beyond Missouri, he might make inroads with independent and centrist voters coveted by both parties.

Last month, he toured an ethanol plant in Iowa, the first presidential caucus state, making the sort of visit politicians use to signal national aspirations. His office said the visit had nothing to do with electoral politics and was focused on expanding business opportunities in Missouri.

Mr. Nixon would be hard pressed to challenge Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton for the party's presidential nomination, but he might be better positioned as a potential running mate or cabinet official.

His handling of the Ferguson crisis is likely to shadow his political ambitions.

Chris Kofinis, a Democratic strategist and former chief of staff to Sen. Joe Manchin (D., W.Va.), said: "He was slow to respond, and then when he engaged he wasn't clear on what the right approach is. In fairness to him, there's not a playbook to deal with these things. But the public doesn't care about that…Crises sometimes make leaders and sometimes they break leaders."

[USA Today: “For Chloe Moretz, the best part was meeting Hillary”]

By Jocelyn McClurg

August 20, 2014, 3:09 p.m. EDT

It's August, but Chloe Grace Moretz arrives for lunch at the Trump SoHo Hotel shivering and tightly wrapped in a baggy black sweater over a pleated white skirt and top.

"It's cold!," says the pretty blond star of If I Stay, which opens Friday.

Perhaps, but things are decidedly hot these days for the 17-year-old actress and fashionista, who has just wrapped a string of movies and is about to film The Fifth Wave, the latest dystopian teen novel to make it to the big screen. ("I'm super hyped about it," she says of starring as heroine Cassie Sullivan.)

But first she's talking up If I Stay, based on the young-adult novel by Gayle Forman, No. 1 on USA TODAY's Best-Selling Books list for the third straight week.

Forman, who lives in nearby Brooklyn, shares the sushi and marvels at the living embodiment of her narrator, Mia Hall. In the movie, which is quite faithful to the book, Mia is in a coma after a devastating car crash. Flashbacks tell the story of her happy family life (at first she doesn't know whether her parents and little brother have survived the accident) and romance with a young rocker, Adam (Jamie Blackley).

Moretz says she read the If I Stay script and was intrigued, but really fell in love when she read the book. She emailed Forman and the two struck up an online friendship long before they met last year. The two recently bonded on a multi-city tour, where they signed books and posters and screened the movie for fans.

For Forman, who visited the set in Vancouver, Moretz was a dream choice as Mia.

"I thought 'who else can handle this role,' because really it is two separate roles," says Forman, 44, mother of two young girls. "There's the vulnerability and the falling in love and then the Mia of the accident, who's in this ghost-like state but who also has such emotionally wrenching scenes."

Moretz, who kicked some you-know-what in Kick-Ass and its sequel, says tapping into her softer side was a challenge. "I think because I'm a young actress I have issues showing emotional vulnerability, being 17. I am OK with being fierce and cool and hard, I am killing people, whatever, but when I have to show love and happiness and elation, it's scary. You're opening up a side of yourself that no one sees."

And then there was the cello. Mia is a cello prodigy who auditions for Julliard, and Moretz felt it was central to the character to take lessons. While she's hardly ready for Carnegie Hall in real life (in the movie, she says, it's "Frankenstein with my head on another girl's body"), it was all about "learning the emotion of the cello."

Moretz, who takes her craft seriously (she's been at it for a decade), is ebullient, chatty and friendly. "I can be a super mature person when I need to be and I can talk about many different things, but ultimately, when I'm with my friends, I act like I'm 12. I'm a very goofy person."

Her conversational topics whip from school (she's a senior and is tutored on set) to being obsessed with Sylvia Plath's autobiographical 1963 novel The Bell Jar ("Oh my god, I want to make it into a movie") to enjoying exploring the "dark side of my psyche" as an actor.

"I always said if I wasn't an actor I don't know if I'd be like a serial killer or something. I get it out (on film), who knows what I'm expelling," she says with a laugh.

But what really gets this effusive talker going is…Hillary Clinton?

In June, Moretz was in Toronto for the Much Music Video Awards when her driver noticed that Clinton was doing a book signing for her memoir Hard Choices. Calls were made and the young star got a few minutes with the woman she so admires.

"I cried when I met her," says Moretz, who calls Clinton an "icon."

"I've never gotten starstruck by anyone in my entire life, ever, and I couldn't breathe. She was just sitting there in her little jacket. I thought she was just going to sign my book and tell me to go but she said, 'I know the book (If I Stay), I saw it on this reader's list, and I can't wait for your movie.' "

"Hillary Clinton talked about If I Stay?," an incredulous Forman asks.

"Yes! Yes, yes, she knew the book, I was freaking out!" says Moretz. The actress and author high-five.

Did Clinton, ahem, say anything else?

"Well, I said, 'I turn 18 on Feb. 10 and I will be 18 when you run for president.' And she was like, mmmmm."

Oh well.

Washington Post opinion: Michael Gerson: “The limits of leading from behindNo time to lead from behind”

By Michael Gerson

August 21, 8:04 p.m. EDT

Responding to the horrifying murder of photojournalist James Foley, Secretary of State John Kerry declared the Islamic State “and the wickedness it represents must be destroyed.” President Obama said, “People like this ultimately fail.” The first is a pledge; the second an observation. Obama remains a rhetorical spectator to events in Iraq and Syria that he does not want to own and that he believes the United States has a limited ability to influence.

Obama called the Islamic State a “cancer.” But the actual pledge found in his remarks was consistent with earlier pledges: “The United States of America will continue to do what we must to protect our people.” Such a statement can be interpreted narrowly or broadly: protecting our people on the ground in Irbil against advancing Islamic State fighters, or protecting our people in New York or Washington against a terrorist threat amplified by new funding, a territorial haven and swelling morale. So far, Obama has given cause for the narrower interpretation.

The president wants to keep a strategic ambiguity at the center of U.S. policy. He seems to fear that firmness will tempt our partners and allies to become free riders on American resolve. In this view, a strong U.S. commitment actually weakens the incentives for responsible behavior closer to the problem. This is the strategic insight that underlies “leading from behind.”

But the current Islamic State threat — a stated desire to repeat the Foley murder on a global scale — has grown in the fertile soil of American ambiguity. The Islamic State took eastern Syria, and the United States did almost nothing. The Islamic State took Fallujah in January, and the United States did little. The group took Mosul in June, seized hard currency and American weapons, changed its name to the Islamic State and declared the caliphate, and the United States urged Iraqi political reform (while ramping up our intelligence capabilities). It took direct military threats against Irbil and Baghdad (and an imminent threat of genocide against Yazidis) for the United States to begin limited airstrikes.

This has been a test of the doctrine of leading from behind. A U.S. leadership “vacuum” (Hillary Clinton’s word) was not filled by the resolve of friends. It was filled by Iranian adventurism, by Russian meddling, by Bashar al-Assad’s mass atrocities, by Gulf state money flowing to disturbing places and by expansionist, ruthless, messianic Islamist radicalism. Recent history yields one interpretation: If the United States does not lead the global war on terrorism, the war will not be led.

Obama has been dragged by events toward engagement. But he still refuses to broaden his conception of the U.S. role in the Middle East. At every stage during the past three years, he has attempted to avoid the slippery slope of intervention by defining his goals as narrowly as possible: eliminate Assad's chemical weapons, defend Americans in Irbil, prevent a genocide on Mount Sinjar. But narrowing your objectives doesn't actually narrow your problems. And denial and delay may greatly complicate such problems.

Since assuming office, Obama has taken a technical or even technological approach to the terrorist threat. If it can be narrowly defined ("core al-Qaeda"), it can be surgically and antiseptically removed with drones and special operations. He is perfectly willing to take such measures: kill Osama bin Laden in his compound or strike a convoy in Yemen. But he has dismissed or downplayed the strategic and ideological aspects of the problem: Safe havens multiply threats. It is better to oppose threats aggressively and closer to their source, rather than waiting for them to arrive. Ideology and morale matter, as the Islamic State has developed momentum, attracted recruits (including from the West) and developed a reputation as the "strong horse" (bin Laden's words in 2001).

If the goal is the destruction of the Islamic State — a strategic, rather than technical, response to terror — allies need to be rallied to difficult, long-term tasks. Foes need to be put on notice. Americans need to be informed about the stakes and prepared for national exertions (which may eventually involve, by some estimates, 10,000 to 15,000 U.S. troops in supportive roles).

Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel refers to the Islamic State as a threat of a "dimension that the world has never seen before." Eric Holder calls the Islamic State "more frightening than anything I think I've seen as attorney general." The central problem of U.S. foreign policy now lies in the gap between the world's dangers and the president's diffidence.

New York Times blog: The Upshot: "Where Are the National Democrats on Ferguson?"

By Josh Barro

August 21, 2014

There is something very strange about the national political reaction to the protests in Ferguson, Mo., (and nationally) over Michael Brown's shooting. The protesters are angry, and they're not aimlessly angry. They have a specific set of policy grievances about policing and criminal justice that are shared by a large slice of the electorate, particularly the Democratic primary electorate.

Yet no national Democratic politician, nobody of the sort who is likely to mount a presidential run anytime soon, has risen to give voice to the anger we're seeing in Ferguson. Nobody seems eager to make police abuses or racial injustice a key issue in a national campaign, even though an awful lot of Democratic voters could be activated on those issues.

Why not? African-Americans are a hugely important Democratic Party constituency. Gallup data suggests 22 percent of self-identified Democrats are black. Exit polls showed black voters made up one-third of North Carolina primary voters in 2008 and a majority in South Carolina. If there were an incident of similar salience to a group that made up such a large share of the Republican base, you can bet a number of Republican politicians would be lining up to associate themselves with the protesters.

There are answers to the “why not?” question, but I don’t think they make the quiet on this issue sustainable.

You can start with the fact that blacks and whites tend to view the situation in Ferguson very differently. According to a poll conducted this month by the Pew Charitable Trusts, 80 percent of black respondents say the shooting “raises important issues about race,” but just 37 percent of whites do. Whites are much more likely than blacks to have confidence in the police investigation. A New York Times/CBS poll on Ferguson released Thursday finds a similar divide.

Democrats win elections by building coalitions of white and nonwhite voters, and for decades, Democrats have used “tough on crime” stances as a way to build support with whites. The Missouri governor, Jay Nixon, spent 16 years as his state’s attorney general as a strong proponent of capital punishment.

Democrats have bad memories of the Willie Horton ad and other Republican campaign messages that used “law and order” issues to consolidate white voters. So faced with a policy issue that places a crowd of angry black people on one side and the police on the other, it’s not surprising that Democratic politicians would be wary of siding with the crowd.

Democrats also haven’t had to fear that not taking up this issue will cost them black votes. “Up until the last few months, there really hasn’t been any serious competition for the black vote on a policy level,” said Jeff Smith, a white Democrat who represented a racially mixed St. Louis district in the Missouri State Senate from 2006 to 2009. Even with Senator Rand Paul taking up the issues of over-incarceration and the drug war, Republicans remain too far from the median black voter on a swath of issues from economics to voter ID to make a serious general election play.

So there is a good general election logic for Democrats to give short shrift to the issues raised in Ferguson. But if the Tea Party has taught us anything, it’s that a base can force its party to take stances that won’t be popular in a general election. Black voters, and other Democratic voters who care about issues of policing and racial justice, don’t have to flex their political muscle by being willing to leave the party. If these issues are of importance to much of the electorate — and this month’s protests suggest they are — then a politician should be able to build a credible Democratic primary campaign by focusing on them.

Indeed, that’s roughly what Bill de Blasio did to win last year’s Democratic mayoral primary in New York. The fact that Democrats had lost the last five mayors’ races in part because of perceived weakness on policing issues did not stop Mr. de Blasio from winning the primary or the general elections easily while saying the New York Police Department’s policing tactics had gone too far. Mr. de Blasio was able to see that the sharp decline in violent crime in New York had changed the politics of policing, and made a softer touch more politically palatable.

The nationwide slump in violent crime should mean that trend isn’t limited to New York. The declining threat of crime and the cost of imprisoning so many people has created space for politicians, especially Republicans, to endorse policies aimed at reducing incarceration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The decline of crime should change the calculus with black voters, too: Reduced crime makes aggressive policing look less justifiable and more gratuitous. Combine the favorable crime trend with the declining share of the Democratic primary electorate that consists of white voters, and there should be room for a candidate who takes Mr. de Blasio's message on racial inequities in policing national.

Back in June, Matt Yglesias of Vox wrote that Democrats are "more unified than ever," and policy unity is what forestalls a serious primary challenge to Hillary Clinton. On the issue set he discussed, he's right. Democrats broadly agree on issues like taxes and spending, the safety net and bank regulation.

Mr. Yglesias's article didn't discuss policing and criminal justice issues, and didn't describe the Democratic coalition as divided over questions like whether the police have too much power and whether we imprison too many people. That lack of division may be only because no ambitious candidate has emerged to push the party leftward on criminal justice — yet.

The Atlantic: "Hillary Clinton's 'Mission Impossible' Doctrine"

By Conor Friedersdorf

August 21, 2014, 3:07 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] On foreign policy, the presumptive presidential candidate responds to hard choices by fake-punting.

America's foreign-policy hawks are once again circling high over their maps of the Middle East. They see several countries where they would like America to strike. Some of the hawks are neoconservatives. Others are liberal internationalists. Hillary Clinton's hawkish shrieks are an unusual blend of their styles. Her book Hard Choices, her remarks at the Aspen Ideas Festival, and her interview with Jeffrey Goldberg include calls for the U.S. to support the ouster of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, weaken the government of Iran, and destroy the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS), a Sunni terrorist group being fought by both Assad and Iran.

This puts her in an awkward position: If the U.S. is determined to weaken or destroy ISIS, the regimes in Syria and Iran, and the Shiite Islamist militant group Hezbollah–if America is to pursue all these goals at once, as Clinton urges in her rhetoric–we're operating in such a way that our enemy's biggest enemies are our enemies.

There are several ways a country could respond to this situation. Non-intervention is one of them. Perhaps the fight among ISIS, Assad, Iran, and other actors besides is so dynamic and complicated that there's no way to foresee the consequences of our intervention. Inaction guarantees that the U.S. won't spend blood and treasure in a way that does not help or inadvertently harms us–though inaction has costs and risks too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another way forward would be to choose which enemy poses the biggest threat, focus on defeating it, and understand that in doing so we'd be compromising other goals.

Then there's what we could call the "Mission Impossible" approach to geopolitics, where the seeming tradeoffs are so unappealing that one tries to avoid them. Hollywood screenwriters are the biggest proponents of this approach. Is the target too heavily armed to take by force and too well-guarded to sneak into? Don't call off the heist. Just devise a plan to steal a stealth helicopter during a lunar eclipse, repel down a ventilation shaft mere inches wider than the thinnest member of your team, and rely on his acrobatics–plus the piece of cinnamon gum that is his trademark in outlaw circles–to bypass the lasers.

That's the level of difficulty that comes to mind when I read Robert Ford, the career diplomat who resigned over the same objections to President Obama's Syria policy voiced by Clinton. "Some have argued that the easier course is to accept that Mr. Assad is entrenched in the capital and work with his regime to contain and eliminate the terrorist groups in Syria," he wrote in a June op-ed. "This would not benefit American security. ... [H]is record of relying on horrific brutality to maintain power is clear. Moreover, his regime has a history of implicit cooperation with Al Qaeda, as we saw in Iraq. This is not a man with whom the United States should align itself." Plus, "Mr. Assad now depends on Iran and Hezbollah for his survival, and Iran’s influence in Syria is likely to remain as long as Mr. Assad does." So what to do? "To be sure, there is no military solution, but it is possible to salvage something in Syria by preparing the conditions for a genuine negotiation toward a new government. And that requires empowering the moderate armed opposition. The Free Syrian Army needs far greater material support and training so that it can mount an effective guerrilla war."

This was presented as a realistic embrace of the least-bad option.

It's basically the same advice Clinton gave: identify the subset of rebels battling Assad who aren't Islamist radicals; give them money and weapons; hope that they topple the Syrian regime; and then, when Assad is gone, wager that the power vacuum won't be filled by ISIS or some radical Islamist force like it. Though Assad's forces have done their best to kill ISIS fighters, Clinton spoke as if funding the opposition to Assad would have preempted the rise of ISIS, and as if post-Assad Syria wouldn't likely turn into a lawless place where terrorists could plot.

But how was that a realistic plan?

Everything about Iraq, the scene of an earlier intervention that Clinton favored, ought to have given her pause. When that country's dictator fell, the resulting power vacuum empowered Islamist terrorist groups despite the presence of thousands of U.S. troops. Weapons and equipment that the U.S. gave its allies in Iraq now make up a major part of the weaponry that ISIS stole to seize territory there. But ISIS wouldn't have been able to seize weapons funneled to moderate Syrians? And a Syria without Assad wouldn't have turned into a more heavily contested power vacuum? The folks beheading journalists and seizing vast swaths of territory would've let the moderates do their thing or been suppressed by them?

Those seem like risky wagers.

There's no way to prove the Ford/Clinton approach to Syria wouldn't have worked, just as there's no way to prove I wouldn't have won if I'd gone to a Las Vegas sports book last year and wagered that I could pick the winner of every Dallas Cowboys game. An embrace of plans with long odds of success is nevertheless a worrisome approach to foreign policy. It's as if Obama is a football coach with an injured quarterback and no ground game, the tough choice is whether to run or pass, and Clinton is on the sidelines emphatically agitating for an insanely complicated trick play that the team has never practiced before, even though trick plays attempted in previous games unfolded unpredictably and failed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton presents this posture as evidence of her capacity to make "Hard Choices," which for her means something like forcefully urging intervention even when I have no idea if it will work. As she told Goldberg in their interview, "I can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended, and what Robert Ford recommended, that we'd be in a demonstrably different place."

She sees the long odds, yet never considers, or at least never refutes, the notion that our involvement could make things worse, as has happened before. ISIS could have more of our guns. Our now-successful effort to destroy many of Syria's chemical weapons could've been derailed. What voters should seek out, as they decide whether Clinton is capable of being a good president, is any recognition from her that attempts by American experts to steer events abroad do often make things worse–and that simple, plausible plans ought to be favored for that reason, not elaborate interventionist schemes that can only succeed if lots of contested assumptions hold true and lots of contingencies we don't control go right.

Her inclination is to make risky bets on intervention "with conviction":

[VIDEO]

Every course poses its own risks. But as Vietnam proved–and as Clinton ought to have learned in Iraq–a hubristic, ill-planned, failed American military intervention is, when it goes wrong, the very most damaging thing a U.S. president can order. We should not elect any commander-in-chief who doesn't understand that.

Huffington Post blog: Bill Schneider, resident scholar at Third Way: "No One Likes a Frontrunner"

By Bill Schneider

August 21, 2014, 1:31 p.m. EDT

"No one likes a frontrunner, especially Democrats" a grassroots activist at Netroots Nation told Politico. That's certainly true. Remember John Glenn in 1984? Howard Dean in 2004? Hillary Clinton in 2008?

It's Republicans who have a tradition of nominating whoever is next in line. Every Republican presidential nominee since Barry Goldwater had run for President or vice president before. With one exception--George W. Bush. But his name was Bush, so he got a pass. Democrats have a tradition of plucking candidates out of obscurity: George McGovern, Jimmy Carter, Michael Dukakis, Bill Clinton, Barack Obama.

If Hillary Clinton runs in 2016, she may defy the Democratic tradition. She is the prohibitive frontrunner, at least in the polls. No one else comes close. But will she really coast to the nomination? It looks more and more likely that Clinton will be seriously challenged from the left, by a candidate TBD.

Almost every Democratic nominating contest ends up as a race between a progressive and a populist. It's a class split. The progressive wins educated, high-minded, upper-middle-class Democrats devoted to National Public Radio. Prius drivers. The populist wins wage-earners, disadvantaged minorities and the financially squeezed. Pick-up truck drivers.

	Progressive	Populist
1952	Adlai Stevenson	Estes Kefauver
1968	Eugene McCarthy	Robert F. Kennedy
1972	George McGovern	Hubert Humphrey
1984	Gary Hart	Walter Mondale
1988	Michael Dukakist	Dick Gephardt
1992	Paul Tsongas	Bill Clinton
2000	Bill Bradley	Al Gore
2008	Barack Obama	Hillary Clinton

Obama won the nomination in 2008 by putting together an unusual coalition of NPR Democrats and African-Americans. He beat Hillary Clinton. But only barely. When ABC News aggregated all the 2008 Democratic primary exit polls, it showed Clinton with a two-to-one lead over Obama among non-college white voters.

Last month, the Netroots Nation crowd swooned over keynote speaker Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.). She was repeatedly interrupted by shouts of "Run, Liz, run!" There were "Ready for Warren" buttons everywhere--her enthusiasts' answer to "Ready for Hillary." The response from Warren's office? "No, Sen. Warren does not support this effort."

Liberal Democrats are exasperated by President Obama. He doesn't show enough fight. Warren calls herself a "fighter," but Hillary Clinton has the prior claim to that title. She earned points in 2008 by fighting to the very end. "One thing you know about me is that I am no shrinking violet," she told cheering supporters in Kentucky in May 2008. "If I tell you I will fight for you, that is exactly what I intend to do."

Clinton may be vulnerable to a challenge from the left on foreign policy. She brought up the issue herself in her recent interview with The Atlantic, where she put some distance between her views and those of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Obama. "You know," Clinton told her interviewer, "when you're down on yourself, and when you're hunkering down and pulling back, you're not going to make any better decisions than when you were aggressively, belligerently putting yourself forward." She earned cheers from neo-conservatives when she said, "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

Hillary Clinton's hawkish inclinations are well known. She favored sending more arms to relatively moderate Syrian rebels and endorsed air strikes against the Syrian government. She wanted to leave a larger U.S. residual force in Iraq. She urged a stronger show of resolve in Egypt and Libya. And, of course, she voted to authorize the war in Iraq in 2002.

Hillary Clinton appears to be placing herself squarely in the Democratic Party's long tradition of liberal interventionism. It's a tradition that goes back to President Harry Truman, who first committed the U.S. to a global leadership role after World War II. But military intervention has long been a source of friction inside the Democratic Party. Progressive Democrats were nurtured by a different Democratic tradition: antiwar. Anti-Vietnam war and anti-Iraq war.

Iowa Democratic caucus participants include a lot of antiwar activists. Clinton's hawkishness does not go over well with them. In fact, Iowa was a big stumbling block in her 2008 campaign. Clinton came in third in Iowa, behind both Obama and John Edwards.

One issue in particular may give her problems with the left: Israel. In her Atlantic interview, Clinton was unstinting in her support for Israel: "There's no doubt in my mind that Hamas initiated this conflict and wanted to do so in order to leverage its position." On criticism of Israel's actions in Gaza: "What you see is largely what Hamas invites and permits Western journalists to report on from Gaza. . .The PR battle is one that is historically tilted against Israel."

Last month's Gallup poll showed Americans divided over whether Israel's actions in the current conflict with Hamas are justified (42% "mostly justified," 39% "mostly unjustified"). Democrats, however, were more critical of Israel (47-31% "unjustified"). Criticism of Clinton's strong support for Israel is likely to surface in the campaign, particularly in Iowa. Iowa is only 0.2% Jewish. And while there are a lot of pro-Israel evangelical voters in Iowa, very few of them can be found at Democratic caucuses. It is not hard to imagine Iowa Democrats rallying behind an antiwar alternative to Clinton in 2016.

Boston Globe: “Search for James Foley consumed family, colleagues”

[Subtitle:] In e-mails, captors sought $130 million

It was the Saturday after Thanksgiving in 2012 when top executives at the Boston-based GlobalPost received an e-mail from one of the news service's freelance correspondents near the Syrian border.

"Hate to be writing this to you but Jim has gone missing in Syria," she wrote.

The prospect that James W. Foley had been taken hostage left GlobalPost co-founder Charles M. Sennott with "a terrible, sinking sense of deja vu" — a "here we go again" feeling.

Foley, the New Hampshire-born war correspondent beheaded by militants from the terrorist group calling itself the Islamic State, had previously been kidnapped in Libya in 2011 and released, with the considerable help of the news organization's intervention, 44 days later.

But this time, there was an even deeper feeling of dread. Indeed, his colleagues at GlobalPost weren't all that surprised.

"He always pushed it to the edge," Sennott said. "He always went as far as you could go to get the story."

What began that fall weekend nearly two years ago was a highly organized effort — led primarily by his family and GlobalPost executives and drawing in top US officials, private investigators, and refugee workers — in what ultimately proved to be an unsuccessful quest to free him.

"It's been an almost indescribable series of events, efforts, and mistakes and ups and downs, trying to — first of all find out where Jim was, who held him — and once we succeeded in that, find out how he might be freed," said Phil Balboni, chief executive officer of GlobalPost.

Foley's parents and brother this week said they were grateful for the effort but wished the United States had done more to win release of their son, including following the blueprint for winning release of hostages set by European countries. While the United States does not pay ransoms for hostages, European nations have made multimillion-dollar payments in exchange for the safe return of kidnapped citizens. The Foleys had begun raising money in an attempt to pay the ransom themselves. But they never got the chance.

The United States needs to put a premium on the safety of journalists who are doing their jobs, John Foley said of his slain son.

"He felt this was his job. It was his passion. So he was not crazy,'' John Foley said. "He was motivated by what he thought was doing the right thing, and gave him energy to continue, despite the risks.''

James Foley was respected by his peers. His foreign coverage was widely recognized as pioneering. His reporting from Libya, amid the Arab Spring, earned the prestigious Overseas Press Club award for breaking news. He was a regular freelance correspondent, or "stringer," for GlobalPost, although he also worked for other news outlets.

GlobalPost had all too much experience with their correspondents going missing in the field. One was imprisoned in Iran for seven days. Others simply fell out of touch for extended periods in some of the most remote corners of the globe before popping back up on the grid.

“The first thing you do is immediately call the State Department,” said Sennott, who was previously a foreign correspondent for The Boston Globe in the Middle East and wrote a 2009 field manual for correspondents operating in war zones.

Foley’s colleagues initially believed that he had been detained by government forces loyal to the regime of Bashar Assad, who was cracking down mercilessly on an insurgency consisting of a mix of rebel groups and Islamic militants that later came to be known as the Islamic State.

Two days after Foley’s disappearance was discovered in late 2012, GlobalPost hired Kroll International, a security firm that specializes in kidnapping and ransom cases — the same one it had enlisted when Foley went missing in Libya. Within days, the investigators were on the Turkey-Syria border, where Foley was last seen, interviewing people and gathering information, Balboni said.

“We didn’t know who took Jim, if he was alive or dead,” he said.

It would take nearly a year to learn where Foley was being held and that it was Islamic State, the terrorist group, that was holding him, Balboni said. The details came in September 2013, from a Belgian captive who had been held with Foley and then released. The Belgian got word to Foley’s brother that Foley indeed was alive.

Weeks later, in late November, the kidnappers sent their first e-mail to Foley’s parents and Balboni. To verify that Foley was alive and that the captors were indeed holding him, Foley’s parents, John and Diane, sent detailed and obscure questions that only Jim Foley could answer.

When the correct answers came back, “that was a real signal moment when we knew that we were in direct communication with the people who we knew were holding Jim captive,” Balboni said.

Soon after that, the captors asked for money, he said, 100 million euros — or about $130 million — and the release of Muslim prisoners.

As bits and pieces of information flowed in over the next excruciating months, the Foleys enlisted help from the US government and began to engage the public in his plight. Foley had been missing for six weeks by the time it was revealed publicly that he was last seen about 12 kilometers from the border with Turkey on his way back from reporting in Aleppo, Syria.

That same month New Hampshire’s two US senators, Jeanne Shaheen and Kelly Ayotte, also began prodding the Obama administration, in a series of letters to then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and the FBI, urging them to “take all reasonable measures to secure Mr. Foley’s immediate release.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shaheen helped Diane Foley secure meetings with the Russian Embassy, high-level officials at the United Nations, National Security Advisor Susan Rice, and other world and national officials. As 2013 wore on, the Foleys also met with David Wade, Secretary of State John F. Kerry's chief of staff, FBI officials, and White House staff, "all of whom were very sympathetic and desirous of helping," Balboni said.

"Secretary Kerry personally discussed the hostages over two dozen times with over a dozen different foreign leaders. He implored his counterparts in other governments to use their contacts and leverage, but the tragic reality is that ISIS answers to no one anymore,'' a senior administration official said.

But unlike many other governments, the United States was unwilling to pay the terrorist group for the release of hostages. The White House declined to discuss the decision-making process that ensued after the ransom demands were received.

But National Security Council spokeswoman Caitlin Hayden responded that "the United States government, as a matter of longstanding policy, does not grant concessions to hostage takers. Doing so would only put more Americans at risk of being taken captive.

GlobalPost, which over the months spent millions trying to help Foley, certainly had nowhere near the sum demanded by Foley's kidnappers.

"We never took the 100 million seriously," Balboni said. "It was such an incredible sum."

"The United States and Great Britain are different because we've both always opposed paying ransom for hostages, because we know it costs more lives and creates more hostages,'' a senior administration official told the Globe. "But the truth is, there was never a credible ransom offer on the table. Extremists made propaganda demands for hundreds of millions of dollars. The truth is, every real option was exhausted."

The Foley family would learn what European countries had paid for the release of at least nine prisoners held with Foley, Balboni said, and they believed that they might win his release if they could raise about $5 million privately.

Over the time of Foley's disappearance, his family received a handful of e-mails from his captors, according to Balboni, but "it was complete silence" from December 2013 until last week.

The family said it had recently been producing a video featuring Foley as part of a planned appeal to the public, to help raise the ransom. Family members refused to give up hope, with good reason.

A hostage released a few months ago memorized a letter from Foley "and within hours of his freedom he was good enough to call and voice that letter, and it just spoke of his yearning to see all of us again," recalled Diana Foley.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We had some eyewitness reports last fall that we knew he was alive,” she said.

It was not until Wednesday at noon, when President Obama called to offer condolences about Foley’s beheading, that the Foleys learned about a secret US rescue mission in Syria to save their son, Balboni said.

Earlier this summer, based on what was considered highly reliable intelligence, an elite US special forces team was secretly taken by helicopter into a rural area of Syria where intelligence officials believed Foley was being held. A deadly firefight ensued, said Pentagon officials, and several militants were killed. But Foley and other suspected hostages were not there. The exact timing and other details of the mission have not been made public.

“The operation “was focused on a particular captor network within” the Islamic State, according to Rear Admiral John Kirby, a Pentagon spokesman. “Unfortunately, the mission was not successful because the hostages were not present at the targeted location.’’

The last time the Foley family heard from James Foley’s captors was on Aug. 12, according to GlobalPost, which released the full text Thursday of the final e-mail sent by someone claiming to represent the Islamic State.

“You were given many chances to negotiate the release of your people via cash transactions as other governments have accepted,’’ the e-mail stated. “You and your citizens will pay the price of your bombings! The first of which being the blood of the American citizen, James Foley! He will be executed as a DIRECT result of your transgressions towards us!’’

GlobalPost said the Foley family did not have “many chances’’ to negotiate for their son’s release, and had been presented only with the demand for the extraordinary sum of $132 million.

It was just days later that the video of an Islamic State militant showing that Foley was beheaded appeared on YouTube.

Salon: "Pat Buchanan: I don't see a single GOP candidate who could beat Hillary"

By Scott Porch

July 9, 2014, 8:30 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] A populist conservative might beat Hillary, he tells Salon -- while taking on MSNBC, McCain, the Tea Party and more

After losing the presidential election in 1960 and the California governor's race in 1962, Nixon famously told reporters: "You won't have Nixon to kick around anymore." Soon after, he set up a law practice in New York, where he largely stayed out of the spotlight.

A few years later, Patrick J. Buchanan, a young editorial writer in St. Louis, told Nixon at a local Republican gathering that he wanted to work on what he felt certain would be Nixon's 1968 presidential campaign. When Buchanan joined Richard Nixon in early 1966, he wasn't so much joining Nixon's staff as he was Nixon's staff.

Nixon's improbable rise from the has-been heap to the White House is the subject of Buchanan's new memoir, "The Greatest Comeback: How Richard Nixon Rose From Defeat to Create the New Majority." Buchanan talked to Salon about the Republican Party's turnaround in the late 1960s, Hillary Clinton's presidential prospects in 2016, and what Eric Cantor's recent primary loss means for immigration policy.

When you started working for Nixon in 1966, you were not as lined up with him ideologically as you might have been. Were you conscious of that, or were you looking more for a winner than an ideological match?

I was a very strong conservative in journalism school and at the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and a very strong Goldwater supporter [in 1964]. I was glad he won the nomination. I was elated when he won the California primary over Rockefeller. My feeling at that time was that Goldwater was our candidate. Nixon had lost twice and I liked Nixon — always had, I had caddied for him. But I just thought that was over, so I was for Goldwater.

When Goldwater lost, I looked at the field and said I'd like to get involved in politics. There were only two credible candidates: I didn't think Rockefeller could get nominated, and the most credible candidate and the one who had been out there strongest fighting for Goldwater and the one who I agreed with most on foreign policy was Richard Nixon.

Were we in 100 percent agreement? No, not at all. I was known as the conservative in the Nixon camp.

Was Barry Goldwater too conservative to get elected president in 1964, or do you think there were other reasons why he lost that election?

I think there are several. First, the assassination of John F. Kennedy and the rise of Lyndon Johnson. Johnson was not like Kennedy and was sort of an ideal opponent for Barry Goldwater. I don't think Barry Goldwater, incidentally, would have beaten John F. Kennedy, but I don't think it would have been that tremendous loss that occurred. With Kennedy's assassination, the country didn't really want to change presidents three times in one year. Second, Johnson was bombing North Vietnam in 1964, taking a very hard line, and taking a very hard line on law and order. Goldwater was not as dramatic a contrast. Third, the senator made a lot of mistakes. Fourth, the Republican Party was split and torn apart in that ’64 convention at the Cow Palace [in San Francisco].

I think all of those reasons contributed, and I do agree with this: The country was not ready for Barry Goldwater conservatism in 1964.

Did you think a winning Republican in ’68 would either have to be less conservative or a conservative wolf in sheep’s clothing?

[Laughs.] What I felt was we couldn’t nominate and elect a man as visibly conservative as Barry Goldwater, and we had to go with the next best thing, which was Richard Nixon. I thought Nixon undeniably was more experienced and able and competent a campaigner and executive than Sen. Goldwater, and I thought looking at 1968, if you looked at the entire field, Richard Nixon was far and away the most conservative of the candidates.

I never really thought about 1968 as a less conservative field than ’64.

In 1968, Ronald Reagan was enormously attractive. He was attractive even before he was elected because of that 1964 speech [at the Republican Convention]. And then he won California [as governor in 1966] by a million votes, and a lot of conservatives I knew would have moved to him. I was far more fearful of a Reagan challenge than the Romney-Rockefeller wing of the party.

When you joined Nixon in 1966, did you think he would probably run for president?

When I went and talked to him, I said, “If you’re going to run for president in ’68, I would like to get aboard early.” That’s in December of 1965. And he said, “Before any decisions are made about ’68, we’re going to have to rebuild the base of this party in 1966 or the nomination isn’t going to be worth anything.” He only hired me for one year to work on his columns, handle his mail in his office, and the duties — as you find out in the book — expanded dramatically.

He had a tremendously successful year in 1966, and I think he was primarily responsible, if any individual was, for the tremendous showing of the Republican Party, and he put everything out there on the line. It’s one thing I admired about Nixon. Whatever you say about him, he was a fighter and he was a loyalist and he went out for every Republican running in 1966 except for members of the John Birch Society.

Your book has a bibliography, and you quote a number of great books. I feel like we don’t see this approach enough in political memoir.

I talked to Jules Witcover the other night. He wrote “The Resurrection of Richard Nixon.” I had contributed to that in interviews with him over the ’66 to ’69 period and afterwards. I got a lot out of his book and other books, and I figure you ought to credit the people who have refreshed your memory.

Have you heard or read much of the most recent batch of Nixon tapes?

If you know the history of it, you know that I recommended that Nixon destroy the tapes. After [Alexander] Butterfield testified that there were tapes, I wrote a memo to Nixon saying you have to maintain the tapes that [John] Dean described and you have to maintain the foreign policy tapes that are critical, but as for the rest, I would destroy them.

Historian Douglas Brinkley has said that the main reason Nixon made the tapes was for his foreign policy legacy. Do you see it that way?

I think that’s one thing. But let me tell you one other that has not been reported very much or hardly at all. When we started the administration, [William] Safire, [Ray] Price and Buchanan — the senior speechwriters — were assigned to various meetings to come in as a reporter would. Mine was congressional leadership. What we were instructed to do was write down anecdotes and stories and decisions just as a reporter would. We would write all those down; some of mine were 10 pages single-spaced. I just smoked through the typewriter, had them retyped, and then I’d edit them. And I would send them across to [H.R.] Haldeman for the files.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My assumption was that they were for two purposes: one, if there was a dispute over what somebody said, they could go to those files, and two, that [Nixon] would have the record when it came time to write his memoirs. At some point, we were called and told to stop covering the meetings.

Because they were then being taped?

That is my conclusion, that at that point the tapes were put in, and they were voice-activated so everything said was being recorded.

Former presidents typically go through several seasons of historical assessment — memoirs by White House aides, then National Archives records, then seeing how their policies turn out. What do you think the arc of the history of the Nixon administration has been? Obviously, it started at a low point.

That's a very interesting question. When I was very young, my father was interested in politics. He was hard-line anti-FDR and anti-Truman, and I remember when Truman departed, he was below Nixon in approval. His presidency was considered a disaster, he had lost both houses of Congress in '52 and the presidency to Eisenhower. He was considered in his second term very much a failed president.

Truman has been resurrected to where many historians say he's in the top 10 and a near-great president. Ronald Reagan because of what followed with the collapse of the Soviet Empire, the collapse of the Soviet Union, the economy had been booming under Reagan, so he has really risen to the point where — of course, conservatives put him among the greats, but even liberals are not objecting to near-great.

What about Nixon?

With Nixon, there's only two things people think about: China and Watergate. My period working with him was almost nine years, and Watergate did not occur until almost the seventh year of that. I think there's going to be a dramatic reassessment of Nixon. In his first term, I think it's fair to call him a near-great president.

There was the historic opening to China, the greatest arms control agreement since the Washington Naval Agreement of 1921-22 with the Russians, the first president to go behind the Iron Curtain to countries there. In October '73, he saved Israel in the Yom Kippur War, and he brought Egypt out of the Soviet orbit and into the Western orbit. He ended the War in Vietnam, as he promised to do, with all provincial capitals in Saigon's hands. He brought the POWs home. He ended the draft. He enacted the 18-year-old vote. He created the EPA, whichwhen it started was a good agency with conservatives agreeing with much of what it was doing. He created the Cancer Institute. He created OSHA. He was the president who was there when we put men on the moon.

I saw in a review of my book by the Economist magazine, which said that if Nixon had not run for a second term, he would be a hugely successful president. I remember Hugh Sidey wrote in 1972, which was before Watergate broke, that Nixon had presided over the cooling of America after the horrendous decade since Kennedy was assassinated and the riots and the disorder and assassinations, and the social/cultural/moral revolution, the upheaval on campuses, and a violent, divisive war. And I think that was right. But then came Watergate, and I think that blots out in the public mind — because of the focus on it — almost everything that happened in the first term but China.

Are you planning to write a second book about the Nixon years?

I sat down to write and started going through my files. There were all these interesting things that had happened and that nobody knew about and nobody has written about. And I thought this was a book in and of itself: how Nixon came back and what he accomplished after his own crushing defeats in '60 and '62 and the [Republican] Party's crushing defeat in '64. When everybody is talking about the Republican Party going off the cliff and being dead for a generation, and he pulled it all back together.

He pulled the Rockefeller-Scranton-Romney wing back in under the tent, brought in the Goldwater wing and the Reagan wing, put it all together and sought to split off the Southern Protestants and Northern Catholics [from the Democrats]. While he succeed with that in '68, he did succeed by '72. It's an incredible achievement.

You could be accused of cherry-picking the good part of the Nixon story, but I don't hear you saying that's why you stopped where you did.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's the 40th anniversary [of Nixon's resignation]. People have asked me to go on TV to talk about the pardon and other things. I did it as sort of a natural breakpoint. It is a separate, unique story after two crushing defeats and giving up politics and moving to New York and then the crushing defeat of the Republican Party [in 1964] to the point where the Republicans were outnumbered more than 2-to-1 in the House, more than 2-to-1 in the Senate, more than 2-to-1 among the governorships, and 2-to-1 in the state legislatures. Nixon pulled the pieces together to bring himself to the presidency of the United States in that turbulent decade. That is a story itself.

MSNBC ended a long relationship with you in 2012. Have you been invited on MSNBC to talk about the book?

I have not been invited by MNSBC yet, but we have some things scheduled on CNN and Fox and Fox Business.

Do you feel like you're getting a rough treatment?

I don't know. I'm sure that our people will be talking to them, and there are some shows that I think might be interested, although they have a different point of view clearly than Fox and others, especially about Nixon.

If you were building a Republican challenger from scratch to take on Hillary Clinton in 2016, what would that person look like?

I thought she ran a great campaign [in 2008]. I don't think her record as secretary of state or the Obama record is something she can run on. I think she's had a very bad book tour; it's not a scintillating book, it's not done her much good, and all the comments about the money and how poor they were have approached the ridiculous and been damaging.

However, I think as of today she would probably win the nomination, and as of today I think she would win the presidential election. Do I see a single candidate who has many of the things I would like to see in a Republican presidential candidate who could really rally the country and win the election? No, I don't.

What kind of GOP candidate could beat her?

I would say a populist conservative who is going to bring jobs back home to the United States, who is going to seal and secure the border, who is not going to grant amnesty, and who is going to get the United States out of all these wars and all these commitments to protect everybody on earth against any and all attacks. It would be a very dramatic break of the policies of both national parties.

I believe a lot of the ideas I ran on [for president] in the '90s like nonintervention in foreign wars that are none of our business, securing the borders, which I argued for 25 years ago, and stopping the export of U.S. manufacturing jobs to China and Asia. All these things are now current and much stronger than they were then. I think you need a fighting, populist, conservative campaign aimed at the working and middle class where you tell some of the Fortune 500 folks that you guys are going to have to spend a little time in the back row.

By most accounts, Hillary Clinton was an aggressive proponent of military intervention as secretary of state.

Look, if she wants to go fight wars around the world I would say, "No, we're not going to do that anymore." We did it under Bush and look what happened.

Does Rand Paul look as much like an ideal challenger as anyone?

I think his reluctance to send troops to intervene in places like Syria and Ukraine and Georgia and where else the John McCain-Lindsey Graham coalition wants to send them — I think he's right on the mark there.

Eric Cantor's loss in light of some data points in the weeks since appears to be a fluke. Is that your assessment?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

No, I don't think so. My assessment is that Eric Cantor got hurt badly by the perception that he was for amnesty on the immigration issue. The Tea Party may have lost in Mississippi [in the Senate race], but the impact of these races is on policy in the House; immigration is off the table. I think that's [David] Brat's success.

"Amnesty" is a loaded word. Shouldn't we have an immigration policy that deals with the people who are here in a way that reflects the fact that they are here?

The first thing you do is secure the border. You enforce e-verify with businesses who are breaking the law as much as any illegal immigrant is breaking the law. When that is done, then you take a look at these other matters. Until that is done, I would have no amnesty. People say they are living in the shadows. They broke into the country; they're living outside the law. That's what they chose to do.

You haven't slowed down. Are you happy to continue working and writing and doing what you're doing for the indefinite future?

[Laughs heartily.] I don't know how long the indefinite future is going to be! I enjoy writing. I enjoy communicating in interviews and on TV. I'm not seeking a permanent TV slot where I have to go in every day. Doing what I'm doing right now, doing this book tour — I enjoy these things. I always have.

Washington Examiner: "What the Hawaii Senate race tells us about the Democratic Party"

By Rebecca Berg

July 9, 2014, 12:24 p.m. EDT

Unlike Republicans, Democrats have had few opportunities this year to see any ideological splits among their candidates first-hand.

The exception is Hawaii.

Incumbent Sen. Brian Schatz has faced a rigorous challenge from Rep. Colleen Hanabusa in the Democratic primary. When the candidates met for a debate Monday, their discussion laid bare the divisions -- and areas of agreement -- between progressives and centrists in the party.

Here's what we learned:

The party is ready for Hillary

Or, if it isn't, Democrats aren't ready to say otherwise.

Hanabusa endorsed Clinton in 2008 in Hawaii's Democratic primary, and she did so again — and heartily — when the topic was raised during the debate Monday.

"I felt then that she would be a great president, and I feel now that she would be a great president," Hanabusa said. "I think that Hillary Clinton has paid her dues like no one else."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Schatz was positive, saying he hopes Clinton will run, but he nevertheless stopped short of any endorsement.

"I'm not going to get ahead of myself," he said. "The only election I'm thinking about is on Aug. 9."

Schatz added that his son said he hoped a woman would run for president -- but there are other Democratic women, such as Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who are thought to be potential contenders for the presidency. Warren has endorsed Schatz over Hanabusa.

President Obama's popularity is even flagging in Hawaii

With his approval rating in the low 40s, President Obama has so far this election been ducked by vulnerable Democratic candidates and only tacitly acknowledged by relatively strong ones. But, in Hawaii, the hometown hero still enjoys robust popularity -- for the most part.

When asked to rate the president's performance, Schatz, who led Obama's Hawaii campaign during the Democratic primary in 2008, called him a "very strong president."

"I'm proud to stand shoulder to shoulder with him," Schatz said. "I'm proud to have his endorsement. I'm proud to be one of his staunchest allies in the Senate."

But Hanabusa was less effusive in her praise, calling into question how Obama has handled crises abroad.

"There is no question President Obama is one of us," she said. However, she added: "Where I have parted with the president is the issue of Syria and Iraq. ... I believe that he has to explain to the people why he is potentially putting us into another war in Iraq, a sectarian civil war."

Democrats still aren't sure about marijuana

Medical marijuana is legal in Hawaii, and the Hawaii legislature recently considered decriminalizing small quantities of the drug, but fell short. Full legalization enjoys support from the majority of Hawaiians.

But even Hawaii Democrats aren't yet fully pro-pot.

Schatz and Hanabusa agreed that states should lead the way on crafting policies, a position that has been echoed by the party's leaders nationally.

"States are the laboratory of democracy, and democracy is occurring when it comes to this issue," Schatz said. "I don't think Hawaii is ready for it; I don't think we're ready for nationwide legislation."

The two candidates diverged, however, on the extent to which the federal government should get involved.

Hanabusa suggested the federal government should put in place "a law or a policy not to interfere with whatever the state and its legislature and its people determine is in their own best interest."

But Schatz proposed only a national "conversation" about the merits of jail time for offenders, calling the current system "rigged against young men and women for nonviolent drug possession."

The issue of student loans has staying power

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The growing burden of student loans has been invoked regularly by Democratic candidates in this election cycle, and might be an important theme moving forward for the party.

It's "the middle-class issue of our times," Schatz said.

"Higher education should be a ladder up economically," Schatz said. "Higher education is supposed to be part of the American Dream, and people are being priced out of it."

Schatz has worked with Warren in the Senate to promote student-loan forgiveness. The issue has been a signature of Warren's as part of a larger stump-speech theme of economic fairness.

Some of the starkest divisions are on less-buzzy issues

Whether to label genetically modified foods, for example.

GMO-labeling is a particularly hot-button issue in Hawaii, where seed crops comprise an industry worth hundreds of millions of dollars — but where some counties have sought to ban genetically manipulated agriculture.

Hanabusa played directly to the local-economic angle when asked for her stance.

“I do not believe GMOs are unhealthy and I stand with the farmers on that,” Hanabusa said. “And I also believe in the science that we have on GMOs.”

But Schatz, perhaps hewing to progressive support for organic produce, said states should lead the way in crafting policy.

The Day of New London (Conn.): “Clinton supporters wait in line for tickets to upcoming Madison book-signing”

By Brian Hallenbeck

July 9, 2014, 12:53 p.m. EDT

R.J. Julia Booksellers sold hundreds of copies of Hillary Clinton’s “Hard Choices” — or actually tickets to the potential Democratic presidential candidate’s July 19 book-signing here — over a three-hour span this morning.

Tickets to the signing, which entitled the buyer to a copy of the book at the signing, went for $35 apiece, plus tax.

Bookstore staff began taking orders by phone at 8 a.m., then began taking them in person when the downtown store opened at 10. By then, about 40 people had formed a line on the sidewalk outside the store. Women outnumbered men by a wide margin.

“Yes, I support Hillary. I hope she runs for president,” Vitty O’Toole of Madison said, while waiting in line. “She has the power and the experience.”

O'Toole, a 1957 Wellesley graduate who shares Clinton's alma mater, described herself as an independent Democrat.

"This was always a pretty solid Republican town," O'Toole said of Madison. "I generally keep my mouth shut when the talk turns to politics."

The Day of New London (Conn.): "Madison bookstore to host Hillary Clinton"

By Brian Hallenbeck

July 8, 2014, 9:48 p.m. EDT

Former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton will appear at a book-signing here July 19, R.J. Julia, the independent bookstore, announced in an email Tuesday evening.

Clinton, a presumptive candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, will sign copies of her book, "Hard Choices," at 4 p.m. at the bookstore, a Boston Post Road landmark in this shoreline town. A limited number of tickets will be available by phone on a first-come, first-served basis, starting at 8 a.m. Wednesday.

Clinton will only sign copies of her book; she will not speak, Roxanne Coady, R.J. Julia's owner, said Tuesday night.

Tickets will be available in the store after 10 a.m. Wednesday, according to the email.

Tickets are $35 plus tax and include a copy of Clinton's book. Customers are limited to two tickets per purchase.

Associated Press: "Hillary Clinton Plans St. Paul Stop On Book Tour"

[No Writer Mentioned]

July 8, 2014, 3:56 p.m. EDT

Former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will make a stop in St. Paul on her tour to promote her new memoir.

Clinton is due to appear July 20 at Common Good Books, a store launched by another prominent Democrat — Garrison Keillor.

Clinton's memoir, "Hard Choices," sits atop The New York Times' bestseller list for hardcover nonfiction.

The St. Paul appearance is a ticketed event.

ABC News: "Hillary Clinton Offers No Documents to Rebut Criticism of Hefty Speaker Fees"

By Liz Kreutz

July 9, 2014, 11:06 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton insists that she donates fees for giving speeches at colleges and universities but still has not released documents to back up her claims.

In an interview with ABC News' Ann Compton Friday, Clinton defended the high-dollar fees she charges for speaking at universities by saying the money goes to charity through the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation she controls with her husband, former president Bill Clinton. But Clinton, in response to specific follow-up questions, has offered nothing but silence.

"I have been very excited to speak to many universities during the last year and a half, and all of the fees have been donated to the Clinton Foundation for it to continue its life-changing and lifesaving work," Clinton said. "So it goes from a Foundation at a university to another foundation."

After the interview, ABC News reached out repeatedly to representatives from both the Clinton Foundation and Hillary Clinton's office requesting documents to support Clinton's claim, but none were provided.

As a nonprofit, the Clinton Foundation is required by law to turn over detailed financial information to the IRS and release much of that to the public upon request. But the foundation has yet to file its annual IRS form No. 990, which would include donation and expenditure details, for the period since she left the State Department at the start of President Obama's second term. The deadline for filing is Nov. 15, 2014.

If Clinton does to decide to run for president, she would have to file detailed financial-disclosure reports that would shine a light on both her personal income and assets and those of her husband.

At least eight universities, including four public institutions, have individually paid Clinton six-figures to speak on their campuses over the past year, according to the Washington Post.

(Included in this group is the University of Connecticut, which reportedly paid $252,250 from a donor fund for Clinton to speak in April, and the University of California at Los Angeles, which reportedly paid $300,000 for Clinton to speak in March.)

By the Post's calculations, Clinton has earned at least $1.8 million in speaking income from universities in the past nine months.

Such revelations have sparked a backlash from students on some of these campuses, including at the University of Nevada Las Vegas, where Clinton is scheduled to speak at a fundraiser in October. Students at the school have asked the former secretary of state to refund her fee of $225,000. In her interview with ABC News last week, Clinton offered no indication that she would do so and justified taking the fee because she donates the money back to charity.

Prior to the interview, Clinton's spokesman, Nick Merrill, told the Post that both her UCLA and UNLV fees are dedicated to go to the family's Foundation, but said he did not know whether the other six payments were.

Representatives for Clinton and the Clinton Foundation have yet to provide any documents supporting her claim that all of them have. ABC News has also requested that Clinton's office provide a full list of every school where she has spoken in the past year and a half, but there has been no response.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's speaking fees – roughly $200,000 per engagement — became a point of contention after she told ABC News' Diane Sawyer in an interview last month that she and her husband were "dead broke" after leaving the White House. Clinton's detractors seized on the comment as an indication that the potential presidential candidate is out of touch with average Americans.

The Republican opposition-research super PAC, America Rising, Tuesday called on the Clinton Foundation to disclose how it spends its money, in light of the comments Clinton made about donating her fees to the nonprofit.

"Secretary Clinton is using the foundation as a shield from scrutiny," the group's executive director, Tim Miller, told ABC News. "If she is going to cite donating speaking fees to the Clinton foundation as her defense for taking big speaking fees then she has a responsibility to be transparent about how that money is being spent."

The Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation was founded by former president Bill Clinton in 2001 and donates millions of dollars a year to improve global health, opportunities for women and girls, economic growth and the environment. According to its website, the group says its work has helped 430 million lives around the world.

Democracy Now!: "WikiLeaks' Julian Assange Responds to Hillary Clinton: Fair U.S. Trial for Snowden 'Not Possible'"

By Amy Goodman

July 9, 2014

In part two of our exclusive interview, Amy Goodman goes inside Ecuador's Embassy in London to speak with Julian Assange, the founder of WikiLeaks. Assange has been living in the embassy for more than two years under political asylum. He faces investigations in both Sweden and the United States, where a secret grand jury is investigating WikiLeaks for its role in publishing a trove of leaked documents about the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, as well as State Department cables. Assange responds to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's recent comments that National Security Agency whistleblower Edward Snowden should return home to face trial. "It's the advice of all our lawyers that he should not return to the United States. He'd be extremely foolish to do so," Assange says. "It's not possible to have a fair trial, because the U.S. government has a precedent of applying state secret privilege to prevent the defense from using material that is classified in their favor."

TRANSCRIPT

This is a rush transcript. Copy may not be in its final form.

AMY GOODMAN: We turn now to the second part of our Democracy Now! TV/radio broadcast exclusive. We went inside the Ecuadorean Embassy in London last weekend to interview WikiLeaks founder and publisher Julian Assange. He has just entered his third year inside the embassy, where he has political asylum. Assange faces investigations in both Sweden and the United States. Here in the U.S., a secret grand jury is investigating WikiLeaks for its role in publishing a trove of leaked documents about the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, as well as State Department cables. In Sweden, he's wanted for questioning on allegations of sexual misconduct, though no charges have been filed. Let's go to that interview.

AMY GOODMAN: This is Democracy Now!, democracynow.org , The War and Peace Report. I'm Amy Goodman. We're in the Ecuadorean Embassy in London, where Julian Assange has actually lived for more than two years. He has political asylum in Ecuador but can't make it there because he is concerned if he steps outside to get on a plane to Ecuador, the British government will arrest him and extradite him to Sweden. And he's concerned, in Sweden, he would be extradited to the United States to face charges around his organization, WikiLeaks, which he publishes.

So, Julian, I'd like you to respond to Hillary Clinton, the former secretary of state, could be running for president, her comments on Edward Snowden. She was interviewed by The Guardian, which first released the revelations based on the documents of Edward Snowden. And if you could just hit the first comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HILLARY CLINTON: Well, I would say, first of all, that Edward Snowden broke our laws, and that cannot be ignored or brushed aside.

AMY GOODMAN: Julian Assange, that first point of Hillary Clinton's?

JULIAN ASSANGE: Well, it's always interesting when someone proclaims to be a master of what is within the law and what is not within the law. We've seen a lot with Pentagon generals and other State Department figures, including Hillary. We've seen it in this case with General Alexander, talking about what is the law and what is not the law.

AMY GOODMAN: The former head of the NSA.

JULIAN ASSANGE: Yes. But, actually, in the end, in the United States, it's the Supreme Court that determines what the law is and what the law isn't. And part of what goes into the Supreme Court is the U.S. Constitution and its First Amendment obligations. So, whether the Espionage Act is constitutional is a very interesting question and has not been properly tested before. In fact, the U.S. government has been quite careful to not go to a proper appeal in relation to a conviction under the Espionage Act, in order to keep the threat there and not find that it is unconstitutional in court. So, I think there is actually a question even as to whether Edward Snowden, through his activities, broke the law. But then you can even go, OK, well, if he did, was it in fact the correct thing to do? Maybe the law is out of date. Maybe the law is wrong.

AMY GOODMAN: Let's go to Hillary Clinton's next point.

HILLARY CLINTON: Secondly, I believe that if his primary concern was stirring a debate in our country over the tension between privacy and security, there were other ways of doing it, instead of stealing an enormous amount of information that had nothing to do with the U.S. or American citizens.

JULIAN ASSANGE: As a journalist, I have been working at various times in documenting what the National Security Agency has been doing in its burgeoning mass surveillance practice for more than 20 years. And other journalists, some of them very fine, have also been trying to expose the National Security Agency. And other whistleblowers have come forward—so, Thomas Drake, William Binney, both from the National Security Agency, for example. But what was the problem? While we could point to, based on a sophisticated analysis of what the National Security Agency is doing—say, look at this piece here, look at this little bit of congressional testimony, look at the subpoena record, look at the technology that they are buying from this company, look at the number of employees, look at the DOD budget as a whole—when you add everything else up, you can work out the National Security Agency's budget. That's a very complex picture, and that's not a picture that can generate political reform and debate. And what Edward Snowden did was, by bringing out classified documents, that were official documents, that were even some of them just last year, he was able to show, even to people that didn't understand, the complexity of what was actually going on. So, we have proof. People did try to start a debate, using all sorts of methods, including former National Security Agency whistleblowers, and it's only primary source documents in volume that are probably capable of starting a debate about a complex issue like mass surveillance.

AMY GOODMAN: Hillary Clinton again.

HILLARY CLINTON: I would say, thirdly, that there are many people in our history who have raised serious questions about government behavior. They've done it either with or without whistleblower protection, and they have stood and faced whatever the reaction was to make their case in public.

AMY GOODMAN: Julian Assange?

JULIAN ASSANGE: Well, Hillary Clinton is alluding to, without mentioning the name of Daniel Ellsberg, the famous Pentagon Papers whistleblower from the 1970s. There's a reason she doesn't mention his name, because Daniel Ellsberg has come forward again and again this year and said that, in fact, he couldn't do what he did in the 1970s today, that the situation has changed, as far as the courts—the use of the state secrets privilege, how things have been sewn up holding all national security cases in Alexandria, Virginia—there's not a neutral jury pool—that he couldn't do that. And the reality is, that's the case for all national security whistleblowers who have classified documents. You can't fight a normal case, as we would think about it in the public. You're swept into a very aggressive system that is set against you from the first instance.

AMY GOODMAN: Hillary Clinton again.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HILLARY CLINTON: Mr. Snowden took all this material. He fled to Hong Kong. He spent time with the Russians in their consulate. Then he went to Moscow seeking the protection of Vladimir Putin, which is at the height of ironies, given the surveillance state that Russia is. If he wishes to return home, knowing that he would be held accountable, but also be able to present a defense, that is his decision to make. But I know that our intelligence forces are doing what they can to understand exactly what was taken.

AMY GOODMAN: That's Hillary Clinton. Julian Assange?

JULIAN ASSANGE: This is sadly typical of Hillary Clinton. We have facts about this matter. Not even the National Security Agency accuses him of working with the Russians. In fact, the National Security Agency, formally, in its investigation, has said that they don't think that he was working with the Russians, at least not before he left the agency. And Hillary Clinton, however, tries to reshape the chronology in order to smear Edward Snowden with being a Russian spy. The actual chronology is that Edward Snowden went to Hong Kong. He then saw that the situation was very difficult, reached out for us to help, and we were intimately involved from that point on. So I know precisely, myself, and our staff know, what happened. We submitted 20 asylum applications on behalf of Edward Snowden to a range of different countries, Latin America. It was Ed Snowden's intent to go to Latin America—Venezuela, Nicaragua, Ecuador was also looking favorable, and Bolivia offered him asylum. En route to Latin America, the U.S. State Department canceled his passport, leaving him marooned in Russia, unable to catch his next flight, which had already been booked from the very beginning. His whole path had been booked while he was in Hong Kong.

AMY GOODMAN: But she does say he went to the Russian Embassy in Hong Kong.

JULIAN ASSANGE: Hillary says that he went to the Russian Consulate in Hong Kong. I don't know about that, but I'm sure that perhaps he was looking for all different kinds of asylum options, and that would have made perfect sense for anyone to do that in such a severe situation. It is not a matter of irony that Edward Snowden was marooned by the U.S. State Department in Russia. Asylum is a serious business. It is something of a concern that the countries in western Europe, for example, that he asked for asylum—France, Germany, Spain—did not in fact come to the table. They were too scared about their geopolitical relationships. It's something of a concern that Edward Snowden, as an American citizen, felt that he could not speak freely in the United States. And he is right. It's the advice of all our lawyers that he should not return to the United States. He'd be extremely foolish to do so.

AMY GOODMAN: Let's go back to Hillary Clinton, who now goes on to talk about the debate in the United States.

HILLARY CLINTON: The debate about how to better balance security and liberty was already going on before he fled. The president had already given a speech. Members of the Senate were already talking about it. So I don't give him credit for the debate. I think he may have raised the visibility of the debate, but the debate had already begun.

JULIAN ASSANGE: A lot of people in the civil liberties community in the United States, in the privacy community in the rest of the world, and specialists, national security journalists like myself, had been following what the National Security Agency has been doing for a long time. We have been trying very hard to erect a debate. And there, yes, there were small debates, that really didn't proceed anywhere. The lawsuits filed by the EFF and ACLU to try and get somewhere went nowhere, because they didn't have the evidence. And what Edward Snowden revealed was documentary evidence, and it was that primary source evidence that has led to this debate. Everyone knows the difference—most people can't even remember hearing about the National Security Agency prior to last year. Now everyone knows about it. And that is almost entirely as a result of these disclosures.

AMY GOODMAN: Hillary Clinton makes other critical points.

HILLARY CLINTON: I don't know what he's been charged with; those are sealed indictments. I have no idea what he's been charged with. I'm not sure he knows what he's been charged with. But even in any case that I'm aware of, as a former lawyer, he has the right to mount a defense. And he certainly has the right to mount both a legal defense and a public defense, which of course can affect the legal defense.

AMY GOODMAN: Julian Assange, your response?

JULIAN ASSANGE: As Daniel Ellsberg, the famous Pentagon Papers whistleblower, has said, it is not possible for a national security whistleblower now in the United States to have a fair trial. It's not possible to have a fair trial because all the trials are held in Alexandria, Virginia, where the jury pool is comprised of the highest density of military and government employees in all of the United States. It's not possible to have a fair trial, because the U.S. government has a precedent of applying state secret privilege to prevent the defense from using material that is classified in their favor. It's not possible to have a fair trial, because as a defendant in a national security case, you are held under special administrative measures, which makes it very hard to look at any of the material in your case, to meet with your lawyers, to speak to people, etc. So, this is—it's just simply not a fair system. And even if you do eventually win by the time you get up to the Supreme Court, you spend seven years or something in a very serious condition trying to defend yourself, instead of what has happened with Edward Snowden. As a result of him having asylum, we can talk about the issues, not talking about whether Snowden is guilty or not, and Edward Snowden himself can tell the world, "Well, look, this is what actually happened. This is what is going on."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AMY GOODMAN: Let's go back to what Hillary Clinton has to say.

HILLARY CLINTON: But the other issue that has never been satisfactorily answered to me is, if his main concern was what was happening inside the United States, then why did he take so much about what was happening with Russia, with China, with Iran, with al-Qaeda?

AMY GOODMAN: That's Hillary Clinton in her Guardian interview. This last point that she addresses, Julian Assange?

JULIAN ASSANGE: It's no surprise to me that Hillary Clinton thinks that human beings that are not formally U.S. citizens don't have any rights. But not everyone thinks like that. Other people in other countries have rights. Now, if we look at the practicalities of Edward Snowden acquiring documents while he was a contractor for Booz Allen Hamilton working for the National Security Agency and, prior to that, a contractor for Dell, the National Security Agency runs a mass surveillance program, a strategic surveillance program. The same technology, the same protocols are used to surveil people inside the United States, people outside the United States, etc. So if you're trying to collect information to expose mass surveillance, then, by its very nature, you're going to expose National Security Agency practices all over the world, because it's the same process that occurs, whether you're in England or whether you're in Germany or whether you're in the United States.

AMY GOODMAN: That was Julian Assange responding to The Guardian's interview with Hillary Clinton. It was The Guardian's Phoebe Greenwood who questioned the former secretary of state. You can see her full interview at TheGuardian.com. Back to my conversation with Julian Assange in a minute.

Vanity Fair: VF Daily: Sally Kohn: "The One Thing Republicans Must Do to Have a Credible Shot at Defeating Hillary"

By Sally Kohn

July 9, 2014, 8:00 a.m. EDT

Gosh, I bet Republicans are starting to regret their systematic alienation of women.

Not only have 99 percent of sexually active women ages 15 to 44 in America used birth control, but by a 2–1 margin, American women support the requirement under Obamacare that private health insurance plans cover the full cost of birth control. Three in five women support the requirement, even if it violates the personal religious beliefs of a company's owners. Among younger women, that support skyrockets.

The Republican war on women may already be making it difficult for conservatives to win women voters in 2016. Hillary Clinton makes it impossible: a strong 68 percent of independent women say they would vote for Clinton if she runs for president, as would 35 percent of Republican women. It's no wonder Republicans are in an all-out battle to attack every single thing Hillary Clinton says and does: if she runs for president, the Republicans are screwed.

Of course, they wouldn't be if there were a credible conservative woman to run against her. Let's examine the G.O.P. track record on this front. It begins and ends with Sarah Palin. Personally delightful. Politically colorful. But not exactly a credible candidate for a party needing to win credibility with women voters—or anyone else for that matter.

So who else is there? Well, most often the GOP2016 contenders mentioned are all men. But there are some women who could and should be considered. When pressed to come up with some XX- chromosome contenders, Republicans most frequently mention South Carolina Governor

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nikki Haley, New Mexico Governor Susana Martinez, and New Hampshire Senator Kelly Ayotte. One could even add Oklahoma Governor Mary Fallin to the list and point out that, generally, while Republicans are struggling to find support at the national level, the party is doing fairly well in those states. And it's worth noting that four of the nation's five female governors are Republicans.

As for the governors, Haley is charismatic but seems like a long shot; even within heavily Republican South Carolina, an equal percentage of voters disapprove of Haley as approve of her. But Fallin and Martinez are both more popular (64 percent of Oklahomans think Fallin is doing a good job, and 61 percent of New Mexicans rate Martinez favorably), plus Martinez hails from a coveted swing state. And yet the 2016 attention focuses on the likes of John Kasich (Ohio), Scott Walker (Wisconsin), Rick Snyder (Michigan), and Bobby Jindal (Louisiana). Yet Kasich and Walker are both far from popular, disliked by almost as many voters as they are liked. And polls show more voters actively disapprove of Snyder and Jindal than support them. That's in their home states!

When it comes to the Senate, Republican presidential pickers tend to focus not on Ayotte but on Ted Cruz (Texas), Marco Rubio (Florida), and Rand Paul (Kentucky). But bear this in mind: Ted Cruz won 56 percent of Texas votes in 2012, only one percentage point more than John McCain earned in the Lone Star State in the 2008 presidential election. In 2010, 56 percent of Kentucky voters backed Rand Paul, but 58 percent backed McCain in 2008. In 2010 in Florida, Marco Rubio carried 49 percent of all voters; McCain lost the state in 2012 with 48 percent of the vote. In other words, even in their home states, Cruz, Paul, and Rubio aren't uniquely, nor even widely popular; they're just Republicans—faring as well as other Republican candidates.

By comparison, in 2008 Obama won 54 percent of the New Hampshire vote, and McCain got 45 percent. But in 2010, Ayotte won statewide with 60 percent support. That makes Kelly Ayotte a uniquely popular Republican with broad bi-partisan appeal, especially compared with the other guys.

Of course, Jindal, Kasich, Walker, Snyder, Fallin, and Haley have all signed extremely draconian laws restricting abortions, so their appeal to moderate voters is questionable. And certainly Rubio, Paul, and Ayotte would face a significant hurdle with voters who are fed up with Republican obstructionism at the federal level and rate Republicans in Congress in general lower than dirt.

If Republicans want to have a fighting change with women voters in 2016 and with mainstream American voters in general, abandoning their extremist and extremely unpopular anti-women agenda would also help. But in the meantime, some rebranding couldn't hurt. Out with the Palin, in with the new.

Ayotte and Martinez, and even Haley and Fallin, have all kinds of political and demographic advantages, in addition to the obvious reality that they would stop Hillary Clinton from automatically winning the "vote for the first female president" vote. Ayotte and Martinez in particular should be rolling off the tongues of the Republican chattering class as they name top contenders for the presidential ticket. But they aren't.

Why is that, exactly? There couldn't possibly be sexism within the Republican Party. After all, these folks don't believe sexism exists.

Politico: Morning Money: "Does Hillary want a tax cut? — Citi close to $7B settlement — Ex-Im could ride on CR" [PARTIAL]

By Ben White

July 9, 2014, 7:52 a.m. EDT

DOES HILLARY CLINTON WANT A LOWER TOP TAX RATE? — Hillary Clinton gave an interesting interview to Germany's Der Spiegel in which she spoke of her general agreement with Thomas Piketty (even though she has not read his book) and expanded on her and her husband's extensive wealth. Clinton elaborated on her previous comment that she and her husband were "dead broke" upon leaving the White House in 2001. And she seemed to suggest that Bill Clinton needed to make as much as he did (around $104 million so far) because of their high marginal tax rate.

Clinton told the German weekly: "We are very grateful for where we are today. But if you were to go back and look at the amount of money that we owed, we couldn't even get a mortgage on a house by ourselves. In our system he had to make double what he needed in order just to pay off the debt, and then to finance a house and continue to pay for our daughter's education." …

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It seems like the “system” Clinton was referring to was the U.S. tax system, though we don’t know for sure. Ironically, it was Bill Clinton himself who signed a top rate increase to 39.6% into law in 1993. Taken together with her previous comment to The Guardian about how people don’t resent the Clintons because they pay ordinary taxes “unlike some other people,” it seems like Hillary Clinton is not too happy with the higher rate on income and lower rate on capital gains and other investment income. … Could we be seeing the early stirrings of an economic policy platform? THE BIG IDEA: Ted Cruz's operatives are quietly reaching out to Rand Paul's early supporters and endorsers, making the case that the Texas senator is their best bet if they want a Republican nominee who is friendly to libertarians.

Saul Anuzis, the former Michigan GOP chair who is working for Cruz, recently traveled to New Hampshire to meet with Paul backers and make that case, my colleague David Weigel scoops for the 202. The key to his pitch: Paul is floundering and Cruz is viable. Other sources tell me that Cruz is poised to roll out a few endorsements from 2012 supporters of Ron Paul who have held off on signing with Rand.

The Texas senator has a robust network of super PACs, with the hefty backing of hedge-fund magnate Robert Mercer, while the head of Rand's main super PAC got indicted by the feds last week on 2012-related campaign finance charges. Cruz allies are also circulating recent news reports that highlight organizational problems within Paul's orbit.

The Kentucky senator, who is simultaneously running for reelection and president in 2016, is struggling to expand his coalition while consolidating the libertarian purists. After spending 2013 as a media darling, he's drifted out of the conversation and slipped in the polls. A survey released yesterday by Public Policy Polling found Paul getting just 3 percent among likely Iowa caucusgoers, down from 10 percent in April. (Cruz is in sixth place at 9 percent.)

Cruz himself freely acknowledges that he wants to dip into the libertarian bracket. The Texan is on a bus tour this week across the South, with a focus on states with early March primaries. Katie Zezima, on the Cruz beat for The Post, relayed between stops in Tennessee that Cruz is invoking the Fourth Amendment, a Paul favorite, whenever possible.

On Sunday, during a rally in Huntsville, Ala., Cruz pivoted twice to libertarian-leaning answers. First, he bragged about being "an original co-sponsor" of Paul's "Audit the Fed" bill. "What the Fed is doing is dangerous," he said. "They are debasing the currency with QE1, QE2, QE infinity!" Then, asked about databases kept by the Department of Housing and Urban Development to track diversity, Cruz touted his unrelated work "to lead the effort to end the federal government's bulk collection of phone metadata."

In contrast to Paul, who brought the Senate to a standstill to force the Patriot Act's expiration, Cruz supported a compromise bill, which President Obama signed into law. In Iowa this spring, Cruz criticized Paul for making the perfect the enemy of the good. "If you're a terrorist, we need to track down everything you do and we need to go out and find you and kill you," Cruz said to cheers Sunday, per Katie. "But, if you're a law-abiding citizen, the federal government has no business seizing your phone calls or your emails."

Cruz got relatively short shrift from debate moderators last Thursday, but online polls suggest that he's since gotten a statistically significant bounce nationally. His campaign says it raised $1.1 million during the 100 hours after the debate from more than 10,000 contributors.

A year ago, it was widely assumed that Paul could count on the very base of support Cruz is now coming after. A spokesman for Rand did not respond to a request for comment about how they'll respond to Cruz's play.

— Preview – Jeb Bush is laying out his foreign policy strategy in a speech tonight at the Reagan library. President Obama's decision to withdraw U.S. military forces from Iraq was "premature" and a "fatal error," he will argue. "What we are facing in ISIS and its ideology is, to borrow a phrase, the focus of evil in the modern world," he plans to say, according to prepared remarks provided by the campaign. "And civilized nations everywhere, especially those with power, have a duty to oppose and defeat this enemy."

- "So why was the success of the surge followed by a withdrawal from Iraq, leaving not even the residual force that commanders and the joint chiefs knew was necessary?" Bush will ask. "That premature withdrawal was the fatal error, creating the void that ISIS moved in to fill – and that Iran has exploited to the full as well. … ISIS grew while the United States disengaged from the Middle East and ignored the threat."
- "And where was Secretary of State Clinton in all of this? Like the president himself, she had opposed the surge…then joined in claiming credit for its success … then stood by as that hard-won victory by American and allied forces was thrown away," he will say. "In all her record-setting travels, she stopped by Iraq exactly once." Watch the livestream of the Bush speech at 6 p.m. Pacific/9 p.m. Eastern here . The campaign is also releasing a new 1-minute web video on national security this morning. Watch it here .

— Marco Rubio will lay out his own strategy for dealing with anti-American regimes on Friday morning during a speech at the Foreign Policy Initiative in New York. The appearance is timed to bracket Secretary of State John Kerry's trip to Havana the same day; Florida's senator will speak about the Obama administration's "capitulation," an aide says. Rubio will take questions but focus on Cuba and Iran.

— Rick Perry, facing a cash crunch, has stopped paying his staff . "The former Texas governor, who has struggled to gain traction in his second presidential run, has stopped paying staff at the national headquarters in Austin as well as in the early caucus and primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina," the Post's Philip Rucker and Dan Balz, along with Texas Tribune's Abby Livingston, report. "Perry campaign manager Jeff Miller told staff last Friday, the day after the first Republican presidential debate, that they would no longer be paid and are free to look for other jobs — and, so far at least, most aides have stuck with Perry — according to this Republican."

— Fox News anchor Megyn Kelly came back from a beach weekend with her family, and tackled the controversy with Donald Trump — sort of. She said she had "decided" not to address the personal attacks against her by the businessman post-debate. "I certainly will not apologize for doing good journalism," she said, before decreeing it was time to move on.

— In Ferguson, things remained mostly calm overnight, despite a state of emergency declared by St. Louis County authorities. Police arrested dozens of prominent protestors on the anniversary of the shooting death of Michael Brown, and charged an 18-year black man who was critically wounded by police with assaulting law enforcement officers. Nonetheless, it was a mostly calm day, despite the fact that activists temporarily shut down a major freeway in the area.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

— "How Donald Trump abandoned his father's middle-class housing empire for luxury building," by Emily Badger: "Where the son spares no expense, the father counted pennies. Where Donald builds in glass and steel, his father built in brick. Donald has made the family name a synonym for luxury, but the origins of the Trump empire lie in Fred's decidedly less elite market: the lower-middle class, the outer boroughs, renters. The differences reflect not just the separate eras in which the two men built, but also their diverging ambitions. The younger Trump looked at what his father had created, he wrote in his 1987 book 'The Art of the Deal,' and decided he wanted to do something 'grander, more glamorous, and more exciting.'"

— New York, "Donald Trump and Roger Ailes make up, sort of ," by Gabriel Sherman: "According to two high-level Fox sources, Ailes's diplomacy was the result of increasing concern inside Fox News that Trump could damage the network. Immediately following Thursday's debate, Fox was deluged with pro-Trump emails. The chatter on Twitter was equally in Trump's favor. 'In the beginning, virtually 100 percent of the emails were against Megyn Kelly,' one Fox source, who was briefed on the situation, told me. 'Roger was not happy. Most of the Fox viewers were taking Trump's side.' Things got worse for Ailes over the weekend. In a phone conversation, Trump told Sean Hannity that 'he was never doing Fox again,' according to one person with knowledge of the call. The anti-Kelly emails, and threat of a boycott by Trump, seem to have pushed Ailes to defuse the war. One Fox personality told me that Fox producers gave instructions to tell in-house talent not to bring up Trump's controversial comments that Kelly had 'blood coming out of her wherever' during the debate. According to one count, Fox only aired Trump's comment once since Friday, while CNN mentioned it at least 50 times."

Subject:	FW: JEB BUSH ON THE OBAMA ADMINISTRATION'S NUCLEAR DEA L WITH IRAN

Fyi, scroll all the way down for completeness

Told Ken the real reason Iran was able to start and build nuclear capability was it no longer had Sadam and Iraq to contend with and Jeb had to answer the question on how you could get a better deal without the threat on Iran's western border posed by Sadam unless you were willing to replace the threat of Sadam with an American presence in Iraq that was 300,000 plus similar to the cold war build up in West Germany .

Anything short of that and merely stating I can negotiate a better deal , without a buildup of significant American presence and the expenditure of significant American dollars on Iran's borders to replace the counter balance of Sadam is pure demagoguery .

The question for Jeb and others is not whether a better deal could be negotiated, but how can one be negotiated without a large expenditure of tax dollars and an American presence on the border of Iran .

The second question is can Russia and China be trusted, is it in their interest , to enforce this deal. If it is , then there can be no better deal without an American presence, if they cannot be trusted then the other option is do nothing and continue unilateral American sanctions or the American presence option.

Everyone knows merely strategically bombing Iran will not produce the result desired or create any stability in the region.

In summary Jeb should be forced to answer the q ,how can you negotiate a better deal if Iran is no longer threatened by its neighbor Iraq, and the corollary

Isn't it true the only reason Iran was able to accelerate its nuclear program was because of the American invasion of Iraq.

I understand we cannot ask these q's but someone should start asking Jeb and the others.

JEB BUSH ON THE OBAMA ADMINISTRATION'S NUCLEAR DEAL WITH IRAN

Miami, FL — Governor Jeb Bush released the following statement in response to President Obama's nuclear deal with Iran.

"The nuclear agreement announced by the Obama Administration today is a dangerous, deeply flawed, and short sighted deal.

"A comprehensive agreement should require Iran to verifiably abandon – not simply delay – its pursuit of a nuclear weapons capability.

"Based on initial reports and analysis, it appears this agreement does not 'cut off all of Iran's pathways to a nuclear weapon' – in fact, over time it paves Iran's path to a bomb. Most of the key restrictions last for only 10 to 15 years. Even before the deal expires, it could allow Iran to develop an industrial-scale enrichment program and continue its R&D on advanced centrifuges and development of an ICBM.

"The deal does not require Iran to come completely clean up front about possible military dimensions of its nuclear program or include true anytime/anywhere inspections necessary for a nuclear program shrouded in deception and lies.

"President Obama has acknowledged the agreement would end the United Nations' conventional arms embargo, a critical tool to combat Iran's support for terrorism and destabilizing activities in the region.

"The deal would provide more than $100 billion in sanctions relief that will breathe new life into Iran's malevolent and corrupt regime, enabling its projection of terror and power as well as its repression of the Iranian people – who aspire for, and deserve, a more democratic future.

"The clerical leaders in Tehran routinely preach 'death to America' and 'death to Israel' – and through their acts of terror, they mean it. We must take these threats seriously and should not base any agreements on the hope their behavior will moderate over time.

"The people of Iran, the region, Israel, America, and the world deserve better than a deal that consolidates the grip on power of the violent revolutionary clerics who rule Tehran with an iron fist.

"This isn't diplomacy – it is appeasement."

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch (WSJ)
By Peter Nicholas
February 1, 2015
Wall Street Journal

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.

She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder, a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch, a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.

"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

Clinton advisers are split on when Hillary Clinton should launch her campaign (CNN)
By Brianna Keilar
February 2, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN) This time eight years ago, when she first ran for president, Hillary Clinton was already officially a candidate.

"I'm in it to win it," she said in a YouTube video posted on January 21, 2007.

But even though a second Hillary Clinton for president campaign is all but certain, she and those close to her are debating when she should jump in the race, potentially delaying her entry by months.

There is no waiting for Republicans, who are engaged in a furious behind-the-scenes scramble for advisers and donors. Mitt Romney, Republicans' nominee in 2012, announced Friday he would bow out after just three weeks on the presidential speculation treadmill. Three Republican senators, two current governors and one former governor have all made active moves toward campaigns.

There could be ten or more Republican candidates by this summer. That might be when Hillary Clinton gets around to officially moving toward a campaign, if she heeds some confidantes, who are privately arguing for an announcement in July to coincide with the start of the third fundraising quarter. Delaying until the summer is an idea that is said to be gaining momentum against those who want to stick to the plan for an April start date.

The possibility of the delay is very real but still unsettled.

"I would say it's 40 percent," in the direction of those arguing for a delay, said one Democrat who supports a spring debut for Clinton's presidential campaign. Another Democrat who saw merits in both time lines put the odds of a delay at 50 percent.

Democrats on both sides of the debate spoke to CNN on the condition of anonymity so they could make their case without upsetting Clinton or those close to her for talking openly about internal deliberations.

Some Clinton loyalists worry that as the increasingly crowded Republican race heats up, the attacks on her could begin to stick without an apparatus in place to answer them.

The liberal superPAC American Bridge has been countering Republican attacks on Clinton's behalf but many Democrats think it's no substitute for a campaign messaging operation.

"They're doing terrific research," said one, "but they don't know what her specific policy agenda is going to be. She should get in and start putting together a substantive policy agenda so the attacks that are going to begin to come from every single republican who is jumping in to the race can be answered."

The Democratic National Committee is beginning to take on a larger role in an effort to protect Clinton and the party brand but many Democrats are concerned even that won't be enough.

Other supporters want Clinton to lay low as the Republican field heats up, convinced Clinton will avoid some fire if she's undeclared and GOP candidates will take aim at each other instead.

"Never interrupt your opponent when it's destroying itself. That event in Iowa - nobody hated that more than [RNC chairman] Reince Priebus," said one Democrat, referring to the recent Iowa Freedom Summit, the first GOP cattle call for prospective candidates of many Republican presidential hopefuls (though noticeably neither Jeb Bush, Mitt Romney nor Rand Paul) attended. "Let's get Sarah Palin out there, let's get Donald Trump out there - the whole clown car."

Some Democrats believe it's also in Clinton's best interest to wait until President Obama, whose approval ratings have begun to rebound, becomes more popular, since a campaign by his former secretary of state will undoubtedly be seen as an extension of his presidency. It's a view shared by many at the White House who eye the entry of Clinton into the 2016 contest as the beginning of Obama's lame duck phase.

But if Clinton waits, could run the risk of looking like she's taking the Democratic nomination for granted.

"The American people don't like to see a candidate assume that something is theirs for the taking," warned one Clinton supporter.

"If [Hillary Clinton] is trying to avoid a coronation it really is a terrible way to go about it. It sends a message that we don't have to campaign in the primaries." said a Democratic operative in Iowa, who warned it leaves an opening. "It really does require another candidate to fill that void"

And so far, no one has.

Vice President Joe Biden, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Senator Jim Webb and Vermont

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Bernie Sanders have all made the trek to Iowa in the last year, but none are being particularly agressive in recruiting staff or taking on Clinton.

"O'Malley hired one staff member the other day and that's all anyone is talking about," said the Iowa operative of the unusually quiet political scene in the early state. "It's kinda weird."

In 2008, Clinton's air of inevitability was off putting to many voters. Clinton and her advisers have been looking to avoid it this time around.

But without an insurgent, Obama-like candidate waiting in the wings (Clinton insiders are now pretty much convinced that populist darling and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren won't run, despite initial concerns she could mount a serious challenge from the left), many loyalists argue Clinton is safe to wait.

"If she's out there working hard, making her case, speaking to voters, that's what's going to matter," said a Washington-based Clinton backer who thinks a delayed campaign launch could benefit her.

It won't benefit her campaign coffers, however.

"Money will not flow until she's actually running," said one Democrat who cited powerful donor support for a Clinton run but acknowledged, "People don't give that kind of money on speculation."

The numerous Clinton loyalists interviewed for this piece admit there are arguments for both timelines. But perhaps the most important factor in deciding when to jump in the race is Hillary Clinton's personal inclination to put off campaigning.

The last time she ran for president, she entered the race in January 2006, almost two years before the election. The Democratic primary contest turned into a bruising slog that she is not eager to repeat.

"You can't dance in that spotlight for two years," a Clinton loyalist said. "She's not Rand Paul, she's the most famous woman on earth and every move is scrutinized."

A look at potential Democratic contenders in 2016 race (AP)
By Ken Thomas
February 2, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Unlike the active jockeying among Republicans thinking about running for president, there is little public action among the Democratic considering a White House bid. Here's a look at where they stand.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

The leading contender, Clinton is widely expected to announce a campaign in the coming months. She has maintained a low profile since mid-December. She has been meeting with advisers to plan for a potential campaign and has limited the number of coming public appearances; her next scheduled address is this month in California.

JOE BIDEN

The vice president has said he will make a decision later in the spring or summer, but has taken few steps to build the foundation of a campaign structure.

JIM WEBB

The former Virginia senator and Navy secretary announced an exploratory committee last year, but has done little publicly in recent weeks as he recovers from knee replacement surgery. He expects to make a decision in the spring.

MARTIN O'MALLEY

The former Maryland governor has said he will need "a couple of months" to get his family settled after a move to a new home in Baltimore before deciding on a bid. O'Malley signed on with a speaking firm after leaving the governor's office and will be as a visiting professor at Johns Hopkins University. He plans to return to the early voting states of South Carolina in late February and New Hampshire in mid-March.

BERNIE SANDERS

The independent senator from Vermont is ramping up his activities as he decides whether to pursue a campaign. Sanders was returning to New Hampshire this weekend and has a four-day trip to Iowa planned for this month.

ELIZABETH WARREN

The Massachusetts senator remains the subject of a draft movement by liberal activists but has repeatedly declined interest in running for president. She remains an influential voice within the Democratic party and has made clear she hopes to influence the 2016 debate, arguing that the economic benefits from the recovery have helped Wall Street instead of boosting wages for middle-class families.

For Clinton, deciding how to prepare for a low-key primary (AP)
By Ken Thomas
February 2, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The challenge ahead for Hillary Rodham Clinton is one faced by few White House hopefuls: running a primary campaign in which she faces little competition, if any at all.

Still not officially a candidate, the former New York senator, secretary of state and first lady sits far atop early polls against a small field of potential rivals for the Democratic nomination. None of them seems to be in any hurry to move into the race.

Few Democrats see an insurgent candidate in the mold of Barack Obama on the horizon. That raises the potential of a pedestrian Democratic primary season with few televised debates and little of the drama expected from a crowded and likely combative race on the Republican side.

"No one wants a complete coronation, but it's hard to see who a credible challenger will be," said Steve Westly, a California-based fundraiser for Obama's campaigns who is supporting Clinton.

Clinton has been meeting in New York with a group of advisers that includes longtime loyalists and veterans of Obama's races. But the work of campaign planning involves trying to figure out when to get into the race, how to avoid giving off a sense of inevitability and how to generate enthusiasm among the party's base for the general election without the benefit of a spirited fight for the nomination.

"All indications are that she's casting a wide net, talking to smart people, and being methodical about thinking through her next steps," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist and Clinton ally. "And having run a presidential campaign, this is how you go about making this decision and next steps."

The first step? Deciding when to get into the race.

Clinton's timeline for announcing her candidacy remains a subject of debate inside her team, according to Democrats familiar with the discussions.

Some advisers are pushing the possibility of a springtime announcement. Others suggest she could wait until the summer, giving her team more time to get ready.

Some insiders note that her husband, Bill Clinton, did not launch his first presidential campaign until October 1991, a few months before the first primaries of the 1992 race.

In the already competitive Republican field, the aggressive moves of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush appear to have chased Mitt Romney into and out of the race.

But the potential Democratic competition is not putting any pressure on Clinton to move quickly.

Vice President Joe Biden has said he will not make a decision until the spring or the summer. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, a liberal favorite, insists she's not running.

Others, such as ex-Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders are relatively unknown nationally and are not expected to decide until later in the spring.

Clinton appears in no rush. She has a limited number of public appearances in the coming months, leaving outside groups to fill the void.

Ready for Hillary, a pro-Clinton super political action committee, has a number of low-dollar fundraisers on the calendar, including an event in New York next month with former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean.

"The question is what advantage is the Clinton campaign giving up by not being active in Iowa as a candidate today? And I can't think of any," said Jerry Crawford, a Des Moines lawyer who served as Clinton's Midwest co-chairman in 2008.

Clinton has suggested one — the potential for voters to see her as entitled to the nomination. She was hurt by sky-high expectations in her last campaign and finished a disappointing third in Iowa's caucuses, sparking Obama's ascent.

"If I were to decide to pursue it, I would be working as hard as any underdog or any newcomer because I don't want to take anything for granted if I decide to do it," Clinton said in a June interview.

Clinton's main obstacles during a quiet primary campaign could come from Republicans and GOP-leaning outside groups, which already are trying to discredit her record at the State Department and tie her to Obama's policies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several Republicans took swipes at Clinton at an Iowa forum last weekend, as did Romney in a speech in Mississippi this past week.

"Hillary Clinton clearly feels she's entitled to the presidency and is taking the race for granted like she did in 2008," said Republican National Committee chairman Reince Priebus, reflecting the GOP's intense focus on Clinton.

Such GOP criticism could rile her supporters. But a low-key primary could limit her campaign's ability to test its organizational strength and its opportunities to seize on important moments — a primary night, debate, major address — that often fuel online fundraising and list-building.

During the last contested Democratic campaign, the party's first presidential debate was held in South Carolina in April 2007 and the field went on to take part in more than two dozen such events. With no announced candidates, a springtime debate already appears unlikely.

Still, there are benefits to the lack of a challenge.

Even with Republicans as the main foil, a relatively uncontested primary would give Clinton a clear path to raise millions of dollars and build a campaign organization, a benefit normally bestowed to an incumbent president, and perhaps keep her above the political fray.

"I'm really excited for these next two years," said Neera Tanden, a former Clinton policy adviser who spoke at a Ready for Hillary event in Washington last week. "You know with any Clinton adventure, it's a roller coaster. It will be very exciting. And she's really going to need all of us to step up."

If Hillary Clinton decides not to run in 2016, how bad would it be for Democrats? (WAPO)
By Chris Cillizza
February 2, 2015
Washington Post

Emily Bell, who runs the Tow Center for Digital Journalism at Columbia University, tweeted this simple but provocative question a few days ago: "What are the odds on Hillary not running?"

I replied that it was about 10 percent. Others, such as Politico's Ben White, said it was more like 0.1 percent. The question, and the back-and-forth over it, got me thinking about what would happen in the unlikely event that Hillary Rodham Clinton decided not to run. After all, she has only hinted at her interest publicly and has yet to take the steps — leadership PAC, etc. — that would indicate clear interest. Virtually everything we know about Clinton's plans come from staff movements and quotes to reporters from "those in the know" who demand anonymity to share their knowledge.

I wrote about this possibility about a year ago and concluded that if Clinton stayed out, the result would be a crowded field with Vice President Biden as a nominal front-runner. Republicans' chances of winning the White House also would immediately improve.

There's a different dynamic at work now, particularly if Clinton waits a few more months to make clear exactly what she is going to do in 2016. We are rapidly approaching the point of no return for her and Democrats. That is, if she were suddenly to decide not to run in, say, two months, there would be an overwhelming sense of doom within the party. The shock would reverberate for weeks, or maybe much longer, making it hard for anyone looking to fill the void she left behind.

Now, that doom would eventually be followed by a wild scramble among the Bidens, Martin O'Malleys and, yes, even Elizabeth Warrens of the party for the donors, activists and staffers who had been assumed to be part of the Clinton machine. But doing things in a hurry with what would be regarded widely as Democrats' "B" or even "C" team would be deeply problematic.

Simply put, for Clinton to pass on the race — and especially if she waits until the summer to make her decision public — would be absolutely disastrous for her party's chances of holding on to the White House in 2016. She and her budding team have to know that, and it's hard for me to imagine that she would have let things go this far — there is an entire campaign and outside Clinton world in place for her — if she had any serious or lingering doubts about whether she was going to make the race.

And, as has been true since Day One, she is a heavy favorite to become the Democratic nominee. One data point to back that up: In a new Des Moines Register-Bloomberg poll, Clinton stood at 56 percent in a hypothetical Iowa caucus matchup, with 16 percent for Warren, the Massachusetts senator, and 9 percent for Biden.

Here, we've ranked Clinton and the six other people who either will or could conceivably run for president against her.

7. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). Sanders appears to be serious about running, which is why he's on this list. Although he will probably get real support from more liberal quarters of the party, his appeal is limited. Still, he'll mix it up, and in an interview with The Washington Post this week, he questioned whether Clinton would be "bold" enough as president.

6. Former Virginia senator Jim Webb. As CNN's Dan Merica pointed out recently, Webb is running his campaign — he has formed an exploratory committee — largely via Twitter. Given that Webb has fewer than 5,000 Twitter followers, this may not be the most sound political strategy.

5. California Gov. Jerry Brown. Bear with us for a second here. Brown is governor of a notoriously difficult state to run, he has run for president before, and he's not exactly friendly with the Clintons. And, he's super popular. He's also 76 (even though he doesn't look or act like it), and there's little indication he's seriously looking at running. But if he did . . .

4. Biden. The vice president assured us recently that he is serious about running for president in 2016 — probably because folks like us are increasingly dubious and he hasn't done much of the legwork to put a team in place. Even if he did run, we still have a hard time seeing him catch fire. He's entertaining, yes, but "entertaining" ain't "presidential."

3. O'Malley. If there's anybody who can conceivably beat Clinton by running to her left — and might actually run — it's O'Malley. He's got lots of liberal bona fides from his time as Maryland governor, and he checks lots of other boxes — even though he didn't really leave office on a high note. But we would stress that this is all on paper, and O'Malley would still face tough odds.

2. Warren. The drumbeat for Warren to reconsider her past refusals to consider running in 2016 has died down a bit in recent weeks. That said, Warren backers commissioned a poll released Friday that showed significant unhappiness with Clinton among Democratic voters. Warren has the liberal profile and fundraising ability to be a serious problem for Clinton if she decided she wanted to be.

1. Clinton. The former secretary of state is the biggest, non-incumbent favorite for a presidential nomination since at least World War II.

Bush, Clinton Face Headwinds in 2016 Race (US News)
By Kenneth Walsh
February 2, 2015
US News and World Report

With the exit of Mitt Romney from the 2016 presidential race, the two best-positioned remaining potential candidates, Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton, face similar problems as establishment leaders during a time of political ferment.

If they run, as expected, they will be prime targets for everyone else in the campaign and for the news media. They will need to reassure zealous factions in their parties that prefer more ideologically pure nominees. For Clinton, the biggest threat to her winning the Democratic nomination probably comes from the left. For Bush, the threat for the Republican nomination probably comes from the right. Both of them also will be called upon to explain why their experience, their family ties and their connections to the political establishment should outweigh the desire of many voters for new blood and fresh faces.

For the immediate future, both are trying to lock up as many big donors as they can, which both Clinton and Bush are better positioned to do than their intra-party rivals.

Romney's exit means that Bush, son of a former president and brother of another, and former two-term governor of Florida, will have an easier time recruiting Romney's formidable array of financial contributors from the former Republican nominee's failed 2012 campaign.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie is thought to have a chance to recruit some of Romney's donors, who helped Romney and allied groups raise $1 billion in the 2012 presidential cycle. But Christie hasn't caught on with the party's base and Bush is considered far ahead in amassing donors so far. This is partly because he can tap into the network of Republicans who earlier backed his father and brother.

However, Bush still has to prove himself to many conservative activists who play a big role in GOP politics in key states. Bush "becomes the target for everyone who is anti-establishment," Saul Anuzis, former chairman of the Michigan Republican party, told the Washington Post. "Before, you had Romney and Bush kind of splitting up that ire."

Many GOP voters are worried that Bush will be tarred with the unpopular policies of his father, George H.W. Bush, who broke his pledge not to raise taxes, and his brother George W. Bush, who began the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and who was president during an economic meltdown.

In Iowa, the first state to hold presidential nominating caucuses, Bush did poorly in a new poll of GOP voters who say they will vote in those caucuses a year from now. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker came in first with 15 percent, followed by Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky with 14 percent; Romney with 13 percent (the poll was conducted before he announced Friday that he wasn't running); former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas with 10 percent, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson with 9 percent, and Bush with 8 percent. All the other potential GOP candidates lagged behind, according to the poll, which was conducted by Bloomberg Politics and the Des Moines Register.

When Romney's supporters were re-distributed to their second choices, Walker, Paul, Huckabee and Carson remained the top four and Bush gained only one percentage point, moving from 8 percent to 9 percent. The situation in Iowa remains fluid and Bush still could surge into the lead, but he has a lot of work to do.

On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton had the support of 56 percent of likely Iowa caucus-goers, followed by Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts with 16 percent; Vice President Joe Biden with 9 percent, and Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, an independent, with 5 percent. This means 21 percent of these Iowa Democrats -- the ones supporting vociferous liberals Warren and Sanders (neither of whom has declared a candidacy) -- prefer someone further to the left than Clinton. They haven't jumped on her bandwagon despite her lead in national polls and her credentials that include serving as first lady during her husband Bill Clinton's administration, U.S. senator from New York, and secretary of state under President Barack Obama.

This could be a danger sign. It's a reminder that even though Clinton also was the early front-runner in 2008 when she sought the Democratic nomination, Obama defeated her in Iowa and went on to win the nomination and the White House.

Although Bill Clinton is enjoying a surge in popularity, especially among Democrats, Republican strategists say voters are still troubled because he lied about his affair with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky, and Hillary Clinton may have to address that messy issue again.

Overall, a large majority of voters say the country is headed in the wrong direction. And some pollsters predict that Americans will want the next president to represent something new. This is not a strong point for either Bush or Clinton, who bear two of the most familiar names in American politics.

GOP presidential contenders travel the globe in preparation to take on Clinton (WAPO)
By Philip Rucker and Anne Gearan
February 2, 2015
Washington Post
.

LONDON — New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie is here in the United Kingdom, where he said he looks forward to getting re-acquainted with Prime Minister David Cameron on Monday. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal recently returned from a European tour during which he assailed Hillary Rodham Clinton for her "mindless naivete." And next week, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker is due in London for an overseas trip of his own.

Republican presidential hopefuls are busy auditioning on the world stage ahead of the 2016 campaign, trying to bolster their résumés and develop expertise as their party seizes on foreign affairs as a key theme in its effort to reclaim the White House.

GOP leaders and strategists consider foreign policy a weakness of President Obama's tenure and therefore a potential vulnerability for Clinton, the likely Democratic candidate who helped carry out Obama's first-term foreign policy as secretary of state. Many contenders have been attacking Clinton. Before bowing out last week, Mitt Romney called the Obama administration "timid" and accused Clinton of acting "cluelessly."

Yet many of the Republican Party's rising stars — like Romney, its 2012 nominee — are governors with scant international exposure, so they are acting quickly to try to gain credibility.

Enter Christie, whose London visit is his fourth foreign trip as governor, following tours of Canada, Israel and Mexico. Ahead of official meetings that begin here Monday, Christie took in a soccer match Sunday afternoon. As he exited the gleaming Emirates Stadium, bundled up on a frigid afternoon with Arsenal's red-and-white team scarf, Christie said he was excited about nurturing relationships with British officials.

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, said talking about foreign affairs reveals a presidential candidate's character, communications skills and decision-making style. While domestic issues "concern budgets, detailed lawmaking, cooperation with Congress and technical matters," he said, "foreign affairs are in some ways simpler. It's about how to handle bad guys, how to protect the country, and how to convey confidence and purpose."

Like Christie, most of the other Republican White House hopefuls have articulated hawkish views in line with their party's traditional orthodoxy, though a divergent and more isolationist view has emerged within the party's libertarian wing represented by Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.).

Any Republican candidate would face an unusual challenge in drafting national security platforms in opposition to Clinton. As a senator and 2008 presidential candidate, Clinton developed a record and reputation as a foreign policy hawk that would complicate or head off the traditional GOP argument about Democratic weakness on security issues.

Nearly two years out from the next presidential election, the contenders have yet to present specifics beyond sketching out their worldviews. It also is unclear how much foreign affairs will shape the campaign. If the economy continues to improve, the public's attention could turn beyond the U.S.'s borders. And as always, world events that may not be foreseen, such as a terrorist attack, could set the agenda.

"Foreign policy could end up playing a minimal role on both sides, or it could end up playing a fairly large role, and I think the honest answer is nobody knows at this point," said Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, whom several presidential candidates have consulted.

Regardless, he said, it is important for candidates to "kick some tires around the world." He added: "You don't want to make a mistake which would raise questions about your readiness for the job."

So it is that would-be Republican candidates have been traveling the globe — many of them under the guise of trade missions to promote economic development for their states on trips paid with public funds.

The visits usually include meetings with foreign government and business officials as well as cultural stops. In England, Christie is sitting down with Cameron but also will see a rehearsal of William Shakespeare's "Henry V" at Shakespeare's historic Globe Theatre.

Former Texas governor Rick Perry has traveled overseas repeatedly since his failed 2012 presidential campaign, including visits last year to the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, and to China, Japan and several Eastern European nations.

Israel is a popular spot for many prospective candidates. Indiana Gov. Mike Pence spent Christmas in Jerusalem, where he met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, while former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee is leading a tour there later this month. For $5,250 a person, guests can join Huckabee for meetings with senior Israeli officials and tours of Holy Land sites, including swimming in the Dead Sea.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other presidential hopefuls have a more natural footing in such areas. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), through his service on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has made many trips abroad and has been at the center of U.S. foreign policy debates, recently over Obama's move to normalize diplomatic relations with Cuba.

Although many Republicans say their party should turn to a governor as its standard-bearer, Rubio argues that his national-security experience in the Senate is a more valuable commodity than an executive background.

"You can't have middle-class prosperity if your national security is threatened," Rubio told reporters in January. "So the next president needs to be someone that has a clear view of what's happening in the world, a clear strategic vision of America's role in it, and a clear tactical plan for how to engage America in global affairs."

It could be difficult for Republicans to cast Clinton as too weak on foreign policy, considering she earned the vocal admiration of many hawkish senators when she served alongside them.

As the county's top diplomat, Clinton carried out an Obama foreign policy that Republicans attacked as overly deliberative, but as a candidate to succeed him, she can show evidence that she would have taken tougher positions.

One example is Syria, where Clinton favored earlier and stronger military help for beleaguered rebels. She also holds a deeply skeptical view of Russian power, and despite the failure of the policy "reset" with Moscow, it will be difficult for Republicans to paint her as naive.

Clinton would have a harder time showing how she would have made different choices in other areas, including in the current struggle to counter Islamic State rebels. Harder still for Clinton may be the lingering taint of the deadly assaults on two U.S. compounds in Benghazi, Libya, in her final months at the State Department.

Clinton has said she bears ultimate responsibility for Benghazi and has called it the greatest regret of her tenure. But she has denied any knowledge of the circumstances leading up to the armed attacks by extremists or any direct role in responding to them.

Multiple investigations have revealed bureaucratic and safety problems but no high-level malfeasance. Still, the deaths of four Americans on her watch is a political vulnerability that undermines Clinton's image as an industrious and efficient executive.

With unrest across the world, Republicans believe foreign policy could be a winning campaign theme.

"Republicans want this to be an issue," said Kori Schake, a fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution and an official in George W. Bush's administration. "If Hillary Clinton is a candidate, she will argue she's a steady set of hands — you know, the 3 a.m. phone call — so Republicans will need to be strong on foreign policy."

Rupert Murdoch Says Joe Biden 'Actively Preparing' to Run Against Hillary Clinton (Bloomberg)
By David Knowles
February 1, 2015
Bloomberg

Newscorp executive chairman Rupert Murdoch knows a thing or two about breaking news, and causing a stir on Twitter, but does he also have an inside line on who is planning on challenging Hillary Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination?

On Sunday, Murdoch took to the social network to share his own insights on how the Democratic field may be shaping up.

@rupertmurdoch
Guess what! Joe Biden actively preparing to run against Hillary. Maybe others like Kerry.
11:00 AM - 1 Feb 2015

Murdoch gave no further details on how he had come upon the knowledge that Vice President Biden, and possibly Clinton's successor at the State Department, would challenge Clinton for the party's presidential nomination. A Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register poll of Iowa Democrats released over the weekend found Biden coming in a distant third place to Clinton and Senator Elizabeth Warren. Biden received just nine percent support in the poll, while Clinton was the first choice of 56 percent of those surveyed.

When asked last week by Good Morning America host George Stephanopolous whether he would seek the Democratic nomination, Biden left the possibility open.

"Yes, there is a chance," Biden said. "But I haven't made my mind up about that. We've got a lot of work to do between now and then. There's plenty of time."

Secretary of State John Kerry, who lost to George W. Bush in the 2004 presidential election, was much more resolute in a 2014 interview with CNN.

"I'm out of politics. I have no plans whatsoever, this is my last stop," Kerry told host Jake Tapper. "I'm going to serve the country in the extraordinarily privileged position the President has given me, the great challenges that I have, and move on.

Three days before Mitt Romney announced he would not seek the presidency, Murdoch weighed in on whether the former Massachusetts governor should attempt a third presidential campaign.

@rupertmurdoch
Let's be clear. Know and like Mitt Romney as a very nice person. But he had his chance and seemed to lack big vision for this country.

Obama on Hillary or Joe: 'I love them both' (CNN)
By Matthew Hoye
February 1, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN)Ahead of the Super Bowl, President Barack Obama tackled weighty issues such as whether he would choose chips and guacamole over chicken wings -- and who he would choose to be his successor, Hillary Clinton or Joe Biden.

On the latter he said, "I love them both."

The President joined NBC's Savannah Guthrie in the White House kitchen ahead of the game, for a traditional five-minute pre-game interview.

They touched on more serious topics, like the State of the Union, and whether or not he walked in to the Capitol with too much swagger.

Obama defended the tone of his speech, saying he was telling the American people about, "the success that America has had in digging itself out of a really tough recession, and that is a celebration of the American people -- that's not about politics."

"My job is to present the right ideas, and if Republicans think they have a better idea than they should present them," he said. But my job is not to trim my sails and not tell the American people what we should be doing -- pretending somehow that we don't need better roads, or we don't need more affordable college."

The President said he has found over six years in office that, "When I tell the American people very clearly what direction I think the country should go in, sometimes people change their minds and even Republicans occasionally start agreeing with me."

Just not as quickly as he would like, Obama said.

At the end of the interview, the host gave the President a lightening roud of either/or questions.

When asked if he would pick football or basketball, the President was ever the politician saying, "I'm still a basketball guy, but I love football."

On offense or defense, "Always offense."

And, on buffalo wings or chips and guacamole, he said, "You know, that's tough -- but I'm gonna go with chips and guac."

And, again, on Hillary Clinton or Joe Biden, Obama didn't skip a beat saying, "Love them both. Good try."

But the most memorable moment of the interview may just be a photograph of Obama swilling some beer -- with his pinkie up.

The Four Words Charles Krauthammer Used to Characterize Action Hillary Clinton Took With Her Emails (The Blaze)

By Oliver Darcy

March 18, 2015

The Blaze

"She burned the tapes."

That's how conservative political analyst Charles Krauthammer characterized Hillary Clinton's move to store her emails as secretary of state on a private home server.

"This is really an elaborate scheme, very obvious, not done for convenience, but done to conceal, and that's what this is all about," Krauthammer said Wednesday on Fox News. "George is right, she burned the tapes."

"And obviously, as her defender James Carville said, you don't want Louie Gohmert, meaning a Republican member of Congress, going through her emails," he continued. "That's the point. Not convenience."

The veteran political pundit then offered a reason as to why he thinks she took such actions.

"It was to prevent the Republicans or really the government, the Freedom of Information Act, the public from looking at her emails, which is required by State Department regulation, a departing official, I'll read you, must ensure that all record material that they possess is incorporated in the department's official files," he said. "And if you don't, if you willfully remove or destroy the records, the penalty can be fines, imprisonment, or both."

Challenged by Fox News host Bret Baier over why similar criticism hasn't been leveled against Collin Powell or Condoleezza Rice's lack of signed OF-109s, Krauthammer didn't give in.

"It's not the OF-109," he contended. "It's the entire scheme that she did to remove the files, to burn the files essentially, and it wasn't her job to decide what's private or not. Once you leave the government, it is clear that the regulations are that the department archivists are the ones who decide what is government and what is not, and she decided and then acted to destroy the files."

Hillary Clinton starts running — against the Republican Congress (WaPo)

By Anne Gearan

March 18, 2015

Washington Post

Hillary Rodham Clinton is already running her presidential campaign — against the Republican Congress. And the GOP is only happy to oblige.

The presumptive Democratic nominee is seeking to use the priorities and record of congressional Republicans as a foil, highlighting GOP stumbles out of the gate this spring and attempting to change the subject after weeks of rough media coverage of her private e-mail system and of foreign donations to her family's foundation.

In blasts of rapid-fire Twitter messages just this week, Clinton accused Republicans of waging a war on women, playing politics with a black nominee, shortchanging students, endangering the economic recovery and trying to yank health-care coverage for 16 million Americans.

The invocation of divisive issues such as abortion, race and health care was less than subtle. She also weighed in last week on a controversial letter sent to Iran by 47 Senate Republicans — including several presidential hopefuls — in opposition to the Obama administration's negotiations over that country's nuclear program.

"No one considering running for commander-in-chief should be signing on," she wrote on Twitter.

Never mind that Clinton is not yet an announced candidate and currently holds no public office. With a huge lead over potential Democratic challengers, Clinton is attacking Republicans as though she were already her party's nominee.

Congressional Republicans, playing to their right flank, have forged ahead with inquiries into Clinton's e-mail scandal while reviving investigations into the deaths of four Americans in 2012 in Benghazi, Libya, when she was secretary of state. The House GOP also announced a budget outline this week that would repeal the Affordable Care Act and make large cuts in domestic programs — giving Clinton a chance to begin testing Democratic themes for a presidential run.

"They can't help themselves," said Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.). "They're forever doing this kind of stuff: Benghazi, the letter to the Iranians, no matter what it is, they seem hellbent on overkill. It's helping her so far."

Many Republicans disagree, arguing that they are obligated to seek answers to lingering questions over Clinton's tenure as secretary of state. Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) said that many voters are troubled by Clinton's use of a private e-mail server while in office.

"When I talk to people, they are offended with the conduct and it feels like it's another 'there they go again' moment with the Clintons," Blackburn said. "They know the rules, but they have chosen to not play by the rules."

And Rory Cooper, a GOP consultant and former top adviser to former House majority leader Eric Cantor, said the attacks won't work for Clinton once Republicans have a candidate.

"She may want to run against Congress, but the party's nominee ends up taking the main role in setting the conservative agenda and the tone of the debate," Cooper said. "Congress will have a role to play in 2016, but it's the nominee who leads."

The week since Clinton reluctantly held a news conference defending her unorthodox e-mail arrangements has often felt like a revival of the epic feuds between Republicans and Clinton's husband in the 1990s: mounting investigations, conservative fury and bursts of indignation from the Clinton camp.

Even the parts seem similar: a GOP speaker facing pressure from his right, a defiant Hillary Clinton, and longtime Clinton family defender James Carville playing the role of James Carville.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is focusing her fire on congressional Republicans, who have a generally lower approval rating, rather than individual GOP presidential hopefuls. Clinton's broad-brush assault is intended to tie all Republicans to what Democrats think are the unpopular policies and unappealing overreach of congressional leaders.

"Our nation's future — jobs & economic growth — depends on investments made today. The GOP budget fails Americans on these principles," Clinton tweeted Tuesday night.

Clinton's sharply partisan tone echoes arguments made by super PAC Emily's List and Clinton surrogates. Clinton's chosen topics and targets also provide a window on her preparation for a campaign likely to focus on which candidate can best connect with the middle class and the economically disenfranchised.

Clinton will stress her long record fighting on behalf of women, for example, and is sure to expand on her claim this week of a congressional Republican "trifecta against women." She is expected to enter the race next month.

Several Democrats supporting Clinton were buoyed by new poll numbers Wednesday that suggest the e-mail controversy did no serious damage. Clinton leads every potential Republican challenger by at least 11 points in the CNN/ORC poll, and she leads Vice President Biden by 47 points and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) by 52 points in hypothetical matchups.

Nearly 7 in 10 (68 percent) said that Democrats were better off with Clinton as their 2016 nominee, while just 30 percent said they'd be better with someone else.

Like his predecessor Newt Gingrich in the 1990s, House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) faces near-constant calls from his right flank to put the Clintons at the forefront of House oversight efforts.

Last year, Boehner spent months mulling whether to have a select committee on Benghazi and was wary about doing so. He wanted to emphasize economic issues ahead of the midterm elections, according to a Boehner confidant who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss his conversations with the speaker. Ultimately, though, Boehner relented and approved the investigation.

"It did take pressure," said Rep. Tim Huelskamp (R-Kan.), a Boehner critic, at a Tuesday luncheon of conservatives on Capitol Hill. "Thank goodness we had enough pressure for that committee to be appointed. There was pushback for what, two years, before he did finally appoint the committee, and it looks like a better and better decision every day."

The committee is a main player in the drama over Clinton's e-mails; Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), the committee chair, is expected to call Clinton as a witness.

"Four Americans were killed," Rep. Jim Jordan (R-Ohio), a conservative hard-liner in the House, said when asked about whether the GOP risks overplaying its hand in inquiries of Clinton.

"I don't think tone is a question here," added Jordan, a member of the House Select Committee on Benghazi. "Mr. Gowdy has an appropriate tone. I think it's common sense, logical."

Gingrich agrees. "We are witnessing a classic Clinton counterattack," he said in an interview Wednesday. "Going after those so-called nasty Republicans may work for a week, but eventually she'll have to answer more questions."

The latest weekly Republican address, delivered by Rep. Susan Brooks (R-Ind.), reinforced the House GOP's approach. "It's unjust and simply wrong for anyone to withhold evidence," Brooks said, speaking directly to the camera. "We need to know why the security at our embassy was not adequate."

But Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.) — a Long Island moderate who opposed former president Bill Clinton's impeachment in 1998 — said that House Republicans should be careful as they proceed and "not overdo it."

"We shouldn't be salivating or piling on, even as we ask legitimate questions," King said. "In grudging admiration, you have to know that no one is better at making themselves victims than president and secretary Clinton. I know them, I consider them friends, but having said that, they are also masters at political jujitsu."

A.B. Stoddard: Nothing new from Clinton (The Hill)

By A.B. Stoddard

March 18, 2015

The Hill

As Hillary Clinton hides behind lame tweets, furiously planning the launch of her new and different presidential campaign, Democrats wonder if they can find a 3-D printer that could produce a new Candidate Hillary. Hillary 2.0 would have the same resume, capability and fundraising prowess — and would definitely still be married to Bill Clinton, of course — but she would like voters, believe they deserved to know the truth through open records and a free press, and would at least be able to fake the appearance of enjoying answering the public's questions.

Democrats know what's coming, just weeks from now when Clinton announces her run, and it won't be new or different. They've got only one candidate, who already ran and lost, whose policy positions of key interest to Democrats are not yet known, whose candidacy is based on her gender, desire for the job and feeling that it is her turn, and who is launching as she's responding to a congressional subpoena.

Formidable and inevitable? Maybe not.

Her press conference last week, a repetition of lawyered talking points she even had to look down at while answering questions, was disappointing. It was, after all, an effort to calm a firestorm over her decision as secretary of State to hide her government-owned communications in a private server for the sole purpose of thwarting investigations. In her parsed answers, she admitted destroying emails she took the liberty of determining were private, indicated she surely did use personal email for classified information (by insisting she never "sent" classified material, which means she received it) and said no she would not turn over her private server to those trying to locate a trail of pertinent work-related communications related to Libya, or anyone else, for that matter.

Democrats didn't have to read between the lines, because it all meant one thing: You cannot teach a paranoid, secretive politician who makes her own rules new tricks.

A reformed Clinton, who transforms her standard operating procedure as president, is beyond the imagination — even for loyal Democrats. Meanwhile, where will she take the party next year? Hell if they know.

What we do know is she is consulting with 200 experts to find a message and a platform. Loyal progressives, including her dear old friend and former Secretary of Labor Robert Reich, have wondered on the record what positions she will take on key policy questions factions of the party continue fighting over: financial regulation, the Keystone oil pipeline, trade and how to address income inequality. "If she were to become a candidate, she could go in either direction on these core questions," Reich told Bloomberg.

Despite the concerns of Democrats — about the email scandal, lack of agenda and her (un)willingness to be accessible to voters — Clinton is doing more of the same. She appears with friendly audiences, avoids the press and attacks Republicans in tweets.

Campaigning solely on Twitter can't begin to match what GOP candidates like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker are doing for themselves day in and day out. Democrats in primary states now well-trodden by the Republican field are hoping Clinton gets there soon. Her people assure them she will, just as they assure them she is going to hunker down with the public and chat and "earn every vote." Clinton has hired a new press staff of Democrats known to have strong relations with the media. That doesn't mean the campaign will be forthcoming with information, however, because staffers cannot override dictates from the top, particularly when they work for the Clintons.

Democrats hope things will improve when there is an official campaign apparatus in place. They will probably need to hope for more.

Netanyahu Win Dashes Prospect for a Thaw With Obama (NYT)

By AP

March 18, 2015

New York Times

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration signaled on Wednesday it could take a tougher stance toward Benjamin Netanyahu following his decisive Israeli election victory and campaign tack to the right, saying there will be consequences for his sudden reversal on the idea of an independent Palestinian state.

While senior American officials said the administration was still evaluating options, they suggested the U.S. could ease its staunch opposition to Palestinians turning to the UN Security Council to create a state.

"There are policy ramifications for what he said," one official said of Netanyahu's campaign rhetoric rejecting the creation of a Palestinian state. "This is a position of record."

If Netanyahu holds firm to his opposition to a two-state resolution to the Mideast conflict, it could force whoever sits in the Oval Office — now and in the next administration — to choose between the prime minister and a longstanding U.S. policy with bipartisan support.

Hours after the Israeli election results were finalized, the White House quickly reaffirmed its support for the idea of two independent nations living side by side, a central tenet of peace negotiations led by presidents from both U.S. political parties. And the White House sharply chastised Netanyahu's party for using anti-Arab rhetoric in the lead-up to the election.

"Rhetoric that seeks to marginalize one segment of their population is deeply concerning and it is divisive," Obama spokesman Josh Earnest said.

Frustrated by both Israel and the U.S., Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has become increasingly aggressive in efforts to secure a Palestinian state through other means, including the UN Security Council. The U.S. has veto power on the council and has repeatedly warned Abbas it would block his efforts to use that avenue.

But on Wednesday, a senior administration official said only that the administration was evaluating its options on Security Council action and other possible responses, notably not repeating administration threats to block the Palestinians. A second official confirmed the U.S. could decide not to veto Security Council action.

The officials were not authorized to speak by name about internal deliberations and commented only on condition of anonymity.

Most Republican presidential hopefuls welcomed Netanyahu's victory, but they were notably silent about whether they backed Palestinian statehood. Only Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker weighed in, saying the U.S. goal "must remain a two-state solution."

Former Republican President George W. Bush made a two-state solution a cornerstone of his efforts to secure peace between Israelis and Palestinians. Obama also has pursued Palestinian statehood, most aggressively in a months-long push for peace that ultimately collapsed last year.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic front-runner if she enters the 2016 campaign, did not comment on the Israeli elections. As Obama's first secretary of state, she worked closely with Netanyahu and championed an independent Palestinian state.

Aaron David Miller, a longtime Middle East adviser to secretaries of state from both parties, said it was unlikely a U.S. president of either party would abandon support for Palestinian statehood in the near future.

"I suspect it is the fate of both Democratic and Republican presidents to be caught in a situation in which a two-state solution is too difficult to implement on the one hand and yet too difficult to abandon on the other," said Miller, now a scholar at the Wilson Center in Washington.

Netanyahu announced his support for Palestinian statehood in 2009, shortly after Obama became president. He continued to publicly back that position even as he approved new settlements in East Jerusalem, raising questions about his level of commitment.

Earlier this year, the Palestinians joined the International Criminal Court in pursuit of war crimes charges against Israel. Any decision on a possible investigation is now up to the ICC prosecutor.

Secretary of State John Kerry spoke with Netanyahu Wednesday. The White House said Obama would speak with the prime minister in the coming days.

The Likud Party's decisive victory in Tuesday's elections marked a stunning comeback in a tight race that put Netanyahu in political jeopardy. In the campaign's closing days, Netanyahu abandoned his public commitment to Palestinian statehood.

While the White House publicly avoided taking sides in the election, it was no secret that Obama and his advisers would have welcomed a change in Israeli leadership. Netanyahu is a fierce critic of Obama's nuclear negotiations with Iran, a country Netanyahu says poses a deadly threat to Israel. Netanyahu also deeply angered the White House by accepting a Republican invitation to address Congress earlier this month and make his case against the emerging outlines of an Iran deal.

Netanyahu's shift on Palestinian statehood now seems certain to deepen the rift with Obama. Despite his past assurances to the West, Netanyahu said this week that any talk of Israel withdrawing from lands it seized in 1967 to make room for a Palestinian state is irrelevant because, in his view, Islamic extremists would seize such territory.

Though the prospects of a peace accord in Obama's final 20 months in office were already slim, Netanyahu's stance slammed shut any hope for a breakthrough without a dramatic shift in the region.

"A push now to try to get to the table would run the risk that you produce negotiations that are bound to fail," said Dennis Ross, a former U.S. Middle East envoy. "What you can't afford now is more failure."

Republican Rand Paul to Enter 2016 Presidential Race Next Month: Report (NYT)

By Reuters

March 18, 2015

New York Times

WASHINGTON — U.S. Senator Rand Paul will declare his candidacy for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination on April 7, MSNBC reported, citing multiple sources inside the Kentucky lawmaker's camp.

"This will be an official announcement, not an exploratory committee," MSNBC quoted an unnamed source close to Paul as saying. The network said the announcement would take place in Louisville, Kentucky.

Paul would be the first major candidate to formally jump into next year's White House race. Republican Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, has set up a committee to explore a possible 2016 candidacy.

Other potential Republican candidates include U.S. Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker and New Jersey Governor Chris Christie.

On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton, a former U.S. senator and secretary of state, is expected to enter the race in the next few months as a strong favorite.

Paul, the 52-year son of former U.S. Republican Representative Ron Paul of Texas, won a straw poll of conservative activists earlier this month. His libertarian views have gained backing from some conservatives but raised questions about his broader appeal within the Republican Party.

In the four days immediately after his announcement, the source told MSNBC, Paul will campaign in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada, the four states that kick off the presidential nominating battle.

Webb Quietly Meeting Dems Looking for Clinton Alternative (NYT)

By AP

March 18, 2015

New York Times

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb says his decision whether to challenge Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination will rest on whether he can raise enough money to be viable in running against the heavy favorite.

"It's not worth it go through this process if you have to sell out what you believe," Webb, 69, a former Navy secretary, said Wednesday between private meetings with South Carolina party leaders. "The question is, can we get the right kind of support in order to get out and make our case to the American people rather than to the financial sector?"

Webb said he wants to be a voice for working-class Americans neglected in a political system dominated by money. He says he will decide this spring whether to run.

He said raising enough money to power a campaign of his own "will be a challenge after Citizens United," the Supreme Court ruling that has helped super PACs spend staggering sums of money from corporations, unions and wealthy people.

South Carolina hosts the South's first presidential primary, weeks after the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary. Of particular significance to Democrats nationally, South Carolina is the first primary state with a large African-American population.

Clinton is widely expected to announce a presidential candidacy. Her aides have promised an aggressive push in the state, where Clinton lost a bitter battle with Barack Obama in 2008 on his way to the presidency. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, another prospective challenger, has made several trips to the state.

Webb did not directly criticize Clinton on Wednesday, but he argued that voters want new faces.

"What I'm seeing is that there is a leadership fatigue in this country, an incumbent fatigue from both parties," he said.

Webb served in the Senate alongside Clinton for two years before she became secretary of state. He did not seek re-election in 2012, leaving the chamber after one term.

He said he wants Democrats to return to their roots as "the party that is assisting the objectives of the people who do the hard work in our country."

He also said the U.S. needs a "clear doctrine" for when and how to use military force in conflicts.

State Democratic Chairman Jaime Harrison described Webb as "thoughtful and serious" after the two met privately, and rejected the notion that Clinton's likely candidacy makes a competitive primary impossible. "People asked the same questions in 2007," Harrison said. "Nobody saw Barack Obama as having a chance."

Obama Slams Republicans for 'Stale and Outmoded' Budget Debate (NYT)

By Reuters

March 18, 2015

New York Times

CLEVELAND — President Barack Obama slammed Republicans' latest budget proposals on Wednesday, saying funding for research, education and infrastructure would be better for economic growth than tax cuts.

In a speech at the City Club of Cleveland, Obama mocked Republicans for turning to tax cuts in a budget that "doubles down on trickle-down" economics..

"Republicans in Congress have put forward the same proposals year after year after year regardless of the realities of the economy," Obama said. "When the economy's in a slump? We needed tax cuts. When the economy's doing well? You know what – let's try some tax cuts," he said.

In another issue that has divided Washington, Obama said he wished he had closed the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, on his first day in office. His efforts to close the controversial facility have since been thwarted largely because of Republican opposition.

Obama said the budget plan put forward this week by Republicans in the House of Representatives would cut funding to centers that help manufacturing, a sector critical to the economy of northeast Ohio, home to plants owned by Ford, GM, Goodyear and Sherwin-Williams Co.

Republicans dismissed his comments as an attempt to help his former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who is expected to run for president in 2016.

"No matter how hard President Obama tries to set Hillary Clinton up to run for his third term, his tax and spend agenda continues to fail America's shrinking middle class," said Allison Moore, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee.

Before his speech, Obama toured an "incubator" at Cleveland State University where advisers work with small manufacturers, speaking with a local whiskey maker about a new technique for shortening the aging process for bourbon.

It is one of about 60 such centers across the country that the White House said have helped 30,000 small manufacturers in recent years. Obama would like to spend more than $30 million a year to help set up similar centers in 12 other states.

U.S. manufacturing has been a strong point for the country's recovery from the 2007-09 recession, although the recent appreciation of the dollar is fueling worries American factories will lose an edge in export markets.

The Invisible Primary Means No TV Ads. For Now. (NYT)

By Derek Willis

March 18, 2015

New York Times

There's a reason the early part of the presidential nomination contest is called the invisible primary: There are no television ads yet. Voters in key states should enjoy the lull while it lasts, which could be until summer or maybe even longer.

Four years ago, the first Republican presidential campaign ad appeared on July 5. That's when Tim Pawlenty, the former Minnesota governor, aired his first commercial for Iowa voters, according to broadcast advertising data tracked by Kantar Media and compiled by Deep Root Analytics, a Republican television advertising targeting company.

Michele Bachmann and Ron Paul followed soon after, but most of the field waited much longer. Mitt Romney, who eventually won the nomination, didn't air his campaign's first television ad until Nov. 22, 2011, a good six weeks before the Iowa caucuses kicked off the formal primary season. (The data do not include cable or satellite TV advertising, which are not reported to the Federal Communications Commission.)

Political ads might not start running until later in this election cycle. The main reason the candidates may wait is simple: super PACs. Most of the early ads four years ago came from the campaigns, not from affiliated political action committees. Only a few of the 2012 candidates had affiliated super PACs; now most serious candidates will.

Because super PACs can raise any amount of money from donors while contributions to campaign committees are capped at $2,700 per person for the primary election, it can be easier to raise the money to pay for expensive television ads via the super PACs. A round of television advertising could be paid for by a few donors, leaving the candidate's campaign free to spend its money on other activities — or to bank as much of the money as possible until later in the year. That might mean earlier ads will come from super PACs, while candidate ads happen later.

This is a big change from the last fully open presidential contest eight years ago, before super PACs existed. By the end of March 2007, Barack Obama had raised more than $25 million for his campaign, while Mr. Romney had raised almost $21 million. (John McCain, the eventual nominee for the G.O.P., did not start raising money until April of that year.) This year, none of the higher-profile politicians have even filed a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission, let alone formally created a campaign committee.

The timeline could still shrink. In the 2012 race, most super PAC spending financed negative messages about other candidates. A significant amount of money will be spent when there is a clear leader to attack, but the Republicans don't have that yet. The Democrats appear to have only one strong candidate so far, Hillary Clinton. It's more likely that some Republican super PACs will air ads opposing Mrs. Clinton. The lack of competition on the Democratic side could mean a longer wait for ads from Mrs. Clinton, too.

Raising enough money to respond on TV to attacks is part of what is driving money-raising for super PACs and other affiliated groups long before candidates actually register official committees. This part of the invisible primary — when candidates are as likely to appear before donors as voters — has two goals: gaining large donations and commitments to raise more.

Of course, you may never even see these ads. When the television commercials do begin, even well-funded operations are likely to concentrate their messages on the states that hold their nominating contests first, particularly Iowa and South Carolina. The Iowa media markets of Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Sioux City were the top three during the Republican primary in 2012, followed by the South Carolina markets of Greenville, Charleston and Columbia.

The sheer number of advertisements devoted to those states dwarfed those of larger markets in Florida and other states that held nominating votes early in the process. There were nearly 8,000 broadcast television ads in the Des Moines market during the Republican primary; the Tampa market saw 5,400. (Owing to Mr. Romney's popularity in New Hampshire, that state's media markets were not among the top targets for the 2012 Republican primary, but that could change this time around.)

Although you may not see the ads on TV, you might well see the ads online. In this current period of television silence, campaign organizations are building an email list that can be used to raise money and target voters. A committee formed by Scott Walker, the Wisconsin governor, has placed display ads on the websites of Fox News, The Daily Caller and other conservative outlets directing users to a page that asks for their name, email and address, according to Adomic, a California company that tracks digital ads. The leadership PAC of Chris Christie, the New Jersey governor, has also been buying ads on sites such as the Drudge Report.

Potential candidates like Rand Paul, the Kentucky Republican senator, and Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, are posting messages to social media to help increase their reach and to identify supporters.

Hillary Clinton's personal BlackBerry less secure (Politico)

By Joseph Marks

March 18, 2015

Politico

The personal BlackBerry that Hillary Clinton used as secretary of state was likely much less secure than the State Department-issued devices used by her staff and subordinates, according to knowledgeable former officials and executives.

And the security risks were magnified because Clinton used her personal BlackBerry on travel in foreign countries where State Department employees are routinely cautioned about the use of mobile devices.

A POLITICO review of press pool photos turned up instances of Clinton using her Blackberry in Vietnam, Brazil and South Korea.

The risk of targeted theft of an official's data is greatest in nations with telecoms that are owned or largely controlled by the government, said Martin Libicki, a cybersecurity expert and senior scientist at the Rand Corporation. That's because state-aligned hackers could pull any unencrypted data, such as the metadata connected with a phone call, straight off the cell towers.

In Vietnam in particular, analysts say, there's a concern Chinese government hackers could pull information from the Vietnamese government-owned telecom — either through an intelligence-sharing agreement with Vietnam or because Vietnamese officials make little effort to keep Chinese spies out of their networks.

Some of the security deficit for Clinton's BlackBerry can be attributed to predictable differences between an enterprise security system managed by a staff of IT professionals and a homebrew system like Clinton's, administered by an individual or a small staff, people familiar with BlackBerry enterprise security told POLITICO.

A recent Verizon report, for example, found it takes companies roughly a month on average to discover they've been breached, even with complex security and a team of staffers. "For an individual, it could take them forever," Stephen Perciballi, a systems security engineer who previously worked for Softchoice, a major BlackBerry retailer for government and industry.

Beyond the advantages conferred on large organizations by their professional IT teams, 24-hour network monitoring and security operations centers, the security of an individually owned BlackBerry — and the emails and other information stored in it — comes down to basic questions of hardware and software, insiders said. Questions that Clinton and the State Department declined repeatedly to answer.

The security of BlackBerry systems, for instance, is dependent on roughly 600 "IT policies" — essentially security measures that can be switched on or off, according to a person with detailed knowledge about BlackBerry's federal operations. The more switches that are turned on, the more secure the device or network of devices will be. Individuals generally turn on far fewer of those security measures and take more security shortcuts than would IT professionals charged with keeping State Department information out of the hands of foreign hackers, the source said.

The most important component for BlackBerry security is the BlackBerry Enterprise Server, a piece of "middleware" that encrypts email and securely connects other applications with the BlackBerry handset, making it significantly more secure than the basic BlackBerry an average consumer might buy. These systems are typically bought by organizations but can also be bought — at great expense — by individuals or families with major security concerns.

A spokesman for Clinton declined several times to say whether the former secretary employed such an enterprise server during her tenure. In the past, her office has said making details of her email security public would aid hackers. "Robust protections were put in place," according to a statement earlier this month, and "third party experts" were consulted and employed.

Perciballi also cited the enterprise server as a key component to any fully secure system.

"My first question would be was she using a [BlackBerry Enterprise] Server," he said. "If so, that would be 80 percent better."

Clinton insisted in a press conference last week that her private email account and the server that housed the emails were never breached — a statement that drew raised eyebrows among security experts who noted that many breaches can go undetected for months, years or even forever — hiding even from people trained to root them out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perciballi responded to the claim by paraphrasing a cybersecurity maxim: There are two kinds of people — those who have been breached and those who don't yet know they've been breached.

To be even mildly confident of the "no breaches" claim, Perciballi said, he'd want a team of specialized forensic analysts to personally inspect the network and emails.

Questions about the security of Clinton's BlackBerry are compounded by the added digital threats that come with foreign travel.

POLITICO did not find any evidence of Clinton using her BlackBerry in China or Russia while secretary — two nations that represent the greatest threat of online compromise. Yet, travel in other nations also poses hacking risks, though not as severe.

A spokesman for Clinton said that "the State Department took technical security for the entire traveling party very seriously." He referred more detailed questions to State, noting, "It is for them to address an understandably sensitive topic as they deem appropriate to do so."

A senior State Department official declined to discuss specific protocols for mobile phones abroad for security reasons, noting only that the "department provides guidance and briefings to its employees on best practices relating to the maintenance of secure communications around the globe, including mobile communications devices." The official referred specific questions about Clinton's security setup to her staff.

Clinton has also insisted she did not discuss any classified information on the personal email account that she accessed through her private BlackBerry. But even unclassified communications involving the secretary of state would be useful intelligence for another nation's spy service. Something as simple as the frequency with which Clinton emailed different state officials or other Cabinet secretaries could provide insight into how a particular policy is being developed, say former counter-intelligence officials.

Before and during any foreign travel, the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service briefs officials on both physical and digital threats, a former DSS official told POLITICO, including detailed instructions about when officials should and shouldn't carry digital devices and other precautions to take.

As a result, the former official said, there's no situation in which Clinton or her closest advisers would not have known exactly what was permitted and what was advisable.

"The Department does a really good job working with the intelligence community assessing risk," the former official said. "We go in with the capabilities and resources to mitigate risk irrespective of where we are … Occasionally there's time with the secretary to give a briefing, but we talk with staff as well. Staff are clearly briefed on what the threats are."

The former official stopped short of saying that top diplomats sometimes disregard digital security directives but acknowledged there's often a push and pull between officials who want to get as much work done as efficiently as possible while in country and security professionals who ask them to forego some modern conveniences.

The former official also said Clinton's communications would almost certainly have been more secure on a State Department-issued device.

"Unless you've provided your personal phone to the State Department to put all the appropriate levels of encryption on it, you'll be more vulnerable," the former official said. "The State Department is very adept at knowing the risks involved. They've been doing it for a long time now."

Even with the State Department's expertise, however, security experts said, there's no guarantee that adversaries couldn't worm their way into an official's unclassified email and officials are advised to presume that any unclassified system is insecure and could be compromised.

Indeed, the State Department's unclassified email system was compromised last year and, according to a Bloomberg report, the hackers, who may be Russian, have still not been totally shut out of the system.

The State Department shut down its systems over the weekend and through Tuesday for a series of security upgrades. State Spokeswoman Jen Psaki said the closure was only for upgrades and not because the department had been hacked again.

"The generic caution to anyone who is of high interest to a foreign intelligence service as Ms. Clinton would be is to just assume that any business you're conducting over non-secured networks — so a personal device or a government one — is something that's going to potentially be targeted by foreign intelligence service," said Michelle Van Cleave, former National Counterintelligence Executive during the George W. Bush administration.

“When you’re on an unclassified network,” she said, “the advice is just to assume you’re not secure wherever you are.”

Brent Budowsky: Why Hillary can win big (The Hill)

By Brent Budowsky

March 18, 2015

The Hill

The most popular former president since the Second World War is John Kennedy. The most popular living former president is Bill Clinton. The most popular public figure in America is Pope Francis, whose favorable rating was a towering 78 percent in a recent Pew poll.

These three data points reveal the qualities most Americans want in their next president. Along with demographic and electoral state advantages Democrats posses in presidential elections, they explain why Hillary Clinton will enter the 2016 campaign in a powerful position — and with the possibility of winning a mandate victory that would dramatically change the way Washington works.

In just 20 months, as Clinton concludes her conversation with America that she will soon begin, Americans will gather in their living rooms to discuss who they should choose to lead the nation. They will not be discussing emails and servers. They will be discussing wages and incomes, prosperity and jobs, and who is most qualified to lift the American economy and protect American security.

If Clinton is elected in 2016, around the time of the Democratic National Convention in 2020, our first female president will lead a national celebration of the 100th anniversary of the ratification of the constitutional amendment that granted women the right to vote on Aug. 18, 1920.

At lunchtime Thursday I will address the Women's National Democratic Club in Washington, D.C. The title of my remarks will be "Superwoman comes to the supermarket: America from John Kennedy to Hillary Clinton." It's borrowed from the brilliant essay by Norman Mailer about John Kennedy in 1960 titled "Superman comes to the supermarket," which was later included in The Presidential Papers, his book about JFK. Mailer's vision of Kennedy — which came true — was that JFK would lead America into a new decade that would unleash powerful forces of change and lift the politics, culture and spirit of the nation.

When I refer to Clinton as superwoman who comes to the supermarket, I mean that her conversation with America will take this woman of enormous achievement into the supermarket of the American heartland for a national discussion about how we can create an economy that brings higher wages, higher incomes, a higher standard of living and a rising tide that lifts all boats and leaves no American behind.

The Bill Clinton presidency, which embodied Democratic economics, is fondly remembered because he created a surge of prosperity, optimism and jobs, and a belief that government can work — even as Republicans tried to impeach him while he doggedly continued his good works in office.

By contrast, the last Republican presidency, which embodied Republican economics, sank America into the most punishing recession and devastating financial crash since the Great Depression, which brought the most massive bailout in human history.

In her conversation with America, Hillary Clinton will build on the launching pad of her legacy. And Republicans will disown the bottomless pit of theirs.

The Kennedy presidency, which embodied the ideals of Democratic progressivism, set loose forces for change that energized movements and advanced rights and opportunities for blacks and Hispanics. This expanded to the movements that advanced equality and justice for women and gays. And it expands to the ultimate movement, whose great champion is Francis, for an economy that is fair and just and creates prosperity and opportunity for all, regardless of race, color, gender, ethnicity or creed.

This will be the heart of Hillary Clinton's conversation with America: equal wages for women, a higher minimum wage for workers, a higher standard of living for all, a better education for students who want to learn, and affordable education for the moms and dads who must pay for it.

Republicans cannot compete with these American dreams with arcane discussions of emails and political wars to persuade voters that the teachings of the most popular pope in modern times are wrong when he denounces the trickle-down economics that guaranteed the last great Republican economic crash.

Watch out for my follow-up, "How Hillary can win big," in Thursday's edition of The Hill.

Dick Morris: Clintons' UAE quid pro quo (The Hill)

By Dick Morris

March 18, 2015

The Hill

Bill and Hillary Clinton have carefully cloaked the foreign money they've accepted in the garb of charitable fundraising. But alongside the hundreds of millions donated to the Clinton Foundation were tens of millions in personal income from foreign sources, devoid of disguise, a naked example of using political power for personal enrichment. Nowhere has this transaction been as apparent as in the Clintons' relationship with the United Arab Emirates (UAE).

In return for millions in speaking and consulting fees, which went right into their personal bank accounts, the former president and former secretary of State — and possible future president — showered favors on the rulers that run this repressive and anti-

Semitic government.

It's hard to grasp the distinction — if there is any — between fees Bill Clinton earned and outright payments to his wife for her influence. For example, during his wife's tenure as secretary, Bill Clinton collected $1,175,000 for three speeches in the UAE. One, for the Abu Dhabi Global Environmental Data Initiative, at a cost of $500,000, was OKed by the State Department ethics police.

That was the quid (along with the millions sent to the foundation by the UAE). The quo was an ongoing campaign to rehabilitate the image of a regime that ranks in Freedom House's second-lowest category in human rights. After the revelation that two of the 9/11 hijackers — and much of the money that financed them in the U.S. — came from the UAE, the Emirates needed a major image upgrade.

Enter Bill Clinton.

In 2002, he began speaking in the UAE and recognized the potential gravy train there. That's also when he joined billionaire Ron Burkle's Yucaipa Co. That was the Clintons' real gold mine, netting them more than $15 million from 2002 to 2007. His buyout in 2008 was estimated at up to $20 million.

The former president was indispensable: He delivered Sheikh Mohammed bin Rashid al Maktoum, prime minister of Dubai, to Yucaipa, and a three-way partnership among Burkle, Clinton and the sheik to create an offshore sovereign fund began.

In 2005, Clinton advised Dubai on the controversial Dubai port deal. Hillary Clinton publicly opposed the deal, but didn't oppose the $10 million that had already gone into their accounts from Yucaipa.

Clinton continuously raised the profile of the UAE by creating a Clinton scholarship program at the American University in Dubai and partnering with two other Dubai-based firms: GEMS schools and the Varkey Foundation. His take from them is unknown. He made introductions and brought in close associates as investors in the UAE like Teneo, NYU and McLarty Associates.

Bill Clinton's a real regular over there. On Monday, he was in Dubai, speaking alongside the sheik at the Hult International Business School, a partner of the Clinton Global Initiative.

But it was Hillary Clinton who did the heavy lifting in delivering to the UAE what it most craved: international respect. In September of 2012, the secretary of State hosted a Global Infrastructure Conference at the State Department for 90 CEOs or high-level American executives to learn about investment opportunities in the UAE and three other countries. Seven UAE officials joined Hillary Clinton herself in addressing the conference.

Several months later, the former first lady promoted the first Global Entrepreneurship Summit, also sponsored by the State Department, in Dubai, bringing investors and entrepreneurs from all over the world into the UAE. The UAE was publicly legitimized by the U.S. in Hillary Clinton's last days in office.

Bill and Hillary Clinton set up a gigantic money-making machine, trading on her power as secretary of State and her potential to be the next president. The question for us is: Are we willing to let them take it to the next level?

Markos Moulitsas: Hillary is doomed? Hardly. (The Hill)

By Markos Moulitsas

March 18, 2015

The Hill

While the insipid media storm over Hillary Clinton's emails at the State Department might be a big yawn for voters, it certainly is giving some conservatives new hope about their 2016 chances.

Josh Kraushaar at National Journal led the irrational exuberance, with a piece titled "Why Republicans hold an early edge for 2016." You see, Republicans are now the favorites because "her least attractive political attributes — an imperial attitude, an inability to avoid scandal, and a penchant for secrecy — are now all taking center stage."

A Fox News headline blared, "Email flap puts field in play." The subhead: "The glitter is off Hillary Clinton's coronation as email controversy prompts new look at alternatives."

A report here at The Hill said, "Republican strategists say that Clinton's political abilities have long been exaggerated. They contend she displays an unusual capacity to make trouble for herself and, unlike her husband, has no great degree of nimbleness in getting out of it."

Oh, and my favorite, from Florida GOP strategist Rick Wilson in the same Hill report: "She's a terrible politician. She has never won a genuinely contested election. She is spectacularly bad. ... She is not a woman who has ever been able to win a hot race."

Ha ha, all so silly! The email story itself is barely registering with voters, with only 17 percent following the story closely, according to a Pew Research poll last week. Even among Republicans, the number was only one-third.

That lack of interest is not surprising, given that, one, she didn't break any laws and, two, pretty much every Republican officeholder running for president has had similar problems in the past. I'm all for laws outlawing such use of private email for official government business, but until those exist, all the hyperventilating is directed in the wrong direction. (The right direction would be Congress, which could pass such a law tomorrow if its Republican leadership genuinely cared about things like "openness in government," which it doesn't.)

But more relevant to the "Hillary is doomed!" narrative is the very simple fact that the American public still really, really likes Hillary! In fact, she is such a terrible politician, she isn't just lapping the potential Democratic primary field, unprecedented in modern political history, she is also crushing her potential Republican opponents.

On the Democratic side, polling has consistently shown Clinton with leads of 40-plus points against pretty much anyone. While some think this means the "Democratic bench" is weak, really, it means we have our slugger up to bat. So why sub her out? But this isn't even baseball. It's tennis. And we've got Serena Williams on the court while Republicans have a bunch of ball boys throwing balls at each others' heads. Call that a "bench" if you want, it's still a bunch of scrubs.

When you look at general election polling, Clinton is so doomed and terrible at being a politician that she sports laughably large leads against the best the GOP can throw at her. Jeb Bush? The Huffington Post polling composite (all polls averaged out together, an approach that has proven accurate the last several election cycles) has Clinton leading 52 percent to 41 percent. It's a 53 percent to 40 percent lead over Chris Christie; 53 percent to 39 percent over Ted Cruz; 54 percent to 40 percent over Mike Huckabee; 50 percent to 40 percent over Marco Rubio; and 52 percent to 40 over Rand Paul.

So if Clinton really is that bad a politician, and if her chances are really that doomed, then what does that say about her lagging competition?

Hillary: House GOP budget 'fails' the American people (The Hill)

By Rebecca Shabad

March 18, 2015

The Hill

Hillary Clinton late Tuesday criticized the House GOP's budget blueprint released earlier in the day, asserting that it "fails" the American people.

Clinton, who's expected to launch her second presidential campaign as early as next month, posted a series of tweets on the Republicans' budget.

Budgets reflect our priorities. They should help families get ahead, educate our kids, and spark small business growth," her first tweet said.

A plan for Kerry 2016? (The Hill)

By Former Rep. John LeBoutillier (R-N.Y.)

March 18, 2015

The Hill

The Kerry for P.O.T.U.S. '16 plan:

1. In 2004, John Kerry lost to President George W. Bush, but came close — if 50,000 votes had switched sides in Ohio, John Forbes Kerry — who, back at St. Paul's School in Concord, N.H., patterned himself after the first JFK all the way down to the hairstyle and extra-long shirt cuffs — would have been the 44th president of the United States.

2. As a competitive politician, Kerry has never given up the dream of living at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

3. Now, as secretary of State, he sees a path to the White House.

4. It looks like 2016 is going to be a "foreign policy" election.

5. Anticipating this — and in contrast to Hillary Clinton's empty, accomplishment-free four years as secretary of State — Kerry has been piling up agreements and treaties: 1) An emissions agreement with China; 2) normalization with Cuba; 3) and he's now on the verge of a nuke deal with Iran.

6. Kerry believes — and it may very well happen — that he and his Iranian counterpart will earn the Nobel Peace Prize, a la then-Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and Le Duc Tho in 1973 for the Paris Peace Accords that "ended" the Vietnam War.

7. Kerry and President Obama have seen their three biggest Iran nuclear deal opponents go down — or perhaps about to go down — in the last few days: 1) Netanyahu trails in the final rounds of Israeli polls in advance of Tuesday's crucial Israeli election; 2) the Justice Department leaked word of "possible" corruption charges against the administration's most influential Democratic critic, New Jersey Sen. Bob Menendez; and 3) the 47 GOP Senators who wrote the letter to Iran have effectively discredited themselves.

8. In his mind, this is how Kerry sees the next 18 months: Armed with the Nobel and favorable press from the media, which have grown tired of the Clinton Act, he will be there to pick up the pieces after Hillary implodes.

9. According to the New York Post story on Sunday from best-selling author Ed Klein, the White House — directed by senior adviser Valerie Jarrett — has secretly launched six internal State Department investigations into Clinton's tenure there — clearly searching for information to discredit her. All done, of course, with fingerprints carefully concealed.

10. Why? Obama hates President Bill Clinton. The president and the White House staff want to see Bill "The Big Dog" Clinton fail in his attempt to return to the White House.

11. Bill Clinton and Obama are the two alpha males of the Democratic Party. They loathe each other. And Obama will do anything to prevent Bill Clinton from retaking control of the Democratic Party.

12. Obama owes Kerry — big time — for giving him the crucial keynote speech at the 2004 Boston convention. That appearance launched the Obama phenomenon and propelled him all the way to the presidency.

13. Now Kerry expects to collect on that debt by having Obama's tacit support in 2016 — including helping to puncture the Clinton Balloon.

14. For the immediate future, we can expect that — for their own legacy and political reasons — Obama and Kerry will force this Iran nuclear deal to happen, even if it is a lousy deal for the U.S. These two will do anything to make this deal happen — now.

15. Obama wants this to be his Nixon-goes-to-China moment, where he brings Iran back into the community of nations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

16. And Kerry wants that Nobel to contrast it with Hillary Clinton's empty legacy.

17. The only thing left to do is the un-doing of Hillary Clinton. How does that come about? Who does it?

18. Does the administration find more damaging info that could come back to haunt her?

19. Is more to come on these shady foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation?

20. And, on the political front, whom else could the Democrats turn to if Clinton indeed implodes?

21. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) is the insurgent who could — still — take down Clinton. And she should run. Now. It is all sitting there awaiting her.

22. But so far, she continues to refuse to run.

23. If Clinton implodes on her own — a growing possibility — then the party would not turn to Warren. Instead they would look for a less divisive candidate.

24. And JFK — John Forbes Kerry — is warming up in the bullpen. In his head, he sees a clear path to reverse his 2004 loss. Armed with his wife's unlimited Heinz family money, he could self-fund his campaign.

25. Most of all, he sees no viable opposition inside the Democratic Party. Vice President Biden is not a realistic option. The others — former Sen. Jim Webb (Va.), former Gov. Martin O'Malley (Md.) and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) are minor leaguers.

26. No, Kerry can smell this thing. All he has to do is cave in enough to get the Iran nuclear deal. If Netanyahu loses on Tuesday, this "caving" becomes much easier. And Tehran will dig in its heels, knowing Iran's biggest critic is gone.

27. Meanwhile, watch the Hillary Clinton train wreck continue — until Democrats realize she is a political loser.

28. Then they will turn to Kerry to save them.

29. This is what is in John Kerry's head — all day and all night — every day and every night.

New Hampshire pols plead for Warren to run (The Hill)

By Kevin Cirilli

March 18, 2015

The Hill

Some lawmakers in the early primary state of New Hampshire are urging Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to run for president.

Twenty-seven current and former members of New Hampshire's legislature sent an open letter to Warren on Wednesday asking her to reconsider her plans to sit out the 2016 race.

"We urge Elizabeth Warren to run for president in 2016," they wrote. "One thing New Hampshire voters value is the first-in-the-nation primary, and a chance for candidates to come into our homes and libraries and community centers to talk to real voters."

The lawmakers signing the letter represent just a fraction of the 400 seats in New Hampshire's House of Representatives and the 24 seats in the state Senate. Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton remains the clear front-runner for Democrats in New Hampshire, according to polls.

But the letter shows that some in New Hampshire — the first national primary of the election cycle after the Iowa caucuses — are hungry for a contested primary.

"We're urging Senator Elizabeth Warren to join the 2016 race for president, because we know first hand how important a robust primary debate of our progressive values is to New Hampshire voters," said Democratic New Hampshire state Rep. Renny Cushing in a statement.

The letter was organized by the Run Warren Run campaign, which is funded by liberal groups MoveOn.org and Democracy For America.

Greens want Clinton emails on Keystone (The Hill)

By Timothy Cama

March 18, 2015

The Hill

An environmental activist group is filing a request for former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's private emails regarding the Keystone XL pipeline.

Following news that Clinton exclusively used a private email account during her tenure as secretary, Friends of the Earth said some of those communications might reveal important details about the State Department's consideration of Keystone.

The group had previously filed four requests with State under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), but never received any emails from Clinton.

"Obviously, we now know why," said Ben Schreiber, climate program director at Friends of the Earth.

"We are concerned that these records were not included as part of our prior FOIA requests surrounding the State Department's environmental review of Keystone XL," Schreiber said in a statement.

"Secretary Clinton's willful circumvention of this accountability mechanism goes against the spirit of transparent governance."

The records the group has received showed various conflicts of interest in State's process for determining whether Keystone would be in the country's national interest, Friends of the Earth said.

"It is clear that State Department staff had cozy relationships with lobbyists, the government of Canada and the contractors hired to conduct the supposedly independent review," Schreiber said.

Since Clinton's private emails were not part of State's email system, they were not included in FOIA responses.

Clinton has since agreed to send all of her business emails to State, where they will be filed for requests.

The Associated Press has filed its own FOIA lawsuit against State over the Clinton emails, citing multiple unfulfilled requests for her communications.

Clinton taps SC campaign head (WaPo)

By AP

March 18, 2015

Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Hillary Rodham Clinton has chosen a former aide to Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina to lead her campaign in the South's first presidential primary.

Two Democrats familiar with the decision says Clay Middleton will serve as state director for Clinton's campaign in South Carolina. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss internal planning.

Middleton has worked as a special adviser in the Energy Department and previously served as an aide to Clyburn in South Carolina for eight years. He also worked on Obama's 2008 campaign in the state.

Middleton's selection was first reported by The Washington Post.

Clinton is expected to announce her presidential campaign in April and is building organizations in early voting states like Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

Clinton wins primary — in Northern Virginia straw poll (WaPo)

By Rachel Weiner

March 18, 2015

Washington Post

Hillary Clinton scored a largely meaningless victory Tuesday night, coming out on top in a straw poll held by Northern Virginia Democrats at Rep. Gerry Connolly's annual St. Patrick's Day gathering.

But she failed to win a majority of the vote, a reminder that Virginia is one place where Clinton is not already dominating the 2016 race. The former secretary of state took 48 percent in the poll, followed by former Virginia senator Jim Webb with 15 percent, Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren with 10 percent, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders with 7 percent, and Vice President Biden tied with former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley at 6 percent.

Warren was a write-in candidate, having asked not to be on the ballot.

While straw polls are not a reliable predictor, Connolly's yearly survey has had some resonance in the past. When Webb beat Harris Miller in the 2006 poll of the Democratic Senate primary, it was a surprise given Miller's strong support among that community of party activists. Webb went on to win the primary and the Senate seat.

Connolly's office said over 1,000 such party faithful showed up Tuesday for the event, along with about two dozen politicians ranging from Lt. Gov. Ralph Northam to members of the Fairfax County school board.

Northam joked that Gov. Terry McAuliffe, an Irish Catholic, could not attend because he had begun celebrating with his own in-office keg machine too early in the day.

In national (and scientific) polls, Clinton continues to hold an even more commanding lead, taking 62 percent of Democrats in a CNN poll released Wednesday. In that survey, O'Malley and Webb both get a mere 1 percent of the vote.

Democrats: The GOP's 'war on women' is back (WaPo)

By Mike DeBonis

March 18, 2015

Washington Post

A Republican "war on women" has returned, Democratic senators and women's groups proclaimed Wednesday -- returning to a message that resonated for Democrats in 2012 but seemed to falter more recently.

The message, delivered by Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), Patty Murray (D-Wash.) and others at a morning event at the Capitol, comes as the Senate continues to debate a bill that would stiffen penalties for the perpetrators of human trafficking and establish new resources for its victims. The bill is now stuck amid a heated debate over anti-abortion language embedded in the bill, and Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has pledged not to hold a vote on attorney general nominee Loretta Lynch until the deadlock is resolved.

The combination of abortion politics and the stymied confirmation of the nation's second woman attorney general has Democrats gleefully re-embracing the narrative that helped keep the Senate in their hands back in 2012.

"It feels like every time we turn around and start making progress, whether it's on passing a budget a couple of years ago or whether it's today on trying to pass this trafficking bill, that women have to take a step backwards in order for the Republicans to accept us moving forward," Murray said. "I call that a war on women."

Terry O'Neill, president of the National Organization for Women, called the deadlock a "dramatic escalation of the Republican leadership's war on women."

After all but four Senate Democrats voted to filibuster the anti-trafficking bill over the abortion provision Tuesday, McConnell pledged to continue debate until the deadlock is broken -- thus pushing back the Lynch confirmation vote, perhaps until April. He invited two women senators, Deb Fischer (R-Neb.) and Shelly Moore Capito (R-W.V.), to an afternoon news conference to call on Democrats to move forward, noting that the abortion language in the anti-trafficking bill, which would restrict spending from a victims compensation fund, is identical to the long-standing Hyde Amendment that has been attached to appropriations measures since 1974 and has gotten Democratic support as recently as December.

As for Lynch, McConnell spokesman Don Stewart said Wednesday, "The only thing holding up that vote is the Democrats' filibuster of a bill that would help prevent kids from being sold into sex slavery. The sooner they allow the Senate to pass that bipartisan bill, the sooner the Senate can move to the Lynch nomination."

The women who gathered in the Capitol Wednesday were decidedly uninterested in explaining how the anti-trafficking bill managed to pass through the Judiciary Committee last month without a single Democratic senator objecting to the abortion provision, which had been embedded in the bill introduced by Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) since January, even if Republican staffers may not have alerted their Democratic colleagues to it.

They preferred to rail against McConnell and his new Republican majority.

"This egregious delay is all in the name of scoring political points by catering to the extreme right wing of the Republican party," Baldwin said. "We are not even three months into this new Congress, and the new majority has done nothing bur play partisan politics with some of our nation's most critical issues."

"Mitch McConnell needs to stop playing politics with women's health care and with women's advancement in this country," O'Neill added.

And, should there be any doubt that the "war on women" narrative, will play into the 2016 presidential race, consider these tweets from likely Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton:

How to Be Misled by Polls, Hillary Clinton Email Edition (NYT)

By Brendan Nyhan

March 18, 2015

New York Times

Has the controversy over Hillary Clinton's use of a personal email account hurt her in the polls?

You might think so if you read a CNN article published Monday night, which reported that "unfavorable views of Hillary Clinton are on the rise" after disclosure of her use of the email account while serving as secretary of state. (The network's televised coverage of the poll made similar claims.)

This framing suggests that her standing with the public has declined considerably. In fact, the new poll actually seems to be good news for Mrs. Clinton, the Democratic presidential front-runner. CNN found that 53 percent of Americans have a favorable view of her, which is somewhat higher than in other recent polls, including those conducted before the controversy.

CNN's poll seemed to suggest a decline because the network ignored numerous polls conducted by other organizations in the intervening months and instead compared her current standing only with its most recent poll — an outlier from November showing Mrs. Clinton with a 59 percent favorable rating.

This approach is misleading for two reasons. First, CNN gives its own poll too much weight compared with polling averages, creating a perception of decline in Mrs. Clinton's ratings that could be a result of sampling error. (Polling averages are generally more accurate than any individual poll.)

It's even more problematic, however, to compare polls from November and March and attribute any changes that took place over a four-month period to the email controversy. In reality, this comparison cannot distinguish between the effects of the email controversy and the continuing decline in Mrs. Clinton's favorability ratings as she transitions back into what she was before her stint as secretary of state: an intensely polarizing political figure. (Similar problems plague McClatchy's comparison of Mrs. Clinton's standing in trial heats against possible Republican general election opponents with a previous poll in December.)

A broader look at Mrs. Clinton's ratings suggests that, as expected, her ratings have so far changed little even as views of the controversy have quickly polarized. As a matter of pure politics, this controversy is most important not for what it tells us about her standing with the public at large but with two other constituencies: Democratic Party elites, who remain overwhelmingly supportive, and members of the news media, who appear likely to continue their antagonistic relationship with Mrs. Clinton.

Poll: Clinton tops GOP, Dem 2016 rivals (The Hill)

By Mark Hensch

March 18, 2015

The Hill

Hillary Clinton holds a strong lead over a slew of potential 2016 Democratic and Republican presidential rivals, according to a new poll released Wednesday.

The CNN/ORC poll reveals that most voters would pick the former secretary of State over five other likely Democratic candidates in head-to-head match-ups. Voters also prefer Clinton over seven potential Republican contenders in hypothetical races.

Clinton leads the pack of likely 2016 Democratic candidates with 62 percent support. Her nearest competitors are Vice President Biden and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.), each with 10 percent support.

Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders (Vt.), who is also weighing a bid, snagged 3 percent support. Former Gov. Martin O'Malley (Md.) and former Sen. Jim Webb (Va.) rounded out the field with 1 percent apiece.

Clinton's lead among Democrats grows notably if Warren is removed from the field. In that scenario, 67 percent of voters back Clinton, with Biden being her nearest rival with 16 percent.

Voters also favor Clinton in head-to-head contests with the GOP's likely 2016 candidates.

She beats former Gov. Jeb Bush (Fla.), her closest Republican competitor, 55 percent to 40 percent.

Clinton also tops Gov. Chris Christie (R-N.J.) 55 percent to 40 percent and Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) 55 percent to 42 percent.

Voters also prefer Clinton over former Gov. Mike Huckabee (Ark), 55percent 41 percent; over Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.), 54 percent to 43 percent; Gov. Scott Walker (Wis.) by 55 percent to 40 percent; and over retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson 56 percent to 40 percent.

The poll shows that Clinton is still in a commanding position despite the controversy over her use of a private email account and server while serving as secretary of State. Fifty-three percent of voters viewed Clinton favorably, while 44 percent viewed her unfavorably.

Clinton addressed the controversy, revealing that she had deleted messages but insisting all relevant emails had been shared with the State Department.

But Republicans are vowing to investigate the matter. Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) on Tuesday called on Clinton to give a "neutral third party" access to the email server. Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), chairman of the House panel investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, said Sunday the House could vote to subpoena Clinton's emails.

CNN/ORC interviewed 1,009 via telephone for the poll form March 13-15. It has 3-percentage-point margin of error.

Poll: Hillary Clinton still tops in 2016 (CNN)

By Jennifer Agiesta

March 18, 2015

CNN

Washington (CNN) Hillary Clinton continues to be a dominant force heading into the 2016 presidential election, according to a new CNN/ORC poll. The former secretary of state maintains a broad lead over the field of potential Democratic challengers she could face in a nomination contest and sizable advantages over the leading contenders from the Republican side in general election match-ups.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush tops the possible field for the Republican Party's nomination race, followed by Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former neurosurgeon Ben Carson all in a tight cluster.

But none of the top candidates in this field gets within 10 points of Hillary Clinton in a series of hypothetical general election matchups.

Rand Paul comes closest, with 43% saying they'd be more likely to back him while 54% choose Clinton. The two candidates who currently top the GOP field, Bush and Walker, match up equally against Clinton, with each carrying 40% to her 55%. Huckabee gets 41% to Clinton's 55% and Carson has 40% to Clinton's 56%.

In the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, Clinton holds a nearly 50-point lead over Vice President Joe Biden, her closest competitor in the field, 62% to 15%. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren rounds out the top three on the Democratic side with 10%. No other potential candidate tops 5%.

Should Warren decide not to get into the race, Clinton stands to benefit more than others, gaining 5 points and holding a 67% to 16% advantage over Biden when Warren's backers are re-allocated to their second-choice candidate. Notably, with Warren out of the race, Clinton surges from 67% support to 74% among Democratic women.

And Democrats broadly believe the party's chances to hold the White House in 2016 are strongest with Clinton; 68% say so, while 30% say the party would have a better shot with someone else leading the ticket.

Though Clinton's favorability rating has taken a hit recently, her prospects in 2016 appear largely unchanged compared to polls conducted before news broke about her use of a personal email address and home-based server while serving as secretary of state.

On the Republican side, Bush leads the pack with 16%, Walker follows at 13%, Paul nearly matches him at 12% and Huckabee holds 10% support. Huckabee's backing has dipped significantly since February, from 16% to 10%, while the others near the top have generally held steady. In single digits, Carson holds 9%, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie has 7%, and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio has 7%. The rest of the field lands below 5%, including 2012 candidates Rick Santorum at 1% and Rick Perry at 4%.

Some interesting demographic trends emerge in the GOP numbers: There is something of a gender gap in preferences, with both Walker (17% among men, 9% among women) and Paul (16% among men, 7% among women) doing significantly better with men than women. Younger Republicans are more likely to back Paul than older ones (he has 17% support among Republicans under 50, just 7% among older Republicans).

Bush's backing generally holds steady across demographic divides, but he fares better among self-identified Republicans (22%) than independents who lean toward the party (10%), while Paul outperforms among independents (17% compared with 7% among self-identified Republicans).

Yet many of the GOP's strongest contenders remain largely unknown. Majorities of Americans haven't yet formed opinions about Scott Walker (58%) or Ben Carson (64%), and about half haven't heard of or don't know about Marco Rubio (48%).

Even the best known Republican contender, Jeb Bush, prompts nearly a quarter of Americans to say they're not sure how they feel about him (23%). Republicans themselves have heard a bit more about their party's top potential candidates, but only one merits a majority favorable rating among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents: Mike Huckabee at 57% favorable.

The CNN/ORC International poll was conducted by telephone March 13-15 and included interviews with 1,009 adult Americans. For results among the full sample, the margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points. For results among the 450 Republicans or Republican-leaning independents, or among the 466 Democrats or Democratic-leaning independents, it is 4.5 points.

Archives wants explanation for Hillary Clinton email practices (Politico)

By Josh Gerstein

March 18, 2015

Politico

The National Archives has formally asked the State Department to explain how Hillary Clinton's emails as secretary of state ended up on her private email server rather than a government system.

In a letter sent earlier this month and obtained Wednesday by POLITICO, National Archives and Records Administration official Paul Wester asked State to report on whether federal records had been "alienated" and what steps the agency is taking to address the situation.

"NARA is concerned that Federal records may have been alienated from the Department of State's official recordkeeping systems," Wester wrote to Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Margaret Grafeld. "If federal records have been alienated, please describe all measures the Department has taken, or expects to take, to retrieve the alienated records. Please also include a description of all safeguards established to prevent records alienation incidents from happening in the future."

The letter from Wester, who serves as the chief records officer for the U.S. government, was sent the day after The New York Times published an article revealing Clinton's exclusive use of a personal email account while she was secretary of state. The letter cites that story and "other news reports" as triggering concerns at the Archives about the matter.

Wester's letter implies, but does not state outright, that State had not previously reported Clinton's use of the personal email system as a loss or removal of government records under federal law.

The Archives official gave State 30 days to respond to his letter, which also referred to "potential issues" with emails sent or received by prior secretaries of state dating back to Madeleine Albright.

In a statement earlier this month, the Archives said it had inquired with State about the issue, but did not refer to an official request.

"We have reached out to the State Department to ensure that all federal records are properly identified and managed in accordance with the Federal Records Act and that controls and procedures are in place to manage records effectively in the future," an Archive spokeswoman said.

A State Department spokesman did not immediately respond to a request for comment on the Archives' letter.

Clinton has said she violated no law or regulation by using a personal email account. State Department spokespeople have made similar claims and have noted that former Secretary of State Colin Powell also regularly used a private email account.

In December, Clinton provided about 30,000 emails from her private account to her former agency at its request. She said last week she discarded about 32,000 other messages her lawyers deemed personal and private in nature.

Clinton said she believed most of the work-related messages were "preserved" in State Department systems at the time because they came from or were sent to officials using "state.gov" accounts.

However, the State Department disclosed Friday that it had not routinely archived official email accounts until recently. Archiving of current Secretary of State John Kerry's account began in 2013, soon after he was sworn in, and automated saving of emails for other senior officials began just last month, State spokeswoman Jen Psaki said.

Psaki also provided a new explanation Wednesday for why Clinton and some of her predecessors apparently did not complete a standard State Department "separation statement" certifying that they had returned all of their official records to the agency.

"Secretaries of state often do not sign this form as it is a step to revoking their own security clearance," the State spokeswoman said. "There's a long tradition of secretaries of state making themselves available to future secretaries and presidents and secretaries are typically allowed to maintain their security clearance and access to their own records for use in writing their memoirs and the like. Hence, this is not a form that many would have signed."

Clinton critics had seized on the separation form, insisting that if she signed it when she left the agency in 2013, she lied since she had work-related emails in her personal account. If she didn't sign it, she was improperly exempted from department policies, prominent Republicans charged.

However, State officials have suggested that the exit procedures for secretaries have long been different from those for lower-ranking employees.

Psaki said she could not say Wednesday whether the exemption from the usual exit process was limited to departing secretaries or included other senior officials.

"I think this is specific to a certain category of individual. I don't have any more characterization of it than what I've offered," the spokeswoman said.

Hillary Clinton dominates in new 2016 presidential poll (Chicago-Sun Times)

By Chad Merda

March 18, 2015

Chicago Sun-Times

Not even an email controversy can keep Hillary Clinton down, based on a new CNN/ORC poll.

The poll shows not only does she maintain a stranglehold on the Democratic nomination in the 2016 presidential race, but she also has a double-digit lead against her closest GOP contender in a head-to-head matchup.

It also backs up a poll from Pew Research Center showing few people, especially Democrats, care about the Clinton email scandal.

In a crowded GOP field, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is the preferred choice for 16 percent of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents, followed by Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (13 percent). Twelve percent want Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul.

Of the Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents, 62 percent give their nod to Clinton for their party's nomination. Vice President Joe Biden is a distant second at 15 percent.

And what happens if Bush faces off against Clinton for the White House? She'd win, in a landslide.

Fifty-five percent of those polled opted for Clinton, compared to 40 percent for Bush. And while Clinton has a double-digit lead against all potential GOP challengers, Bush doesn't give her the tightest battle, even though he's the early favorite among Republicans.

That honor goes to Paul, with Clinton getting 54 percent of the vote, compared to Paul's 43 percent in a head-to-head matchup.

I Sorted Hillary Clinton's Email (NY Magazine)

By Michael Wolraich

March 18, 2015

New York Magazine

When Hillary Clinton released emails from her personal account last week, many assumed that her attorneys had personally reviewed the messages before sending them to the State Department, but that's not what happened. As detailed in her press statement, the review team used keyword searches to automatically filter over 60,000 messages, flagging about half as work related.

"I have absolute confidence that everything that could be in any way connected to work is now in the possession of the State Department," Clinton declared.

I'm afraid that I don't share her confidence, and I speak from experience. Twenty years ago, I used the same method to sort the Clinton administration's email communications, including those of First Lady Hillary Clinton. It failed miserably.

Email did not exist when Congress established the Freedom of Information Act in 1967, and government officials did not originally consider electronic communications to be public records that they had to preserve and disseminate. On the last day of Ronald Reagan's presidency, a group of organizations representing archivists and libraries sued the White House to prevent the administration from deleting email relating to the Iran-Contra scandal. A temporary injunction was issued, and the case wound its way through the courts until 1993, when a federal judge ordered President Bill Clinton to preserve all electronic communication under the Freedom of Information Act.

In 1994, I was 22 years old, fresh out of college and working as a computer programmer for a company called Information Management Consultants. IMC was one of many three-letter-acronym corporations that ring Washington's famous beltway and feed off government contracts. I dressed in a gray J.C. Penney suit and programmed three-letter-acronym computer languages (SQL, 4GL) for three-letter-acronym federal agencies (IRS, OPM, DOI, OMB, DOD). It was dull work, made duller by my company's decision to block employee access to the "World Wide Web" so that we would not be distracted from our work.

One day a colleague invited me to join a mysterious new project for the Executive Office of the President (EOP). The White House had hired IMC to archive its email after the court ordered it to preserve electronic records. Few people had multiple email accounts back then and many federal employees used their work accounts for personal communication, so we had to figure out some way to distinguish work email from personal correspondence.

Those were heady days for a young government IT contractor. We had a special office in Arlington, Virginia, where we were could dress casually while pursuing important, groundbreaking work for the President of the United States! We lounged around the conference table in our khakis and scrawled deep thoughts on the big whiteboard. Mostly, we wrote words: president, federal, treasury, treaty, China, Serbia, ambassador, military, classified, and so on. These were the keywords with which we hoped to flag all the work-related messages, or at least the vast majority. We included the names of federal officials, common misspellings, and, of course, numerous three-letter acronyms. Since I had a philosophy degree, the team leader asked me to design logic to make the search smarter, e.g., "white AND house."

To test our algorithm, the administration gave us a batch of sample messages. They included official business, such as a debate about a public scandal in which an official traveled by federal helicopter to play golf, and less official business, such as a private love note between two staff members. We ran our algorithm and crossed our fingers.

The results were abysmal. Even after significant tweaking, I don't recall achieving more than a 70 percent success rate, which is particularly poor when you consider that random sorting would yield 50 percent if the distribution were even. IMC ultimately scrapped our troubled sorting project in favor of a feature that allowed users to manually flag messages that should not be archived.

Our problem was that natural language — the way people ordinarily speak and write — is notoriously difficult to parse. To make sense of natural language, it's not sufficient to recognize the words; you also need to understand grammar, appreciate nuance, interpret metaphors, grasp allusions, infer from context, and even have a sense of humor. Right now, only humans can do that reliably.

Machine learning has made great strides in the past few years. With enough training, an advanced natural-language processor would be able to sort Hillary Clinton's emails much more effectively than the simple keyword approach that my colleagues and I devised. But Clinton's press statement offers no indication that her team employed such technology. On the contrary, her account of the process sounds remarkably like the name and keyword filters that we tried in the 1990s:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To help identify any potential non-".gov "correspondence that should be included, a search of first and last names of more than 100 State Department and other US government officials was performed … Next, to account for non-obvious or non-recognizable email addresses or misspellings or other idiosyncrasies, the emails were sorted and reviewed both by sender and recipient. Lastly, a number of terms were specifically searched for, including: "Benghazi" and "Libya."

It's possible that Clinton's team used more advanced techniques than described in the statement. Or perhaps her team included technical wizards who designed a flawless keyword search. If so, she should release technical documentation of the search algorithm, the test procedure, and the test results — assuming they tested it. Without that information, we have no basis for sharing Hillary Clinton's "absolute confidence" that the State Department has received all her work-related email communication.

This is the best news Hillary Clinton has had in weeks (WaPo)

By Chris Cilliza

March 18, 2015

Washington Post

It's been a rough few weeks for Hillary Clinton. E-mails, private servers and poor press conference performances led to a slew of stories about whether the former Secretary of State was really ready for the presidential race to come. But, a ray of light broke through those clouds -- bad metaphor alert! -- this morning when CNN released new poll numbers on Clinton and the 2016 presidential race.

Those numbers contained nothing but good news for Clinton.

Let's start with the primary matchup. Yes, Clinton led Vice President Joe Biden by 47 points and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren by 52 points. But, as important as those massive leads was the fact that Clinton's edge over Biden, Warren and, well, everyone else in the party hasn't taken much of a hit despite her run of bad press. Here's the trend line:

Yes, you math majors will note that Clinton's lead has shrunk since, say November 2014 when she led Warren by 55 points. But the rate of that shrinkage is very small. Biden has grown in support, marginally, while Warren has stayed between 9 and ten percent. The steadiness of the numbers, particularly in light of just how much negative attention Clinton has drawn during the time when this poll was in the field (March 13-15) suggests that Democratic voters are resolved that she is going to be the nominee -- no matter what. Clinton is their choice and external developments don't seem -- at least not yet -- to be leading people to jump off her bandwagon.

The general election numbers are equally rosy for Clinton. Her slimmest lead over a Republican is 11 points over Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul. She leads former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, the two men considered the party's most likely nominees, by 15 points. She has a 13 point edge over Florida Sen. Marco Rubio.

And, horserace aside, there's considerable agreement among partisans that Clinton is, by far, the Democrats' best hope of holding the White House in 2016. Nearly seven in 10 (68 percent) said Democrats were better off with Clinton as their 2016 nominee while just 30 percent said they'd be better with someone else.

Now, Clinton's numbers are not what they once were. And, as the Republican primary and the subsequent general election engage, the general election match-ups between Clinton and the GOP candidates will narrow. It's simply not possible for a presidential nominee in this polarized climate to win by double digits -- much less 15 points.

Still, for a Clinton team that has taken a load of incoming over the past fortnight, the CNN numbers have to buoy them. The CNN data point suggests that minds -- especially on the Democratic side -- are made up for Clinton and that nothing will change that fact. That's something that any of the two dozen (or so) Republicans running or thinking about running for president in 2016 would kill for right about now.

Hillary Clinton Starts Tweeting Up a Political Storm, But Supporters Want More (Bloomberg)
By Jennifer Epstein
March 18, 2015
Bloomberg

Hillary Clinton is testing the waters on Twitter, increasingly turning to the social networking site to inject herself into the daily political conversation as she prepares to launch her all-but-certain presidential campaign in the coming weeks.

It's an easy way to distract—at least briefly—from the lingering questions about her reliance on a personal e-mail account during her time as secretary of state, and to test out her message with supporters, opponents and the media.

At the same time, it's an easily controlled medium where she can limit herself to a few words and have a big impact.

Her latest shots came Tuesday night, as she offered a critique on the House GOP budget unveiled earlier in the day, which proposes $5.5 trillion in cuts over the next decade and would repeal the Affordable Care Act.

"Budgets reflect our priorities. They should help families get ahead, educate our kids, and spark small business growth," she said in her first tweet of the night.

In another message, she added: "Our nation's future—jobs & economic growth—depends on investments made today. The GOP budget fails Americans on these principles."

In two subsequent tweets, she criticized Republicans' proposals to cut Pell Grants and to kill the health care law.

While they're by no means earth-shattering comments coming from a Democrat with clear presidential aspirations, Clinton's tweets are a means of signaling that she's engaged in the politics of the moment, even as she stays out of the early states and limits her interactions with the media. They're also a quick and clean way for her to go after some of the many Republicans who have been going after her.

"It's good that she and her team are beginning to engage more," said Jim Manley, the former top communications adviser to Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid. "But a couple of tweets does not make a policy agenda and is far from active engagement with the media."

But, he said, it's a logical medium for Clinton to turn to as she operates with a small full-time communications team with only one on-the-record spokesman.

Clinton has a bigger bullhorn on Twitter than any of her potential rivals, Democratic or Republican. She has just short of 3 million followers, while Vice President Joe Biden has 753,000 followers on his political account and the Republicans with the largest followings—Kentucky Senator Rand Paul and New Jersey Governor Chris Christie—barely break the half-million mark.

And it's her only social media platform for getting her message out there. There's no official Hillary Clinton Facebook page or Instagram account, at least not yet. (And, if she were to start Snapchatting or Meerkatting, that would itself be part of the story, about her expanding her presence ahead of her likely campaign.)

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill declined to comment on his boss' tweeting habits. At this point, he said in statement shared with several media outlets over the past day or so, Clinton "hasn't made a decision about running" and "is currently 'testing the waters,'" as the Federal Election Commission calls it.

As she tests the waters, she's also testing messages on Twitter.

On Monday, she lamented congressional Republicans' "trifecta against women"—including blocking a vote on attorney general nominee Loretta Lynch by insisting that a human trafficking bill include anti-abortion provisions.

While Clinton's Twitter presence has intensified as her likely campaign launch nears, she's occasionally before used the social media service in the same way.

After New Jersey Governor Chris Christie voiced some skepticism about vaccines in early February, she tweeted: "The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork. Let's protect all our kids. #GrandmothersKnowBest."

Not surprisingly, Republicans aren't impressed.

"With each partisan attack, Hillary Clinton is making clear she intends to run a divisive and negative campaign so that she can give President Obama's failed agenda a third term," Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short said.

Clinton also used Twitter earlier this month in an effort to push back on the questioning of her decision to use a private e-mail account and server while at the State Department, setting up an inconvenient juxtaposition with her iconic avatar photo, which shows her sitting on a military plane, sunglasses on and BlackBerry in hand.

Clinton's few public appearances in recent weeks have been carefully stage-managed and not particularly political. The one exception was her United Nations press conference last week, where she prefaced her defense of her e-mail practices with an attack on the 47 Senate Republicans who signed a letter to Iran aiming to undermine the Obama administration's nuclear talks.

Clinton spoke to an Irish-American group on Monday and will on Thursday travel to Atlantic City for what's expected to be her final paid speech before launching her campaign, to the American Camp Association of New York and New Jersey.

More tweets will be on the way, too, though Democrats hope she'll branch out beyond communicating 140-characters at a time.

"Folks are looking for a lot more than a handful of tweets," Manley said.

Signs Hillary Clinton Is Amending Her Media Strategy (Wall Street Journal)
By Peter Nicholas
March 18, 2015
Wall Street Journal

Hillary Clinton's 2016 presidential bid could rise or fall on one lingering question: Did she learn anything from her failed 2008 run?

The shortcomings back then were easy to spot. Aides quarreled among themselves in a campaign that lacked internal discipline. Staff complained they couldn't corral Bill Clinton as he sought to win the South Carolina Democratic primary for his wife. Mrs. Clinton fastened onto the wrong message, emphasizing her "strength" and "experience" at a moment when voters dearly wanted change.
Then there was her dyspeptic press operation.

Some of these problems may be tough to prevent. Mrs. Clinton's new campaign is shaping up to be a hybrid of longtime Clinton and Obama political operatives. Tensions are inevitable. But Mrs. Clinton seems to want some sort of rapprochement with the press.

Three of the people she has recently tapped for key spots in her media operation suggest as much. All have strong ties to the press corps; none is known for a combative approach to the media.

Assuming she runs – and who are we kidding; she's running — Mrs. Clinton would have as one of her lead press aides Jesse Ferguson, a 34-year-old veteran of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Heading her communications team would be Jennifer Palmieri, who has held a comparable spot in the White House since 2011. Ms. Palmieri maintained good relations with the White House press throughout her stint in the Obama administration, which never seemed to have much use for the press corps. (Ms. Palmieri's deputy is likely to be Kristina Schake, who handled communications for first lady Michelle Obama. Ms. Schake's appointment is a curious choice. Mrs. Obama has taken on an apolitical role in her six-year tenure, focusing on comparatively noncontroversial issues such as nutrition and fitness. Her favorability ratings have been high. Mrs. Clinton, by contrast, is all about deeply partisan matters of policy and politics. So, is Ms. Schake on board to help sand off Mrs. Clintons' sharp edges? That's unclear).

Perhaps the most important press person in Mrs. Clinton's shop would be Brian Fallon, a veteran of New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer's media team who enjoys the respect of the press corps. Mr. Fallon is poised to be Mrs. Clintons' primary press secretary.

Also expected to be part of the mix is Nick Merrill, who was largely a one-man band over the past couple of years as Mrs. Clinton dealt with questions about her paid speeches, email practices and fundraising. Through it all, Mr. Merrill kept his good humor – no small feat in such a high-pressured environment.

Unclear is the role that will be played by longtime Clinton confidante Philippe Reines, whose relations with the press have been tempestuous over the years.

Ultimately, the boss is the one who sets the tone. If Mrs. Clinton concludes she's the victim of a voracious press corps and unscrupulous Republicans, it may not matter who she taps for top roles in her press shop. A siege mentality might prevail, as has happened in the past.

But the early appointments are encouraging. Perhaps Mrs. Clinton is signaling she wants to turn the page.

Clinton team picks Justice spokesman Brian Fallon as lead press secretary (Washington Post)
By Anne Gearan; Philip Rucker
March 18, 2015
Washington Post

Hillary Rodham Clinton's press shop is taking shape, with word Tuesday that longtime Democratic spokesman Brian Fallon will be the lead press secretary for the yet-to-be-announced campaign.

Fallon, currently the top spokesman for the Justice Department, told his staff Tuesday morning that he will leave at the end of the month.

Fallon's name has been circulating for weeks as a likely addition to the Clinton team, and two senior Democrats familiar with the campaign plan said Tuesday that he will hold the top spokesman's job.

Fallon is expected to begin work at the campaign in April. Clinton is expected to announce an exploratory committee early that month, followed by a formal start to daily campaigning later in the spring.

Fallon was formerly the top spokesman for Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and was considered one of the most skilled Democratic communicators on Capitol Hill. "Brian Fallon is one of the smartest and most talented people who has ever worked for me and will serve Hillary Clinton extremely well," Schumer said in a statement.

Generally well-regarded by reporters, Fallon joins an emerging Clinton press team known for good relations with the press. That stands in contrast to the sometimes toxic relations that developed between the 2008 Clinton campaign and reporters covering her.

Longtime Democratic strategist Jennifer Palmieri is leaving her post as White House communications director to hold the same title for Clinton. Her last day at the White House is March 20.

Former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee communications director Jesse Ferguson will handle day-to-day press duties at the campaign headquarters in New York, the Democratic sources said. Both requested anonymity because Clinton has not yet announced her campaign or formally hired staff.

Ferguson has been traveling between Washington and New York to hire junior press team members, including for regional press desks and deployment to Iowa and New Hampshire.

Also in the Clinton press lineup will be Josh Schwerin, who was spokesman for the DCCC during the 2014 midterm elections. Current Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill is expected to remain in a prominent role. All bring established relationships with reporters.

Attorney General Eric Holder hired Fallon in 2013. He is married to White House legislative director Katie Beirne Fallon.

Hillary Clinton's Campaign Team Takes Shape (ABC News)
By Jonathan Karl and Liz Kreutz
March 17, 2015
ABC News

Hillary Clinton has not yet officially announced her presidential campaign, but the wheels are ready to be swiftly in motion when she does. Over the past few months, Clinton's been steadily building out a team of advisers, strategists and staffers for her likely campaign, with most of the top spots already filled.

A major focus over the past few weeks has been to build up Clinton's communication team. The handling of the email controversy served as a signal to many in her inner-circle that a more robust communications team was much needed –and fast.

In the coming weeks the following people will be in place to manage communications for her campaign, sources familiar with the moves tell ABC News.

Jennifer Palmieri, the current director of communications at the White House, will take on the top role as communications Director. Palmieri's last day at the White House is Friday. She starts working for the Clinton team on Monday.

Kristina Schake will serve as the deputy communications director. Schake was formerly Michelle Obama's communications director. She has already started advising Clinton.

Brian Fallon will be Clinton's press secretary, with deputy Jesse Ferguson. Fallon is the current spokesperson for Attorney General Eric Holder. Ferguson goes to the Clinton team from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee where he was spokesperson.

Clinton's current spokesman Nick Merrill will remain on the Clinton team as a spokesman.

In addition, John Podesta, a longtime counselor to Obama, and Robby Mook, a top Democratic operative, have already been brought on board Team Clinton in senior roles: Podesta as campaign chairman and Mook as campaign manager. Former Obama operatives, Joel Benenson and Jim Margolis, have also been advising Clinton: Benenson as chief pollster and Margolis as media strategist.

The Clinton campaign, when it comes, will be based in Brooklyn, N.Y. And the official announcement is expected in April.

Despite all this, Clinton's spokesman, Nick Merrill, still insists Clinton has not yet made a decision about running.

"She is currently 'testing the waters' as the Federal Elections Commission calls it," Merrill said in a statement to ABC News. "Like anyone considering running for office, she has the support of many individuals who have agreed to volunteer their time to help her make this decision."

According to campaign finance experts, presumptive candidates are allowed to take in donations during the "testing the waters" phase. Clinton's spokesman would not comment on whether Clinton has started to do that yet.

Clinton taps SC campaign head (Associated Press)
By Ken Thomas
March 18, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Hillary Rodham Clinton has chosen a former aide to Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina to lead her campaign in the South's first presidential primary.

Two Democrats familiar with the decision says Clay Middleton will serve as state director for Clinton's campaign in South Carolina. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss internal planning.

Middleton has worked as a special adviser in the Energy Department and previously served as an aide to Clyburn in South Carolina for eight years. He also worked on Obama's 2008 campaign in the state.

Middleton's selection was first reported by The Washington Post.

Clinton is expected to announce her presidential campaign in April and is building organizations in early voting states like Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

Has Hillary Really Helped the World's Women? (Politico)
By Valerie Hudson and Patricia Leidl
March 17, 2015
Politico

Many leaders have had doctrines named after them—from the Monroe Doctrine to the Truman Doctrine to the Bush Doctrine—but so far there's only that can be ascribed to a woman: the Hillary Doctrine. As Hillary Clinton herself defined it, "the subjugation of women [is] a threat to the common security of our world and to the national security of our country."

But for proponents of this doctrine, perhaps no irony was crueler than seeing its namesake, then Secretary of State Clinton, smiling broadly in her trademark pantsuit as she walked the red carpet from her plane in Riyadh with the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, in 2010. The moment brought to mind an incongruity no less extreme than if Frederick Douglass had been appointed ambassador to the Confederacy and found himself sipping tea and making small talk with Nathan Bedford Forrest. For, in Saudi Arabia, the subordination of women is as peculiar and pernicious an institution as was slavery in the antebellum South.

It wasn't the last time Hillary Clinton was accused of brushing aside her own self-declared commitment to women's rights, ostensibly in the name of the national interest. Most recently, as she prepares to launch her all-but-declared presidential campaign, reports have emerged concerning large donations to her family's foundation from countries including Algeria, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and, of course, Saudi Arabia—a rogues' gallery of governments with poor records on women's issues. How could Clinton—she of "women's rights are human rights" fame, who by all indications will soon try again to break the "highest, hardest glass ceiling" of the White House—still be so cozy with a regime so at odds with one of her core, lifelong causes?

On the one hand, the doctrine that Clinton made a central part of her time at Foggy Bottom was revolutionary; never before had the cause of women been elevated to a priority of American foreign policy and labeled a key national security concern. But talking the talk is not the same as walking the walk, and as Clinton prepares for a presidential candidacy in which she will likely tout both her tenure at State and her potentially history-making role as America's first woman president, it is only natural to examine whether the "Hillary Doctrine" really worked. Last week, amid the furor over her email server, Clinton was marking 20 years since her own groundbreaking 1995 speech in Beijing on women's rights. But the anniversary also raised an important question: Two decades later, are the world's women better off for Clinton's efforts on their behalf—or were those efforts mostly for show?

Perhaps no other country offers a better test case than Saudi Arabia, a regime that openly denies women so many rights and yet appears to be chummy with both Clinton and her foundation. Asked last week specifically about Saudi Arabia's donations to the Clinton Foundation, the former secretary of state, fresh off a speech about women's rights at the United Nations and the release of a 50-page report on the status of women and girls in the world, responded, "There can't be any mistake about my passion concerning women's rights here at home and around the world. So I think that people who want to support the foundation know full well what it is we stand for and what we're working on."

Should we take Clinton at face value?

Some context is worth considering first: Saudi Arabia ranks 145th of 158 countries in the U.N. Development Program's Gender Inequality Index, making it among the worst countries in which to be born female, despite its considerable oil wealth. Child marriage is not uncommon because there is no legal minimum age to wed. For the bride, consent isn't even required, and indeed, a woman (or girl) need not even be present for her own marriage, as long as her male guardian and her groom agree.

In the past few years, however, women in Saudi Arabia have made modest gains. In 2011, Saudi women finally gained the right to vote and to run in municipal elections (though not until this year). Today, 20 percent of the King's Consultative Council (Majlis as-Shura) is made up of women. In 2012, women were permitted to work as sales clerks in lingerie and cosmetics shops for the first time, and in October 2013, four Saudi women were licensed to become lawyers—a first in the history of the kingdom. Overall, the number of women in the workforce has increased nine-fold in the past five years, to 17.7 percent, compared to 74.1 percent of males.

Mobility is still one of the most vexing problems facing Saudi women. The government forbids them to drive (apparently in deference to their ovaries, which must not be harmed). The mutaween (religious police) enforce a strict dress code that stipulates that women be covered top to bottom in the stifling black abaya and accompanied by a male guardian (mahram) every time they stir outside the home. Women cannot wander about by themselves, ride a bike (unless in a park, in full abaya and with a male guardian present) or go on a picnic. They cannot travel outside the country nor marry a man of their choosing without the permission of the ubiquitous male guardian.

The watchful eyes of male relatives and the dreaded mutaween circumscribe women's every movement—so much so that in a 2009 cable to U.S. diplomats, Wajeha al-Huwaider—a Saudi women's rights activist who recently challenged the ban on female drivers—was quoted as calling the country as "the world's largest women's prison."

It wasn't always this way. Before extremist clerics, calling themselves the Ikhwan, or the Brotherhood, took control of the Grand Mosque at Mecca in 1979, women enjoyed a modest measure of autonomy. As one Saudi woman expressed it in Qanta Ahmed's 2008 In the Land of Invisible Women, "I used to be free in Riyadh, walking around [with my hair uncovered]. … Can you believe … I used to walk alone in Riyadh: no man, no maid, just relaxed like in Paris? ."

Many argue that it was only after the Saudi military ended up laying siege to one of Islam's holiest sites in order to oust the recalcitrant fanatics, resulting in three hundred deaths and hundreds of injuries during two tense weeks, that the status of Saudi women changed dramatically. The crisis convinced the monarchy that it needed the fundamentalist Wahhabi clergy more than ever to control the population and to subvert insurgency by playing to the most atavistic elements in Saudi society. Unfortunately, the price for appeasement was the increased subordination of women.

During this same time, the Saudis also embarked on an ambitious program of exporting their most extreme Wahhabi adherents through missionary work. In Yemen, Egypt and Libya and throughout the Middle East, North and West Africa, and Central and South Asia, increasingly virulent forms of Islam are severely curtailing the rights of women and, by extension, further destabilizing already fragile states. Lamentably, Islamic regions that previously espoused less draconian views about the role of women are turning toward the Saudi-inspired misogyny. As Kyrgyz academic Tcholpon Akhmatalieva asserted in an interview with us, the outward flow of Saudi money has not only produced "a mosque on every block" in Uzbekistan and south Kyrgyzstan, but "now even little schoolgirls are forced to wear the hijab, which had never ever happened in [our] history before. The [Saudi] missionaries tell the patriarchs that all their women must veil now."

All this means that those who argue that our national interests in Saudi Arabia are much more important than how women are treated there are suffering from a severe case of short-sightedness. The export of political volatility and violence—and misogyny—throughout the international system is not in the interests of the United States of America. Hillary Clinton herself said it best, declaring in a 2013 speech: "The next time you hear someone say that the fate of women and girls is not a core national security issue, it's not one of those hard issues that really smart people deal with, remind them: The extremists understand the stakes of this struggle. They know that when women are liberated, so are entire societies. We must understand this too. And not only understand it, but act on it."

Why, then, was Clinton not more outspoken against the Saudi regime while she was secretary of state? And why, to this day, does her family's foundation accept money from a government know to contradict her stated beliefs on women's rights? Certainly she was not ignorant of the facts: In a 2009 Wikileaks document, top officials at the U.S. State Department proclaimed bluntly to its embassies in the region, "It has been an ongoing challenge to persuade Saudi officials to treat terrorist financing emanating from Saudi Arabia as a strategic priority. … Donors in Saudi Arabia constitute the most significant source of funding to Sunni terrorist groups worldwide." Clinton knew then and knows now that the national interests of the United States and Saudi Arabia do not dovetail, whether on the issue of terrorist financing or on that of women's rights.

Critics have been scathing in their appraisal of Clinton's silence concerning Saudi Arabia's treatment of women. For example, Rothna Begum at Human Rights Watch, told us, "Saudi Arabia is incredibly obstructive to women's rights in their own kingdom, and that resonates around the world. The U.S. is a key ally of Saudi Arabia and that means the administration has said very little about its human rights record including women's rights." During the 2011 Arab Spring uprisings, Begum says there was "a real double standard," as the United States was "very critical of the human rights records of some countries, but remained singularly silent about Saudi Arabia and its crackdown on human rights and its mistreatment of women." The activist group Saudi Women for Driving was also unhappy with Clinton's lack of public support for their cause, declaring in a 2011 statement: "For the United States' top diplomat to make no public statement about such developments sends exactly the wrong message to the Saudi government and, more importantly, to the women of Saudi Arabia."

One possible interpretation of Clinton's loud silence is that the Hillary Doctrine is in fact merely a rhetorical stance on the part of U.S. foreign policy makers, including, apparently, Clinton herself—a position that may be jettisoned if its tenets would undermine "real" American national interests in any particular case. Asked about the seeming incongruity in the Saudi case in 2011, Clinton attempted to explain her position in greater detail: "We will continue in private and in public to urge all governments to address issues of discrimination and to ensure that women have the equal opportunity to fulfill their own God-given potential. But I want to, again, underscore and emphasize that this is not about the United States. It's not about what any of us on the outside say. It is about the women themselves and their right to raise their concerns with their own government."

The idea that Hillary Clinton simply doesn't sincerely believe in her own doctrine just doesn't tally with her rhetorical and substantive support for women and women's rights across decades of public service. After all, this is the secretary of state who elevated the Office of Global Women's Issues to the seventh floor of the State Department with a special "ambassador at large," who mandated gender training for all new foreign-service officers and under whom USAID programming for women mushroomed. This is the secretary of state who traveled the world advocating for the use of cookstoves to improve women's health and oversaw the creation of the U.S. National Action Plan on Women, Peace and Security. There's very little, if any, personal political payoff for Clinton from these far-flung and outward-reaching initiatives; indeed, she was criticized for her attention to what some considered a "small-bore" issue.

Perhaps Clinton believes that pressing foreign leaders on their treatment of women should be left to private conversations undertaken at the highest level of diplomacy—to which the U.S. public is not privy. Perhaps she believes the Saudi monarchy is making steady progress for women—advances that would be imperiled by causing the House of Saud to lose face by through public chastisement. Before his death earlier this year, Saudi King Abdullah bin Abdulaziz Al Saud was seen by some as a "reformer" (though it is unclear whether the new king, Salman, will follow in his elder brother's footsteps; some Saudi women fear the best they can hope for is no erosion of what Abdullah gave to them when he was alive).

It is surely a delicate balancing act for a figure like Clinton to encourage women activists while simultaneously offering a hand up—versus a slap down—for regimes that are progressing on women's rights but whose pace of progress is very slow due to concerns over internal stability. As Rania Ibrahim, dean of students at the all-female Effat University in Saudi Arabia, told the Chronicle of Higher Education, "Upsetting the norms the community is used to—it's a recipe for failure." It's probably also a formula for increasing agitation among anti-regime foes—enemies that have shown themselves even less favorably disposed to women than the monarchy.

Clinton might also calculate that regimes respond best to internal rather than external pressure, and there is a serious risk that high-profile foreign support for local groups will endanger the lives of activists. In a 2013 interview with us, former head of the Office of Global Women's Issues Melanne Verveer noted, "There's a whole history of U.S.-supported groups being thrown out, controversies being created, etc. And I said, 'We don't want to—in our effort to support you—to cause you greater problems,' and that's when we discussed things like using multilateral organizations under the aegis of the U.N., for example, to bring support targeted to women [in] ways that wouldn't come back and provide those who were impeding their progress [with] additional ammunition."

There is one more interpretation of Clinton's silence that must also be considered: Perhaps Clinton wants the Saudi monarchy to fall. After all, from what research tells us about the link between the treatment of women and the fate of nations, the Saudis will never know peace or stability. Perhaps they deserve, as do all nations, to reap what they have sown regarding women.

It must be noted, though, that such a view ignores the consequences for women: Given the widespread nature of the Wahhabi belief system within the country, the fall of the Saudi monarchy would absolutely not result in an improved situation for women. On the contrary, what little gains Saudi women have made most certainly would be lost, as evidenced by the trajectory of the Islamic State-controlled Sunni "caliphate," and indeed, the Arab world more generally. Far from hearkening in a brave new era of human rights, dignity and greater enfranchisement, the uprisings of more than three years ago have yielded not a single Arab country that has become a better place for women (though we are crossing our fingers for Tunisia).

Indeed, women in many of these "newly democratized" nations—most notably Iraq—might with ample justification yearn for a return to the autocracies of yore, so stunning has been the regress for women. While long-term autocratic rule might have no impact on the subordinate status of women (think Equatorial Guinea), in other cases, such autocrats prove to be the only force powerful enough to improve the status of women. Saudi Arabia "is on a trajectory of modernization," James Smith, a former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia, told Foreign Affairs last year, pointing to "an emerging critical mass of daughters—on campuses and in jobs—who will make a difference." Perhaps the Saudis should be given time, then, for Smith also noted, "The king issues decrees only when he can count on the agreement of two-thirds of the population."

Ryan Crocker, former U.S. ambassador to numerous Middle Eastern countries, is more skeptical. "We're not going to change [the Saudis]," he told us in an interview. "Besides, who would be their successors? 'You don't like us? Well, après moi, le deluge.' And we are seeing how right that is [in Syria, Egypt, etc.]." Can it be believed that those who have the will and are gaining the capability to overthrow the House of Saud would appoint women to the highest Shura? Or build the largest, best-funded women's university in the world? Or allow schoolgirls to play sports? These are questions worth pondering.

But before jumping on the autocracy-is-better-for-women bandwagon, those who seek to implement the Hillary Doctrine must contemplate one last troubling fact. Long-term autocracy is fertile ground for the growth of highly toxic, male-bonded nationalist opposition groups that would imperil every advance granted to women by the autocrat—as witnessed by the new Islamic State "caliphate." Indeed, such groups would explicitly target precisely those advances as their first order of business when in power. The Saudis have played midwife to the birth of groups that will one day prove to be their destruction—and these same groups will almost certainly bond over an intensified subjugation of women. Remember, for all its comparative progressivism vis-à-vis the clerics, it was the Saudi royal family that embraced the misogynistic Wahhabi viper in the first place.

The case of Saudi Arabia, then, provides an important lesson about the tradeoffs involved with public advocacy of women's rights in the international arena—for Hillary Clinton, her successors at State and whomever the next president is. Too much public advocacy breeds defensiveness and even backlash among those one is trying to influence; too little public advocacy—too much silence—suggests to the world that these issues are not important after all and leads to despair among those one is trying to empower.

Clinton is silent apparently because she does not want the Saudi kingdom to stall or reverse ongoing, if slow-moving, progress for Saudi women. That in many ways is a justified stance, especially since the royals' fall would be a catastrophe for Saudi women. At the same time, the Saudis not only export terror; they also are spreading the message of misogyny wherever their money and influence go. Indonesia, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Syria—Saudi preaching of misogyny is making the lives of women across the Sunni world much harder. Effectively implementing the Hillary Doctrine, then, involves morally fraught decisions and unavoidable paradoxes. In the case of Saudi women, Clinton has chosen a course that appears to be penny-foolish, but is surely pound-wise. The problem is that Saudi women are not the only women affected by this choice. If the Clinton Foundation accepts Saudi donations, let's hope they are used to offset that collateral damage.

Hillary Clinton Has Turned Tweets Into News Events (National Journal)

By Matt Berman

March 17, 2015

National Journal

For most people, a couple of tweets knocking political opponents would not be news. But Clinton isn't most people, or most politicians even. And as she continues to map out a presidential campaign while rarely dipping into daily political or policy debates—or speaking with the media outside of last week's conference—her Twitter account has become a potent tool. The (presumably) carefully tailored, deliberate, short blasts have taken the place of news releases, and have been used for everything from spreading information about her personal initiatives to responding to controversy.

Judging by Twitter's metrics, the strategy is working. As The Washington Post recently reported, Clinton's account has far and away the most reach of likely 2016 presidential contenders. Between Jan. 25 and Feb. 21 of this year, the Post found, Clinton averaged 14,099 retweets per tweet. She had sent only three tweets in that time. Compare that to another potential presidential candidate, Ted Cruz, the owner of the second-best retweet per tweet average. The Texas senator sent out 52 tweets over that time period, averaging 260 retweets per tweet.

But the power of Twitter to spread a campaign platform only goes so far, and Clinton's Monday afternoon tweets coincided with some potentially troubling numbers. A new CNN/ORC poll found that while just 27 percent of Democrats think Clinton did something wrong by exclusively using personal email while at State, 53 percent of self-identifying independents feel that she did. Similar numbers in each group feel that Clinton has not yet done enough to explain her email decision. The poll, conducted from March 13 to March 15 with a margin of error of 3 percent, also found that Clinton's favorability has dropped by 6 percent since last November, with 44 percent of American adults now viewing her unfavorably, and 53 percent favorably.

Sticking to Twitter to dish out your message has clear benefits, and Clinton and her team have been uniquely able to make that work. But the time is almost definitely coming when Clinton will have to communicate to the public through more than the occasional tweet or quick, on-message speech. Soon, finally, we can stop trying to divine some kind of ultimate meaning from 140 characters.

Hillary Clinton and Benjamin Netanyahu: It's 'complicated' (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
March 17, 2015
MSNBC

Israel's election Tuesday could have an outsize impact on U.S. politics, but for Hillary Clinton, it's difficult to know what outcome she might prefer.

The former secretary of state is close to announcing a second presidential run, which, if successful, would mean she'll have to work closely with whomever is prime minister come 2017.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu declared victory late Tuesday, but he still must form a coalition in order to continue leading the country. Clinton has known Netanyahu for years, through rises and falls in both of their careers, and negotiated high-stakes deals with him recently as secretary of state.

But while she speaks highly of him, it's not in the warmest of tones. "I've known Bibi a long time and I have a very good relationship with him, in part because we can yell at each other, and we do," she told CNN last year, using to a nickname for the prime minister. "And I was often the designated yeller."

In her 2014 memoir "Hard Choices," in which Clinton tends to portray others in the most flattering light possible, her description of Netanyahu as a "complicated figure" is decidedly more muted.

She had, by contrast a "close friendship" with Yitzhak Rabin, the former Israeli prime minister who was assassinated by a radical right-wing Israeli during Bill Clinton's first term in the White House.

After a short stint by Rabin's successor, Shimon Peres, Netanyahu took over the prime ministership in 1996 and served for most of the remainder of Clinton's term. Netanyahu "believes [he] lost him the prime ministership" in 1999, as Hillary Clinton said last year in an interview, because he signed a peace deal struck with Bill Clinton that included giving land to the Palestinians.

In 1998, Netanyahu and his wife took the Clintons to visit the Masada, a mountainous fort and one of the country's major landmarks, just days before Clinton would be impeached back in Washington.

More recently, Israel's 2009 election was one of Clinton's first tests as secretary of state. The Kadima Party and it's leader, Tzipi Livni, actually won more seats, but failed to form a government, and Netanyahu was able to retake his old job.

In her book, Clinton wrote that she called Livni to suggest she join a coalition government with Netanyahu's Likud party, which Clinton thought might have a better chance of striking a peace deal with the Palestinians than a government by Netanyahu. But Livni declined to share power with Netanyahu.

This year, longtime Clinton message guru Paul Begala went to Israel to help Netanyahu's rival, and several strategists who worked for Barack Obama and could potentially join a Clinton campaign – led by field organizer Jeremy Bird – are working with a nonprofit that opposes Netanyahu. Clinton's longtime pollster, Stan Greenberg, has worked for the opposition Labor Party in the past as well.

Netanyahu has grown increasingly conservative in the lead-up to Tuesday's tight election, saying this week that there will be no Palestinian state if he wins.

In a field in Iowa last summer, Bill Clinton gave perhaps his most candid thoughts on Netanyahu when a C-SPAN microphone caught him agreeing that Netanyahu is "not the guy" to bring peace to the region.

An American neoconservative group backing Netanyahu ran a commercial last month attacking Clinton for not speaking out against Democratic lawmakers' plans to boycott Netanyahu's recent speech to Congress. "Does she support the boycotters? Or is she too afraid to stand up to them?" the ad asked.

Clinton did not meet with Netanyahu while he was in town, though they were both in Washington on the same day.

Poll: Hillary Clinton still tops in 2016 (CNN)
By Jennifer Agiesta
March 18, 2015
CNN

Hillary Clinton continues to be a dominant force heading into the 2016 presidential election, according to a new CNN/ORC poll. The former secretary of state maintains a broad lead over the field of potential Democratic challengers she could face in a nomination contest and sizable advantages over the leading contenders from the Republican side in general election match-ups.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush tops the possible field for the Republican Party's nomination race, followed by Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former neurosurgeon Ben Carson all in a tight cluster.

But none of the top candidates in this field gets within 10 points of Hillary Clinton in a series of hypothetical general election matchups.

Rand Paul comes closest, with 43% saying they'd be more likely to back him while 54% choose Clinton.

The two candidates who currently top the GOP field, Bush and Walker, match up equally against Clinton, with each carrying 40% to her 55%. Huckabee gets 41% to Clinton's 55% and Carson has 40% to Clinton's 56%.

In the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, Clinton holds a nearly 50-point lead over Vice President Joe Biden, her closest competitor in the field, 62% to 15%. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren rounds out the top three on the Democratic side with 10%. No other potential candidate tops 5%.

Should Warren decide not to get into the race, Clinton stands to benefit more than others, gaining 5 points and holding a 67% to 16% advantage over Biden when Warren's backers are re-allocated to their second-choice candidate. Notably, with Warren out of the race, Clinton surges from 67% support to 74% among Democratic women.

And Democrats broadly believe the party's chances to hold the White House in 2016 are strongest with Clinton; 68% say so, while 30% say the party would have a better shot with someone else leading the ticket.

Though Clinton's favorability rating has taken a hit recently, her prospects in 2016 appear largely unchanged compared to polls conducted before news broke about her use of a personal email address and home-based server while serving as secretary of state.

On the Republican side, Bush leads the pack with 16%, Walker follows at 13%, Paul nearly matches him at 12% and Huckabee holds 10% support. Huckabee's backing has dipped significantly since February, from 16% to 10%, while the others near the top have generally held steady. In single digits, Carson holds 9%, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie has 7%, and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio has 7%. The rest of the field lands below 5%, including 2012 candidates Rick Santorum at 1% and Rick Perry at 4%.

Some interesting demographic trends emerge in the GOP numbers: There is something of a gender gap in preferences, with both Walker (17% among men, 9% among women) and Paul (16% among men, 7% among women) doing significantly better with men than women. Younger Republicans are more likely to back Paul than older ones (he has 17% support among Republicans under 50, just 7% among older Republicans).

Bush's backing generally holds steady across demographic divides, but he fares better among self-identified Republicans (22%) than independents who lean toward the party (10%), while Paul outperforms among independents (17% compared with 7% among self-identified Republicans).

Yet many of the GOP's strongest contenders remain largely unknown. Majorities of Americans haven't yet formed opinions about Scott Walker (58%) or Ben Carson (64%), and about half haven't heard of or don't know about Marco Rubio (48%).

Even the best known Republican contender, Jeb Bush, prompts nearly a quarter of Americans to say they're not sure how they feel about him (23%). Republicans themselves have heard a bit more about their party's top potential candidates, but only one merits a majority favorable rating among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents: Mike Huckabee at 57% favorable.

The CNN/ORC International poll was conducted by telephone March 13-15 and included interviews with 1,009 adult Americans. For results among the full sample, the margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points. For results among the 450 Republicans or Republican-leaning independents, or among the 466 Democrats or Democratic-leaning independents, it is 4.5 points.

How to Be Misled by Polls, Hillary Clinton Email Edition (The New York Times)
By Brendan Nyhan
March 18, 2015
The New York Times

Has the controversy over Hillary Clinton's use of a personal email account hurt her in the polls?

You might think so if you read a CNN article published Monday night, which reported that "unfavorable views of Hillary Clinton are on the rise" after disclosure of her use of the email account while serving as secretary of state. (The network's televised coverage of the poll made similar claims.)

This framing suggests that her standing with the public has declined considerably. In fact, the new poll actually seems to be good news for Mrs. Clinton, the Democratic presidential front-runner. CNN found that 53 percent of Americans have a favorable view of her, which is somewhat higher than in other recent polls, including those conducted before the controversy.

CNN's poll seemed to suggest a decline because the network ignored numerous polls conducted by other organizations in the intervening months and instead compared her current standing only with its most recent poll — an outlier from November showing Mrs. Clinton with a 59 percent favorable rating.

This approach is misleading for two reasons. First, CNN gives its own poll too much weight compared with polling averages, creating a perception of decline in Mrs. Clinton's ratings that could be a result of sampling error. (Polling averages are generally more accurate than any individual poll.)

It's even more problematic, however, to compare polls from November and March and attribute any changes that took place over a four-month period to the email controversy. In reality, this comparison cannot distinguish between the effects of the email controversy and the continuing decline in Mrs. Clinton's favorability ratings as she transitions back into what she was before her stint as secretary of state: an intensely polarizing political figure. (Similar problems plague McClatchy's comparison of Mrs. Clinton's standing in trial heats against possible Republican general election opponents with a previous poll in December.)

A broader look at Mrs. Clinton's ratings suggests that, as expected, her ratings have so far changed little even as views of the controversy have quickly polarized. As a matter of pure politics, this controversy is most important not for what it tells us about her standing with the public at large but with two other constituencies: Democratic Party elites, who remain overwhelmingly supportive, and members of the news media, who appear likely to continue their antagonistic relationship with Mrs. Clinton.

A major LGBT group just gave Hillary Clinton her first big endorsement (Fusion)
By Brett LoGiurato
March 18, 2015
Fusion

LGBT is "ready for Hillary."

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's likely presidential campaign has gotten a big boost before it's even official, as a prominent LGBT group on Monday endorsed Clinton for president.

The group, Equality California, said it has determined that even though she has not entered the race, she would be the best candidate for LGBT issues.

"Although she has yet to formally announce her candidacy, we unequivocally believe that she is not only the most qualified candidate, but also the best candidate to advance LGBT rights," said Rick Zbur, the executive director of Equality California. "With this unequivocal support of her presidential bid, Equality California decided to take the unusual step to extend an early endorsement of Sec. Clinton to urge her to enter the presidential race."

Zbur said the group will begin a petition drive encouraging Clinton to run for president. If, as expected, she announces her candidacy, the group will look for ways to work with the campaign to mobilize support. Equality California is the second-largest LGBT organization in the country, boasting more than 800,000 grassroots members.

A Clinton spokesperson didn't respond to a request for comment. But the endorsement is a welcome sign at a time when she is facing fresh controversy ahead of an expected run — and will likely soon attempt to rally the Democratic base around her candidacy.

Clinton has been popular with the LGBT community, mostly because of her work in the State Department. But like many Democrats before her, including President Barack Obama, Clinton has been analyzed as too slowly "evolving" on many LGBT issues, and as putting political considerations above her held beliefs.

Clinton made LGBT issues a priority during her time at the State Department, something Equality California noted in its endorsement. At the United Nations in 2011, she declared that "gay rights are human rights, and human rights are gay rights."

"She's really the strongest candidate on LGBT issues that we've ever had running," said Zbur, who noted her support of both marriage equality and full and comprehensive civil rights for the LGBT community. "That's the foundation. And beyond that, she just has a history of real accomplishment that is unparalleled for almost any candidate running for office."

Some Democrats, however, have wondered why it took Hillary Clinton so long to come around on LGBT rights, pointing to the policies of the administration of her husband, President Bill Clinton, and the fact that she did not officially come out in support of gay marriage until 2013.

As president, Bill Clinton signed "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" — which barred open gays and lesbians from serving in the military — and the Defense of Marriage Act, which prevented the federal government from recognizing gay marriages. She came out in support of gay marriage in 2013, weeks after Bill Clinton wrote an op-ed in The Washington Post urging the Supreme Court to strike down the law he signed as president.

Hillary Clinton became combative when reliving those policies last year in an interview with NPR's Terry Gross. She took umbrage to the suggestion that political expediency was somehow involved in any of her decision making.

"I think that, as I said, just as the president has said, you know, just because you're a politician, doesn't mean you're not a thinking human being," Clinton said.

"And you gather information. You think through positions. You're not 100 percent set — thank goodness — you're constantly reevaluating where you stand. That was true for me. We talked earlier about Iraq, for goodness sakes. So, for me, marriage had always been a matter left to the states."

Asked whether she supported gay marriage while she was the nation's first lady, Clinton said only, "I'm an American. I think we have all evolved."

But Equality California pointed to Clinton's work at the State Department and even as a senator. It provided a two-page fact sheet listing her advocacy for the LGBT community. She co-sponsored the Employment Non-Discrimination Act, the group noted. She voted to add sexual orientation to the list of hate crimes. And she voted twice — in 2004 and 2006 — against a constitutional ban on gay marriage.

Zbur said that it's important to view the first Clinton administration within the context of the political environment at the time. He was working at an environmental law firm, and he said he was the only openly gay member of the firm.

"I think what he did in terms of bringing the LGBT community into his political coalition was really unique and courageous at the time," Zbur said. "I think a lot of what he did and his leadership allowed many of us to begin coming out in the early 90s."

Clinton controversy deja vu; Does Hillary Clinton love to hate the media so much that she can't avoid scandal? (The Washington Post)
By Kathleen Parker
March 18, 2015
The Washington Post

Amid all the verbiage about Hillary Clinton's e-mail, one irrefutable fact emerges: Polls will drive us crazy before the Clintons do.

The latest CNN/ORC poll shows that a majority of Americans (51 percent) think the e-mail controversy is "serious," yet 57 percent would be "proud" to have Clinton as president. So what are we to conclude?

Nothing.

As former Texas governor Rick Perry commented recently: "I was a front-runner. . . . Three of the most glorious hours of my life."

So there's that.

Otherwise, we are left to our own gleanings and the question that is nectar to reporters: What is Hillary hiding, and why did she create this mess?

Another apt quote springs to mind: "Follow me around. I don't care," said the 1988 Democratic presidential front-runner Gary Hart to then-New York Times reporter E.J. Dionne Jr. "I'm serious. If anybody wants to put a tail on me, go ahead."

And then there he was soon thereafter on front pages smiling and resplendent with an attractive Donna Rice sitting sidesaddle on his lap aboard a boat deliciously named "Monkey Business."

This was the beginning of the end of privacy for candidates and the laissez-faire attitude that the media historically had toward public figures' personal lives. For the record, Hart's taunt wasn't really what led to his exposure. The Miami Herald had already been stalking Hart before publication of Dionne's article, but the legendary quotes justified the Herald's foray into sensation and, perhaps, assuaged editors' guilt over going tabloid.

Hart's challenge and immediate political collapse forever changed journalism, an observation appreciated by none more than Bill and Hillary Clinton, who captured the White House just four years later.

The media and politicos suddenly became symbiotic characters in a drama that often centers not on public works but on scandal. Sex adds spice, but secrecy is the plot around which all revolves. The media aren't out to get anyone necessarily, but the best reporters will keep digging until they find gold. The pursuit of truth has never been so scintillating nor so richly rewarded in the currency of green rooms.

Clinton, by using her personal e-mail account for business and then failing to turn over her records to the State Department long after she left office — and shortly after the House Select Committee on Benghazi asked for more e-mails than had been provided previously — may as well have said, "Catch me if you can."

Is Clinton hiding gold on her private server? Is there scandal lurking in those deleted e-mails? Why didn't she simply follow the protocol?

We are forced by her reticence, her avoidance, her skimpy responses — her unforced error — to assume that there must be something she doesn't want the world to know. But what?

The immediate assumption has been that some e-mails deleted as personal must pertain to the attacks on Benghazi. But a more plausible theory advanced by National Journal's Ron Fournier, with the sort of caffeinated certitude that suggests an excellent source, is that she doesn't want people to see favors exchanged for donations to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation.

Even though the foundation largely stopped taking money from foreign governments while Hillary was secretary of state, donations were still accepted from individuals and companies. One was a $2 million pledge from Chinese billionaire-philanthropist Wang Wenliang, a delegate to China's parliament and owner of Rilin Enterprises, a construction conglomerate that has lobbied Congress and the State Department.

We may not see a viral video of Wang using Lincoln's bed as a trampoline should the Clintons reclaim the White House. But there can be little doubt that when individuals and institutions give money to the foundation, their motives aren't strictly altruistic. They're, of course, currying favor with an influential former president and quite possibly a future one.

The rub for anyone who had hoped for more from Hillary-the-Inevitable is that none of this would have happened had she simply used the government-issued phone (or server) for state business and used her personal account for everything else. No scandal, no media scramble, no congressional probes. The foundation and her personal life would have been off-limits. Case closed.

Instead, the media and Hillary are locked once again into a folie à deux (shared madness). It's a familiar template, which, though we pretend to loathe the reiteration, lends its own strange comfort. You almost wonder whether Hillary Clinton, ever the victim, couldn't resist placing herself in troubled waters yet again.

Hating the media — perhaps Clinton's fatal flaw — is the love affair she just can't quit.

Democrats in key states ask: Where is Hillary? (The Washington Post)
By Philip Rucker
March 18, 2015
The Washington Post

In Iowa, Democrats want to see Hillary Rodham Clinton mingling in their neighborhood coffee shops, answering their questions and sharing laughs. In New Hampshire, they expect her on their living-room couches, listening to their tales of struggle. In South Carolina, they're eager to hold hands with her and pray together.

And in each of the early presidential primary and caucus states, Democratic activists are asking the same question: Where is Hillary?

As Clinton slow-walks her way into the 2016 presidential race, many of the Democratic front-runner's most active supporters are concerned that she's not yet doing the kind of face-to-face politicking that is well underway by a cast of a dozen or more likely Republican candidates.

Clinton's absence has stoked unease among her impatient supporters, who also worry about her reputation as someone uncomfortable with the nitty-gritty of retail campaigning.

"They're anxious because so many Republican candidates are coming here, they're flowing in, and it's like a parade on the other side," said New Hampshire state Sen. Lou D'Allesandro, a top Clinton backer in 2008. "Obviously she's going to run. They're hoping she's going to be here so they can actually see her and engage with her and reinvigorate the campaign."

While Election Day in November 2016 feels a long way off for most Americans, the caucuses and primaries begin in just 10 months. Voters in the states that hold them first have grown accustomed to their unique and personal access to the candidates. Democrats are fearful that without any serious primary opponent, Clinton may instead focus her energy on raising money and preparing for the general election.

Clinton's team is trying to reassure supporters by signaling that she will prioritize early-state visits and is committed to personal outreach.

For now, Clinton is not a candidate; she insists publicly that she has not made a decision about whether to run. But ahead of her expected campaign launch in April, Clinton has been on a hiring spree, assembling large political staffs in the four early-voting states — while also coping with controversies over her e-mail practices and over foreign donations to her family's foundation.

People familiar with her plans say she will not make the same errors as in her 2008 campaign, when she came across in Iowa in particular as aloof and presumptuous.

"Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill.

Clinton intends to invest considerable time on the ground in the early states and will give primary voters and caucus participants direct and personal access to her, said the people familiar with her plans, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss campaign strategy. As one of them described it, Clinton wants to show, and not just tell, voters who she is.

"If you've made the case with the American people that you're qualified and ready to be president, then your challenge is simply to give them an opportunity to know you and to develop a fondness to you," said Jerry Crawford, a Clinton friend and ally who chaired her 2008 Iowa campaign. "Our job as a campaign is to stay out of her way and let that contact be very direct between her and the people whose votes she's asking for."

Beyond the primaries

For Clinton, there is a benefit to campaigning hard in early-voting states, even with no primary opponent. Three of the first four states — Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada — are general-election battlegrounds, so any organizing and outreach she does in the early contests there could benefit her when she takes on the Republican nominee.

Clinton's campaign-manager-in-waiting, Robby Mook — who ran Sen. Jeanne Shaheen's 2008 campaign in New Hampshire — has been personally involved in preparing Clinton's early-state strategy. One of Mook's top deputies, Marlon Marshall, is focused on overseeing efforts in the four early states.

Together with Clinton's state campaign directors — Matt Paul in Iowa, Mike Vlacich in New Hampshire, Emmy Ruiz in Nevada and Clay Middleton in South Carolina — they are trying to build a data-driven strategy modeled after President Obama's successful 2008 and 2012 campaigns.

In Iowa, for instance, Paul is building a full-capacity staff of at least 40 people that sources said could grow to more than 100 by the caucuses. The team is likely to include aides overseeing field organizing in all regions of the state as well as communications, scheduling, surrogates, constituencies such as organized labor, event planning, data analytics, digital media and budget operations.

In addition, Ready for Hillary, an outside super PAC, has spent the past year and a half recruiting volunteers and holding house parties and other events to lay a foundation for Clinton's run in early-voting states.

No other Democrat is preparing a campaign on this scale. Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, Sen. Bernard Sanders (Vt.) — an independent who caucuses with Democrats — and former senator James Webb (Va.) have made recent visits to the early states, but none has a robust political operation on the ground. Some organizers are trying to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) to enter the race, but she insists she is not running.

'People want to see you'

Democrats in early states have not been shy about offering Clinton advice.

South Carolina state Rep. Bakari Sellers, a prominent Obama supporter in 2008 who has taken on a leadership role with Ready for Hillary, said Clinton must run "a ground-up operation" in his state.

"People want to see you, people want to touch you, people want you to pray with them," Sellers said. "Those are things that have to be done. She doesn't have to live in South Carolina, but we expect her to run hard in South Carolina and be in position so that little girls can actually run up and say, 'Oh, my God, I met Hillary Clinton.' That is how the excitement builds."

Former senator Tom Harkin of Iowa said in an interview before his January retirement that Clinton couldn't campaign for the caucuses "from a distance," regardless of whether she faces tough opposition.

"What she would need to do is just come out, do her usual thing, get around to some homes, get around Iowa — and she's good at that. She's very, very good at that," Harkin said. He added: "She can't do it from a distance. She'll have to get out here."

Advice to Clinton is similar 1,300 miles to the northeast in New Hampshire.

"We like to consider the New Hampshire primary the biggest job interview that takes place in America," said James M. Demers, who co-chaired Obama's 2008 campaign in the state. "It's very personal, and there is an expectation that all of the candidates go into the living rooms of citizens here, go into coffee shops, have town hall meetings and hear what's on the minds of voters and answer questions directly."

Said D'Allesandro: "You know New Hampshire. We're a bit pompous. … They expect her to come and sit on the couch in their living rooms. They know she can't do it for everybody, but they do expect her to do that."

No Record That Hillary Clinton Signed That She Had No Documents (The New York Times)
By Michael S. Schmidt
March 18, 2015
The New York Times

WASHINGTON — The State Department said Tuesday that it had no record of Hillary Rodham Clinton, or the two secretaries of state before her, signing a form stating that they had no government records in their possession when they left office.

The form, known as a separation statement, requires employees leaving the State Department to attest that they have turned over all documents related to government business. Those who sign the form can be prosecuted under federal law if they have taken documents with them.

Mrs. Clinton has said she exclusively used a personal email account to conduct government business when she was secretary of state. In response to a request from the State Department in August — two years after she left office — she turned over 50,000 pages of emails that she said were government records from her time as secretary.

Starting last week, members of the news media began questioning the State Department about whether Mrs. Clinton had signed the separation statement, suggesting that such a move could land her in legal trouble given that she had retained possession of her emails.

But Jen Psaki, a spokeswoman for the State Department, said Tuesday that the department had "reviewed Secretary Clinton's official personnel file and administrative files and do not have any record of her signing" the separation statement.

"It's not clear that this form is used as part of a standard part of checkout across this whole of government, or even at the State Department," Ms. Psaki said.

The revelations about Mrs. Clinton and her private email account have brought scrutiny to the State Department and its policies regarding public records. The department has said it plans to provide additional details in the coming days about how often the form is signed.

Republicans Raise Pressure Over Hillary Clinton's Emails (The New York Times)

By Alan Rappeport

March 17, 2015

The New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton might be hoping to turn the page on her email controversy, but Republicans are doing their best to keep the story in the spotlight.

The Republican National Committee said on Tuesday that it had filed two Freedom of Information Act requests to the State Department seeking more information about Mrs. Clinton's use of a private email account during her time as secretary of state.

The first request is intended to find out if Mrs. Clinton signed a "separation statement" when she left office. Signing the form is a requirement of State Department employees, who must declare that, when departing, they have turned over documents that are public records. The State Department has not said whether Mrs. Clinton fulfilled that requirement.

The committee is also seeking documents pertaining to the vetting and encryption that were used on Mrs. Clinton's BlackBerry and private server.

"We will exhaust all administrative options and will consider potential legal action if the State Department fails to comply with this request," said Reince Priebus, the committee's chairman.

Meanwhile, House Republicans are also watching the situation closely. Speaker John A. Boehner called for a "neutral third party" to examine Mrs. Clinton's email server and determine which emails were personal and which ones are public records.

"I think this is the fairest way to make sure we have all the documents that belong to the public, and ultimately all the facts," Mr. Boehner said at a news conference on Tuesday.

Hillary Clinton's Email Scandal Will Leave a Scar (U.S. News and World Report)
By Cary Gibson
March 17, 2015
U.S. News and World Report

Hillary Clinton hasn't even formally started her campaign for president, but her candidacy has already been rocked by scandal. If you've watched the news at all lately, the recent dustup over Clinton's use of a personal e-mail account while serving as secretary of state has been hard to miss. The controversy caused the would-be candidate to hold a press conference last week to explain her actions, and pundits everywhere have been talking about the scandal's impact on her potential presidential run.

Despite the initial uproar, though, the scandal itself will likely fade into obscurity. However, that doesn't mean it won't have a lasting impact.

The immediate ramifications of the newest scandal have been playing themselves out. Speculation about the security of her e-mail correspondence and criticism for flaunting transparency rules led to Clinton's mea culpa press conference. Although it's not an ideal series of events, it looks as though the immediate impact will be minimal.

If Clinton had any formidable primary opponents, the damage could have been greater. Although there may be some other contenders for the nomination in the Democratic Party, none appear likely to mount a serious challenge at this point and none have come forward to capitalize on the former secretary of state's gaffe. For the moment, her nomination looks safe.

The scandal did give potential Republican nominee Jeb Bush a talking point, but also created scrutiny about his own use of a private e-mail account while governor of Florida. If there's any real short-term impact at all, it's the potential for the e-mail scandal to overshadow the Clinton campaign's official announcement. But even that will depend on the timing of the announcement, a factor which is largely within the Clinton operation's control. The longer the campaign can delay any official announcement, the more distance from this scandal it'll have.

The e-mail scandal is also unlikely to have a great effect on Clinton's candidacy in the long-term. It's still early in the election cycle, and most candidates have yet to declare. The Republican Party, the likely benefactors of such a scandal, may be distracted by an active primary season. If Clinton becomes her party's nominee, the e-mail scandal will be a distant memory by the time voters start focusing on the general election.

Further, Clinton's advocacy for the release of the e-mails in question is likely to reduce the staying power of the scandal. It's hard for accusations of secrecy to stick when the target is being transparent. The one thing that may cause the scandal to linger is the timing of the release of the e-mails. According to CNN, the State Department says the release of some of the e-mails could take "several months." If the content of the e-mails that are released is in any way inflammatory, the story could reignite when that information is made public.

But while the e-mail scandal itself may become a distant memory, there is some potential for it to leave a lasting scar. It serves as a reminder that any mistake made by the Clintons is magnified, and that after a lifetime in the public eye, there's still no shortage of mistakes to be revealed. That could result in a general wariness about another Clinton presidential run. In one sense, Clinton is a known quantity on the campaign trail – her entire life has been in the public eye, and it's hard to fathom that there's anything else about her that we don't know. But new scandals like this one create a sense of foreboding that maybe there could be more out there. And perhaps that's the real damage.

U.S. Treasury Secretary Jack Lew Dodges Clinton Email Questions (Reuters)

March 17, 2015

Reuters

WASHINGTON — U.S. Treasury Secretary Jack Lew on Tuesday would not say whether he knew that potential White House contender Hillary Clinton had sent him emails from a personal account while she was chief of the State Department.

“I don’t remember giving it a lot of thought at the time,” Lew said at a hearing of the House of Representatives Financial Services Committee, in response to a question from Representative Sean Duffy, a Wisconsin Republican.

Lew, who was a senior official at the State Department in 2009 and 2010, when Clinton was secretary of state, added: “It’s a long time ago.”

Lew said that he and Clinton ordinarily communicated by phone and in personal meetings but did occasionally exchange emails.

Tuesday’s hearing was largely focused on the state of the international financial system.

Clinton’s failure to use a government email address for official business has sparked a storm of criticism even as she lays the groundwork for an expected 2016 presidential bid.

Expanding safety nets to save them; Economic Scene (The New York Times)
By Eduardo Porter
March 18, 2015
The New York Times

Few people played as critical a role in the construction of the American social safety net as Wilbur J. Cohen.

Mr. Cohen was among the founders of Social Security in 1935; a young aide on Franklin D. Roosevelt's Committee on Economic Security. Thirty years later, as an under secretary of health under President Lyndon B. Johnson, he was the chief architect of Medicare and Medicaid.

In 1973, Mr. Cohen sat down to a debate with the economist Milton Friedman, hero to the free-marketeers of the Chicago School of economics. Mr. Friedman wanted to privatize Social Security, and criticized the program for being regressive. The poor, he noted, paid taxes to cover their benefits. In fact, they worked longer and collected fewer benefits than the rich.

"You are right," conceded Mr. Cohen, the champion of the New Deal. "However, a program for poor people will be a poor program."

Here's what he meant: Only universal programs that served all Americans could achieve the broad political support needed to become embedded in society. Programs for the poor would be stigmatized as charity, underfunded and left to wither.

Looking back, Mr. Cohen's analysis looks spot on. Social Security and Medicare remain the most politically robust parts of the United States' social insurance apparatus — survivors of repeated attempts at privatization. Most everything else, from food stamps to child subsidies for the poor, is vulnerable.

Even Professor Friedman declared himself swayed by the argument. "Look at what has happened to public housing: It's a program designed for poor people — it's a poor program," he said in an interview years later. "Look at what happened to Aid to Families with Dependent Children: It was a program designed for poor people — it was a poor program."

Consider it this way. Bill Clinton, a Democratic president, gave us welfare reform — cutting the main program of assistance to the poor. After his Republican successor, George W. Bush, failed to privatize Social Security, he expanded prescription drug coverage to Medicare instead.

And yet today Mr. Cohen's maxim seems to have been relegated to the trash can of history. At best an irrelevant proposition. At worst an unfair one.

From the expansion of the food stamp program to the promise of universal preschool and free community college for all, every one of the Obama administration's initiatives have been carefully targeted at the needy. The Affordable Care Act, perhaps the largest expansion of the safety net since Medicaid, was tailored to benefit the near poor.

To finance some of the programs, the administration has turned to the rich. One of President Obama's biggest political victories was to raise the capital gains tax and increase the top tax rate on families earning more than $400,000.

And it's not just President Obama. "President Clinton did the same thing when he raised taxes in 1993," said Alan J. Auerbach, an expert on tax policy at the University of California, Berkeley. "The focus is to provide benefits for the poor and shift the burden to pay for them on the rich."

Perhaps this strategy suits the times. Universal programs are expensive and difficult to push through the objections of the Republican Party. It will get tougher as an aging population puts increasing strains on Social Security and Medicare, squeezing other priorities out of the budget.

There are appearances, too: Universal programs funded by broader taxes could appear fundamentally unfair in an era of rampant income inequality separating the very rich from the rest.

But the alternative also poses risks. Carefully targeted social insurance funded by progressive taxes is likely to be both stingy and politically weak. And even if some programs like the earned income tax credit can be hidden from view, as tax deductions rather than benefits, there is a point when such subterfuge may no longer work.

The Swedish sociologists Walter Korpi and Joakim Palme discussed it in their classic "The Paradox of Redistribution and Strategies of Equality."

"We can expect a trade-off between the degree of low-income targeting and the size of the redistributive budget," they wrote. "The greater the degree of low-income targeting, the smaller the redistributive budget."

Unsurprisingly, the United States has one of the most threadbare social insurance nets in the industrialized world. The question is, as we age and put more demands on Social Security and Medicare, will our dependence on narrowly focused, narrowly funded programs unravel what social insurance we have left?

In an essay published this year, Lane Kenworthy, a professor of sociology at the University of California, San Diego, evaluated the evidence across the world's industrialized nations as to whether universal programs were more effective at redistribution than targeted interventions.

As globalization put pressure on social policy across the world, he found, redistribution did not decline more in countries with targeted social programs than in those with universal systems of social insurance.

He points to research by Robert Greenstein, president of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, which found that despite their supposed political weakness, targeted social welfare programs survived rather well through the Reagan administration.

Notably, whereas governments that offered universal public benefits did a better job at reducing income inequality in the 1980s and 1990s, by the 2000s the relationship had disappeared.

Still, Professor Kenworthy remains sympathetic to Mr. Cohen's maxim. "I still believe the fundamental logic of the argument that universalism has advantages," he told me.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, the undeclared Democratic front-runner in the American presidential campaign, is apparently being pulled in opposing directions by a populist faction advocating aggressive redistribution and a more moderate wing arguing the merits of tackling inequity through education.

This is not the only way to frame Ms. Clinton's choices. The most critical goal of the next American government may be simply protecting the social insurance we have left.

In his new book, "We Are Better Than This," Edward D. Kleinbard, a law professor at the University of Southern California, suggests we might build a better, more effective government by raising top tax rates to where they were in the Clinton era and paring some personal tax deductions that benefit the better-off.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politically, that would be momentous. And yet it would only raise federal tax revenues from roughly 20 to 22 percent of gross domestic product — still the smallest among advanced nations.

The incontrovertible fact, as research by Mr. Kenworthy and others has found, is that social insurance in the United States does a worse job at closing the income gap than in any of its peers across the industrial world. The way things are going, it could become worse.

As demands on Social Security and Medicare grow over time, there will be enormous pressure to cut benefits, mostly at the top. If Mr. Cohen was right, this will drain political support from the only universal programs we have left. They may become poor programs too.

The great irony, Professor Auerbach notes, is that "inequality is increasing yet our ability to do anything about it is weakening." The main job for any Democratic president might not be to bolster the nation's social insurance apparatus but simply to hold the line.

Hillary Clinton Balked at Two Devices? Try Toting Four, Five, Six... (The Wall Street Journal)
By Elizabeth Williamson
March 17, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

When former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton last week said she conducted business on a single personal email account because it was "easier to carry just one device for my work and for my personal emails, " Richard Spencer was in Islamabad, wearing a backpack over his suit that contained two iPhones, an iPad Mini, and "a clever little black thing that gives you a mobile Wi-Fi hot spot." Also, his toothbrush.

"I'm scrupulous with keeping my work and personal emails separate," says Mr. Spencer, lead energy specialist for the World Bank, who lists six contact numbers at the bottom of every email. "But my backpack is jolly heavy."

Washington's political establishment is in a froth over the potential presidential candidate's reluctance to maintain two email accounts as Secretary of State, and what that says about her commitment to transparency. For legions of global device schleppers, toting just two devices would be a load off.

In the U.S., members of Congress use multiple phones to separate work, personal and campaign email accounts. In the rest of the world, where networks don't work or don't extend across borders, where officials use different phones for different countries or different people, or where governments sometimes listen in, officials routinely shoulder a cacophony of telephony.

In China, most officials use one phone for business, and others for "family, friends, lovers," says Fan He, a senior economist at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, who has an iPhone, BlackBerry, iPad, MacBook and a Chinese-made hand-held called a Huawei Ascend Mate 7, though he doesn't use them all at one time. Government officials in China "are quite addicted to their mobiles," Mr. He says. Nonetheless, he adds, most people who want to reach them must call their assistants.

In February, Mrs. Clinton told the tech news website Re/code that she had a similar inventory of equipment. She owns an iPad, iPad Mini, iPhone and a BlackBerry, she said, because "I don't throw anything away. I'm like, two steps short of a hoarder."

"She faces the same wrenching dilemma that so many others do: the ease of typing on a BlackBerry vs. the style and fun of an iPhone," a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton said, adding, "So far the BlackBerry is winning." He didn't comment further on the email issue.

Jim Lewis, a former State Department arms control negotiator, traveled the world's trouble spots carrying a smartphone, iPad, iPod and a wireless router. When in China, he carried a phone that wasn't linked to his U.S. devices as a safeguard against government snooping (he says a colleague visiting Beijing discovered his phone had been probed seven times as he walked from the door of the airplane to the tarmac).

One night, unpacking his suitcase in yet another hotel room, Mr. Lewis hit the wall as he realized that "all this electronic junk I bring with me costs more than my clothes," he said. Now a senior fellow at Washington's Center for Strategic & International Studies, he has unburdened himself. "I've got one phone, I got rid of my laptop and I've got an iPad Mini," he says.

In the Middle East, government and local leaders often use "special purpose phones," Mr. Lewis says: separate devices, numbers and email addresses for work, for personal use, and for people and groups they want to keep separate from the others. The job of carrying all those devices goes to the assistant many Westerners call "the phone guy," an aide-de-camp who trails the entourage, his boss's phones ringing and pinging while hanging from his belt in holsters. "I always thought it was a status thing," Mr. Lewis adds.

In Nigeria, poor network service means "everyone who can afford it has a minimum of two mobile phones from different operators," journalist Sola Odunfa wrote in an essay for the BBC. "Some have as many as four. They use whichever is operational at any given time."

Mohua Mukherjee, another World Bank executive, says when she worked in Nigeria, senior government officials would carry a bag full of phones, and "at a lunch in a fancy restaurant they would take them all out and line them up on the tablecloth in case any of them rings."

Traveling the developing world for the bank, "I have SIM cards from 13 countries," she says, because it is impossible or too expensive for people in many nations that she needs to contact to call across borders.

Ms. Mukherjee, who lives in the U.S., is working temporarily in her native India, the third-largest smartphone market after China and the U.S., where sleek Indian-made devices--the more the better--are sought-after. She travels with an iPhone 6, an Indian-made MOTO E Android phone, a Kindle, laptop and an MP3 player.

But she also carries a 15-year-old Nokia, shaped like a candy bar, its hot pink cover shedding scraps of plastic like fingernail polish. It works on the local network and contains most of the numbers she needs, so she uses it to call Indian contacts, then hands the phone to a cabdriver so the person on the other end can give directions.

"Phones are such a status symbol in India that they don't want to be caught with this clunker," she laughs. "They hold it between their thumb and index finger and then they drop it 6 inches into my palm, take out their fancy phone and look at it lovingly...This happens every time, this silent dialogue between us."

Her battered vintage phone isn't out of character for the 50-year-old Ms. Mukherjee, "who looks like an auntie," in youthful India, she says.

What does look out of place is the rest of her arsenal. In the security line at the Delhi airport one recent day, Ms. Mukherjee, who was dressed traditionally and looked like a local, piled her latest-version phones, the computer, and the music player into a bin too small to accommodate it all. Jaws dropped at the stack of hardware, more typically carried by a Delhi trendsetter half her age. Young people smiled and nudged each other. A man pulled out his smartphone, and took a photograph.

State Dept.: 'No record' of signed document from Hillary Clinton affirming records turned over (The Washington Times)
By Stephen Dinan and David Sherfinski
March 18, 2015
The Washington Times

The State Department said Tuesday that former Secretary Hillary Rodham Clinton never signed the document affirming that she turned in all classified information when she left in 2013, as the legal jeopardy to the Obama administration continued to grow over her treatment of emails.

House Speaker John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican overseeing several congressional investigations into Mrs. Clinton's emails, said an independent third party needs to take control of her email server in order to clear up remaining questions.

Judicial Watch went to court this week to ask for a hearing on whether the State Department broke the law in failing to search Mrs. Clinton's emails for records related to the administration's 2012 Benghazi talking points — part of a pattern that likely has spoiled dozens of open-records requests related to Mrs. Clinton's tenure.

"The way forward is for the secretary to turn over all of her emails that pertain to the public," Mr. Boehner said. "But some neutral third party is going to have to make some decision about what documents are, quote, 'personal' and which ones are public records. And thus far, she's been unwilling to do this."

Mrs. Clinton acknowledged this month that she did not use a State Department-issued email account to conduct her government business, but instead set up a server kept at her house in New York. Nearly two years after she left office, she turned over more than 30,000 emails to the State Department.

She said she believes she complied with the law and that she did not keep some 32,000 other emails she deemed private. She refused to turn over her server to a third party.

The White House, hoping to keep the issue at arm's length, has pushed questions about Mrs. Clinton's behavior to the State Department, which has in turn pushed reporters to ask Mrs. Clinton about her behavior.

After days of prodding, though, State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki confirmed Tuesday that the department does not have any record of Mrs. Clinton's completion of a standard form, OF-109, certifying that she had turned over all classified information in her possession.

Ms. Psaki also said the State Department could not find the OF-109 forms for Mrs. Clinton's two predecessors under President George W. Bush: Colin L. Powell and Condoleezza Rice. Ms. Psaki said signing the form wasn't a legal requirement as much as a best practice.

She signaled that Mrs. Clinton and other secretaries are held to different standards than most other employees.

"There's a difference between also secretaries of state or former secretaries and staff at lower levels," she said.

Congress and the courts are likely to remain interested in Mrs. Clinton's emails for the foreseeable future, even as she finalizes plans to run for the White House.

Mr. Boehner said the special investigative committee looking into the Benghazi attack needs to see related emails, and the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee will continue to look at open-records laws and how they are working.

He said Mrs. Clinton's questionable email behavior would not have been spotted but for the Benghazi investigation. The committee requested communications about the 2012 terrorist attack on a diplomatic compound in Libya and discovered a deficit of emails from Mrs. Clinton — though committee members spotted several messages using an account that was not issued by the government.

The State Department then requested emails from all previous secretaries of state, and Mrs. Clinton turned over hers in December.

She has said she used a nongovernment account because it was more convenient but believed she was following the law because she generally tried to email others at their official accounts, thinking that would ensure the messages were retained as required by law.

Open-records advocates have poked holes her argument, saying requests seeking communications from Mrs. Clinton wouldn't necessarily include searches of lower-level employees' emails.

Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton said his group has 160 open-records requests that could have been at least partially spoiled by Mrs. Clinton's decision to keep her emails private.

He said the State Department for years has responded to requests for documents, including Mrs. Clinton's communications, by saying it has searched everything it has — but never mentioned that Mrs. Clinton's emails were not part of that.

Judicial Watch argued in federal court this week that the State Department has been misleading open-records advocates and federal courts by claiming it was performing searches for documents while knowing those searches didn't include Mrs. Clinton's emails.

"We're upset, and I think the courts ought to be upset, because they're wasting our time, they're wasting the court's time and they're defrauding us," Mr. Fitton said.

In a striking move last week, the State Department agreed with Judicial Watch on a request to reopen an open-records case that involved Mrs. Clinton's communications. Mr. Fitton said that amounted to an admission that the department realized it wasn't performing a valid search for her records.

The House Select Committee on Benghazi is giving Mrs. Clinton more time to comply with a subpoena sent this month for all of Mrs. Clinton's communications related to Libya.

The due date for the subpoena sent March 4 was originally March 13 but has been extended to March 27.

The committee, chaired by Rep. Trey Gowdy, South Carolina Republican, is investigating the circumstances surrounding the Sept. 11, 2012, terrorist attack on a U.S. compound in which four Americans were killed, including U.S. Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens. Mrs. Clinton, the presumed front-runner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, was secretary of state at the time.

"Chairman Gowdy granted a reasonable extension because for him this is not about politics; it is about getting all relevant documents for the committee," said committee spokesman Jamal Ware. "He still believes the best option for Secretary Clinton is to turn over her server to a neutral arbiter to independently determine what should be in the public domain. The committee has no interest in her personal emails."

In explaining her use of a private email system and server while serving in the Obama administration, Mrs. Clinton said March 10 that she turned over more than 30,000 emails she deemed work-related. The State Department is reviewing the emails to decide what can be released to the public.

John Boehner to Hillary Clinton: Turn over server (Politico)

By Lauren French

March 17, 2015

Politico

Speaker John Boehner has joined a growing number of Republicans who are calling on Hillary Clinton to turn over her personal server to an independent arbitrator for investigation.

The Ohio Republican told reporters on Tuesday that the former secretary of state needs to give a "neutral third party" access to the server housed in her New York residence so Congress can gain access to a trove of emails from her tenure at the State Department.

"[I]t's very important for Secretary Clinton to turn over her personal servers to a neutral third party," Boehner said. "That's the fairest way to make sure that we have all the documents that belong to the public and, ultimately, all the facts."

Clinton has come under scrutiny since it was revealed that she used a personal email account while at the State Department and stored her communications on a server outside of the State Department. She has turned over the documents to State and asked it to make her official emails public.

But during a news conference last week, Clinton said she deleted thousands of personal emails before turning her communications over — an admission that has prompted Republicans to question if they will gain access to all the professional emails from her tenure at State.
Both the Oversight and Government Reform and Benghazi committees have said they will seek out those emails. The head of the Benghazi Committee, Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), has already issued a subpoena for the documents. Clinton has until March 27 to comply.

Boehner said the Benghazi probe will continue investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks and the Oversight panel, led by Rep. Jason Chaffetz (R-Utah), will investigate the server and Clinton's use of emails.

"The Benghazi Committee is the committee that found this personal email usage. The Benghazi Committee is focused on getting the facts on what happened with regard to Benghazi. The Government Reform Committee worked on the Federal Open Records Act and they will continue their work on that," Boehner said. "There is nothing, no changes that have been made about how we're approaching dealing with these documents."

Leon Panetta's advice to Hillary Clinton: Get on with it (Dallas-Morning News)

By Mike Drago

March 17, 2015

Dalllas-Morning News

Part of our editorial board had 30 minutes on the phone today with former CIA Director Leon Panetta. He's headed to Dallas-Fort Worth this week for a pair of World Affairs Council appearances. (Get info on tickets here.)

Say what you want about Panetta's politics, but you have to admit he's a straight shooter with the relevant experience that makes him worth listening to. His memoir, released last fall, took some serious shots at his former boss, Barack Obama, and the president's foreign policy.

Panetta (also former defense secretary, Clinton White House chief of staff, director of OMB and California congressman) has worked in proximity to many of the most interesting political and geopolitical stories of the past 20 years, so there's plenty to ask him about.

With us, he assessed Washington gridlock and dysfunction ("In 50 years, I've never seen it as partisan and divided"), Republicans' letter to Iran ("What are we ultimately doing to this country?") and what keeps him up at night ("metastacized" terrorism and the threat of cyber-terrorism).

Then there was his analysis of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's latest flap — over her use of personal email accounts to manage government business.

Look for full Q&A excerpts in Wednesday's paper, but in short Panetta says can't exactly relate because he always made it a practice not to use email at all. He prefers phone calls, apparently: "a better way to do business."

As for Clinton's presidential aspirations, Panetta says she needs to get on with it. Otherwise, issues like emailgate are going to continue to divert the conversation:

"The longer it takes her to get into the discussion about what kind of future she wants for America, the more these bits and pieces that, obviously, reporters are going to grab onto, the more that's going to dominate the news."

Hear his full answer to the Clinton question at the link below, and check Wednesday's paper for the full report.

Hold the alarmism on Hillary (Al Jazeera America)
By Jill Lawrence
March 18, 2015
Al Jazeera America

Hillary Clinton's graceless march toward a 2016 presidential campaign underscores a great paradox of her political standing at this juncture: She is a powerhouse contender with wide appeal, even as she inspires mistrust, investigations, negative press coverage and jitters among some Democrats.

The split between public opinion and what you might call political-class opinion is striking. Clinton has been the country's most admired woman for 19 of the last 22 years — a run interrupted only by Mother Teresa in 1995 and 1996 and Laura Bush in 2001. A Gallup poll in early March showed that 89 percent of Americans know enough about Clinton to have an opinion of her, and half of them viewed her favorably, compared with 39 percent who didn't. An even more recent CNN poll, conducted after her strained press conference about her exclusive use of a personal email address when she was secretary of state, has even better news for her: 57 percent said she's someone they would be proud to have as president.

It will be months before the full impact of Clinton's email troubles is apparent. She can expect to be called to testify more than once as congressional Republicans investigate the private email account, the fatal 2012 attacks on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, and other aspects of her tenure. Republicans considering White House races are already using the new material on the campaign trail. But for Democrats trying to remain calm, there are several reasons to hold the alarmism.

Glass houses

For one, the GOP could attack too vigorously and trigger sympathy for Clinton. There's precedent: In November 1998, as the House prepared to impeach Bill Clinton in connection with the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal, Republicans managed to lose House seats in the sixth year of an opposing party's presidency — something that almost never happens. In December 1998, the month the House voted to impeach him, Bill Clinton notched a career-high 73 percent approval rating. He stayed in the enviable 60 percent vicinity for the rest of his presidency. Overreach regarding the Clinton family, in other words, is a known risk.

Furthermore, the email affair may yield less dramatic results than conservatives hope and expect. For now, it's certainly true that Hillary Clinton is taking heat over her private email server, her lack of an official State Department email account and her complete control over which emails she saved and which she deemed personal and appears to have deleted. In part that's because of the high level and delicate nature of her job. But some of the furor is rooted in generalized wariness about the Clintons. The email fiasco is another log on a fire fueled not just by old scandals and pseudo-scandals but also by current conflict-of-interest questions about foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation while and after she was secretary of state.

Yet Clinton is not the only presidential prospect to run afoul of evolving rules and laws on email. When he was the governor of Florida, Jeb Bush had a private server and controlled which emails were archived. The New York Times reported recently that thousands of his emails were not turned over to the state until last year, seven years after he left office. The Washington Post says he used his private account to discuss troop movements and nuclear protection after the 9/11 attacks. Emails and texts were central elements of investigations involving Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie. Florida Sen. Marco Rubio used a private email account to correspond with reporters in 2008 when he was leader of the state House — and then, as The Wall Street Journal reported, deleted them.

Given all the glass-house implications, Eric Boehlert, a writer for the liberal watchdog group Media Matters for America, predicted that "zero" GOP hopefuls would be talking about email on the campaign trail. Howard Kurtz, a Fox News media analyst, wondered meanwhile about the relevance of the furor, asking on Twitter, "Has the Hillary email controversy become an important story or just a media obsession?"

Republican vulnerability

The other aspect of the landscape that could work in Clinton's favor is the relative lack of name recognition among the Republican hopefuls. Five of the 11 — Rubio, Walker, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and neurosurgeon Ben Carson — were familiar to fewer than half those polled. The best known were Bush and Christie, who polled in the 60s, followed by former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Sens. Rand Paul of Kentucky and Ted Cruz of Texas, all in the 50s.

The relative unfamiliarity of the prospective candidates, even those with the highest profiles, means they have room to grow more popular, but they also have the potential to turn some people off as they become better known. The rockiest part of the process has already started: a primary campaign season that will yield a valuable nomination. With no incumbent in the race and victory a real possibility after two terms of a Democratic president, expect to see a large, combative field trying mightily to impress a conservative electorate.

The results weren't pretty in 2012, when Republicans viewed President Barack Obama as vulnerable and the race as winnable. Eventual nominee Mitt Romney made right turns on issues such as gay rights, gun control and abortion, earning him a reputation as a flip-flopper. He sharpened his rhetoric on immigration and distanced himself from the Massachusetts health law he signed that became the template for "Obamacare." He also came under withering fire from fellow Republican Newt Gingrich and his allies, whose attacks on his business career foreshadowed those mounted later by Democrats.

Several 2016 prospects have already changed course and adopted more conservative positions in preparation for the primary electorate: Rubio and Walker on immigration, Jindal on the Common Core education standards and Paul on aid to Israel. The shifts may help these politicians navigate the primaries but are likely to increase their vulnerability later in the game.

Bush is the best-known among the GOP prospects, with 68 percent saying they are familiar with him. Of those, 35 percent viewed him favorably, 33 percent unfavorably. There are myriad reasons to wonder if he'll win the nomination, starting with his decision to continue his longtime support for Common Core and immigration reform that includes legal status for undocumented immigrants. Then there's his name and his age, 62. Walker is already drawing a contrast by talking about his humble roots as the small-town son of a pastor and his party's need to move beyond the past.

The race to come

If Bush and Clinton win their respective parties' nominations, that would immediately level the field on the past-versus-future argument, the dynasty issue and — to some extent — the pesky email question. Both would carry baggage, and neither would represent a fresh start.

Clinton's fate will rest in part on her campaign skills and platform — and to a degree on how many women feel strongly about electing a woman. The race will also turn on who is nominated to run against Clinton and what shape that person is in after what looks poised to be a brutal primary season. Clinton's rough start has, understandably, tempted some Democrats to break out the smelling salts. But with so many uncertainties ahead, it is far too soon for them to panic.

Why Joe Biden can't get no respect (Vox)

By Ezra Klein

March 17, 2015

Vox

On Monday, I made the case that Al Gore should run for president. But there's another obvious contender out there, too: Joe Biden.

Over at Yahoo, Matt Bai makes the case for Biden. "Biden," he writes, "is a better candidate than most pundits have ever given him credit for. Yeah, he's sloppy and meandering and says some nutty stuff. But that's all part of being genuine and three-dimensional, which may be the most valuable trait in modern politics and not a bad contrast to Clinton's robotic discipline."

And Biden's certainly got the resume. When President Barack Obama wanted to make sure stimulus money didn't disappear to fraud, he turned to Biden — "nobody messes with Joe," he said — and Biden succeeded. When the White House wanted to avoid the fiscal cliff, it was Biden who closed the deal with Minority Leader Mitch McConnell. When Obama flubbed the first debate against Mitt Romney, it was Biden who restored the ticket's mojo by bullying his way past Rep. Paul Ryan. When the Democrats held their 2012 convention, it was Biden's speech that pulled the highest ratings — beating both Bill Clinton and Obama.

Biden's most off-the-reservation moment, meanwhile, is the kind of thing that should help him in 2016. He pushed the Obama administration to embrace gay marriage before it was quite ready. At the time, it looked like a gaffe. Now it looks prescient.

And yet, according to a recent Marist poll, Biden is running 47 points behind Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination in 2016 — and only one point ahead of Sen. Elizabeth Warren. A quick scan of RealClearPolitics' round-up of Democratic primary polls shows that's no outlier.

It's not like Biden has been out of the public eye for the last seven years. So why, if he's such a good politician, doesn't he command more support in the Democratic Party?

Here's my guess: there's a cultural gap between Biden and the party he seeks to represent. Biden is an old-school, white, male politician in a party that's increasingly young, multicultural, and female. Biden's gaffes matter because they tend to reinforce the perception among Democrats that he belongs to a different era.

When Biden calls shady lenders "Shylocks," or says Obama is "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," he ends up coming off as, in New York Magazine words, "your accidentally racist grandma." That leaves Biden facing something more toxic than opposition: condescension.

What I wrote of Biden in January 2013 is still true today, I think. "In the continuing drama that is the Obama presidency, Biden often appears as comic relief. He's the zany neighbor, the adorable uncle. As a result, his presidential ambitions, which burn brightly even today, have mostly been laughed off. Somehow, the sitting vice president of the United States, the former chairman of both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate Judiciary Committee, a man who's on a nickname basis with many of the world's most powerful leaders, is seen in many quarters as lacking the gravitas to be president."

There is much that's weird about this. Hillary Clinton is a powerful candidate, but there's nothing about the last few months that makes her look invulnerable. She's shown real rust in interviews, pissed off liberals, and found herself in an email scandal.

But while Biden isn't much older than Clinton, she's somehow been more adept at signaling cultural affinity with young Democrats than he's been (though she's occasionally struggled too, most notably in her interview with Terry Gross on gay marriage). She also has a connection to female voters he can't touch. Even her memes are better.

I don't know exactly how Biden fixes this or even if he can. Clinton isn't inevitable, and Biden should, by all rights, pose a real threat to her. But, though Biden's always been known as a great speaker, he needs to learn to talk to a different party than the one he grew up in.

Will Hillary Clinton Invade GOP Primary? (Bloomberg)
By Francis Wilkinson
March 17, 2015
Bloomberg

Hillary Clinton won't have a truly competitive Democratic primary for president. So in her spare time, she might instead opt to meddle in the high-stakes Republican primary.

As the Republican contest takes shape over the coming months, candidates will stockpile money and negative research to unload on their rivals. It promises to be a fierce, internecine battle. At some point, someone in the sprawling Clinton world, or perhaps a wealthy liberal listening to an independent political consultant eager to play a role in the big game, will feel the pull of temptation. If Jeb Bush -- or Scott Walker -- is gaining momentum, why not slow him down, or even try to take him down, before he gets too close to the finish line?

The super-PAC era is perfectly designed for intervention in an opposing party's primary. A generically-named political committee funded by anonymous donors could begin running ads in Iowa and other early states, making a case, for example, that Bush can't be trusted by conservatives. Or that Walker tells voters whatever they want to hear. The Clinton gang will be able to assert in unison -- possibly even in truth -- that it has nothing to do with such ads.

Such meddling has worked on the state level. For example, in the 2002 California gubernatorial race, the state's unpopular Democratic Governor Gray Davis poured millions into attacking the front-runner in the Republican primary, Los Angeles Mayor Richard Riordan, who had a huge lead. Davis preferred to face the much more conservative Republican candidate, Bill Simon.

As the Christian Science Monitor reported before the primary:

The strategy is working, pollsters say, because Davis's ploy to pick off Riordan early, in the latter candidate's own primary, hinges on the fact that the state's Republican primary voting bloc has long been far more conservative than the broader Republican electorate that turns out in the general election.

In the end, Riordan lost the primary and Davis beat Simon in the general. (I was a partner at a consulting firm advising Davis.) The Democrat was eventually recalled and replaced by Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Bush is a more disciplined and formidable candidate than Riordan. But the parallels are obvious, and given a campaign finance regime that now blesses unrestricted anonymous donations, it can be harder to trace attacks to their source.

Many conservative voters will have trouble embracing Bush's views on immigration and more. His Republican rivals will be eager to educate such voters about Bush's apostasy. But their resources are not infinite.

Democrats, meanwhile, probably won't be spending a whole lot of money on their presidential primary. There is nothing to prevent them from funding a primary attack on Bush to highlight what some conservatives deem a dire paucity of conservatism.

Intervening in an opposing party's primary can be a dicey proposition. When Democrats intervened in a 2009 Republican primary in New Jersey to try to save another unpopular incumbent, Governor Jon Corzine, the effort failed. Given the enormous attention the news media lavishes on presidential campaigns, even identifying a target for attack could backfire. "Anybody with a checkbook can run a tactic like that," said Democratic media consultant Doc Sweitzer, via e-mail. But if it signals to the Republican base that Democrats especially fear a particular candidate, "It could do more harm than good. The first rule of an independent expenditure is do no harm."

Of course, if a Democratic attack on Bush for being insufficiently conservative fails, it will probably only strengthen his candidacy. His relative moderation, a weakness in the Republican primary, becomes a strength in the general election.

Yet Republican Party donors will almost certainly fund attack ads on Clinton in swing states before primary votes are cast. Democrats, eager to respond, will have itchy trigger fingers. Several Democratic consultants acknowledged to me that the temptation to intervene, either in hopes of shaping the Republican outcome or merely damaging the likely Republican nominee, will be difficult -- if not impossible -- to resist.

Clinton criticizes House GOP budget plan (Associated Press)
By Ken Thomas
March 17, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Hillary Rodham Clinton is taking on a tried and true foil — House Republicans — as she prepares for a likely 2016 Democratic presidential campaign.

Clinton blasted a budget proposal released by Republicans on Tuesday, saying on Twitter it "fails Americans" on investments in jobs and economic growth, would cut college aid for students and undermine President Barack Obama's health care law. It was the second straight day that the former secretary of state turned to social media to criticize Congress, a tactic used extensively by President Barack Obama during his 2012 re-election campaign.

"Budgets reflect our priorities. They should help families get ahead, educate our kids, and spark small business growth," Clinton said on Twitter. She said the "nation's future — jobs & economic growth — depends on investments made today. The GOP budget fails Americans on these principles."

Clinton's Twitter response came hours after Republicans released a $3.8 trillion budget plan in the House that would overhaul the tax code and aims to balance the budget in a decade in tandem with deep cuts in social programs and the repeal of Obama's health care law. The White House said the proposal failed to make investments in education, infrastructure and national defense, setting up a likely budget clash in the months before the next presidential campaign.

Clinton faulted the budget proposal's outlook for education, saying cuts to Pell Grants "hold our kids back." She also warned against another attempt to repeal the health care law, saying it would "let insurers write their own rules again, and wipe out coverage for 16 million Americans."

Clinton, who has faced criticism in recent weeks over revelations that she used a private email account at the State Department, has sought to present herself as an above-the-political-fray figure who would overcome Washington gridlock. But she has also ratcheted up criticism of Republicans in control of both chambers of Congress.

On Monday, she blasted Senate Republicans for holding up confirmation of Loretta Lynch, Obama's choice to be Attorney General, until the Senate completed a human trafficking bill that was complicated by a provision related to funding for abortions. Clinton called it a "Congressional trifecta against women."

Her approach offers parallels to Democrats' attempt to tarnish 2012 GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney with the budget plan that included sharp cuts to social programs developed by Rep. Paul Ryan, who later became Romney's running mate. It comes as Clinton is formulating policies that will form the foundation of her pitch to Americans, chief among them how to boost wages and create more economic opportunities for Americans.

"It's a very central part not just of 2015, but 2016: What are the ideas and investments we're going to make to give Americans more economic opportunity," said Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash.

Gerry Adams and Hillary Clinton in New York (The New Yorker)
By Patrick Radden Keefe
March 17, 2015
The New Yorker

On the eve of St. Patrick's Day, two ascendant politicians—one from Ireland, one from the United States—met in a ballroom at the Essex House, in New York. Hillary Clinton was there to be inducted into the Irish America Hall of Fame, in recognition of her "outstanding leadership" in bringing peace to Northern Ireland during the nineteen-nineties, when her husband was President. Gerry Adams, the president of the Irish Republican political party Sinn Fein, was there because for many Americans he is a living symbol of that peace. One of the architects of the Good Friday Agreement, which brought an end to the decades-long conflict that is known as the Troubles, Adams is very popular in the United States and makes regular trips here to raise funds for his party. (According to a report in the Irish Times, Sinn Fein has raised twelve million dollars in the United States since 1995, from construction companies, labor unions, and movie stars like Angelica Huston and Martin Sheen.)

But as I documented in a report for the magazine last week, Adams remains a polarizing figure in Ireland. Though Adams is a longtime figurehead of the Republican movement, he insists that he was never a member of the I.R.A. and that he played no role in the violence of the Troubles. People in Ireland do not actually believe this story, and, in recent years, some of Adams's former compatriots in the Republican movement have said that he authorized a series of wartime atrocities, including the murder and secret burial of a mother of ten named Jean McConville. Adams has denied these claims, and generally derides those who ask questions about his past as political foes with an agenda or opponents of the peace process. (He and Sinn Fein have not responded to my article.)

"I remember very well when the request came, back in 1993, that my husband approve a visa for Gerry Adams," Clinton told the crowd at the Essex House. Bill Clinton granted the visa, which was a controversial move at the time, because of Adams's alleged association with the I.R.A., but also a crucial moment in the peace process, because it helped cement Adams's transformation from a revolutionary to a statesman. "Absent that first step, that first risk, we might not have had the momentum to move forward, to get to the Good Friday accords and all that has followed," Clinton said.

There is no way of knowing whether Clinton, dressed in Kelly green, felt any distaste at the prospect of sharing a table with Adams. There are some thirty-five million Irish Americans, a great many of whom regard Adams as a kind of Nelson Mandela, and no prospective Presidential candidate can decline a St. Patrick's Day invitation. And, to be sure, the I.R.A. is not alone in standing accused of atrocities during the Troubles: loyalist paramilitary groups and British government forces also perpetrated war crimes for which they have not been brought to account. But Clinton did indicate, obliquely, that the transition in Northern Ireland is not entirely complete. "There is still work to be done," Clinton acknowledged. "You cannot bring peace and security to people just by signing an agreement." The question for the people of Northern Ireland, and for Adams's supporters in the United States, is whether you can bring enduring peace and security without some reckoning—by all parties in the conflict—with the crimes of the past.

Founder of company behind illegal human experiments that killed three is major Clinton Foundation donor (Washington Examiner)

By Luke Rosiak

March 17, 2015

Washington Examiner

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's family foundation received millions of dollars from a corporate magnate whose former company caused the death of three people by injecting a cement-like mix into their spines during illegal human drug trials.

The Wyss Foundation has given the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation between $1million to $5 million, including an unspecified amount in 2014. The donor was one of 168 that gave $1 million or more to the Clinton philanthropy, according to its website.

The Wyss Foundation is a charitable arm of Hansjorg Wyss, a reclusive Swiss billionaire and former chief executive officer of Synthes, Inc., which conducted the illegal clinical trials.

Justice Department attorneys negotiated a $24 million plea deal in 2011 with Synthes and Norian Corporation, its wholly owned subsidiary, that sent four of its U.S. executives to prison. Wyss, who was not jailed, sold the company in 2012 to Johnson & Johnson for a reported $21.3 billion. He was the major stockholder at the time of the sale.

U.S. District Judge Legrome D. Davis said Synthes conducted the illegal human drug trials without Food and Drug Administration approval for doing so, then "in search of profits, chose not to tell the FDA the truth" about what it was doing.

The company knew from its own research prior to the illegal trials in 2009 that the bone cement mixed with blood to cause blood clots, according to the federal indictment, and that in porcine tests the "blood clots became lodged in the lungs. Notwithstanding this knowledge, the company allegedly proceeded to market the product."

The Justice Department further charged that the Wyss firm "did not stop marketing the product until after a third patient had died on the operating table." Then, instead of recalling the product, they "compounded their crimes by carrying out a coverup in which they lied to the FDA."

The judge wrote that the company had tried to evade detection and accountability, and that its "pattern of deception is unparalleled."

The Clinton Foundation website merely gives the name of the organization. There is one other Wyss Foundation in the U.S., but it disburses less than a million dollars a year total, and its accountant said it had not donated to the Clinton philanthropy. The Swiss billionaire's D.C.-based foundation staff would not discuss the donation. It has not filed Internal Revenue Service disclosures for 2014.

The Washington Examiner first reported on Wyss' past, and his connection to liberal groups, in July 2014, finding that it had given millions to the Center for American Progress, a nonprofit run by John Podesta, Bill Clinton's former chief of staff and more recently a senior adviser to President Obama.

In January, the center provided a list of its donors to the Washington Post in an attempt to demonstrate that it was "transparent" since Podesta is expected to manage Clinton's 2016 presidential campaign. Missing from the listing given to the Post was Wyss.

A center spokesman failed to respond to multiple requests from the Examiner for comment, including whether Wyss asked to be listed as "Anonymous" on the donor list given to the Post or if the center so designated him. The Examiner also asked center officials to explain the transparency value of disclosing anonymous donors.

Since a spokesman for the Clinton Foundation also failed to respond, it could not be determined why the once and possible future chief executives would allow the foundation bearing their name to be connected to Wyss.

"Global health" and "health and wellness" are two of the five major areas on which the Clinton Foundation focuses, touting, for example, that it saves the lives of poor children in Africa by giving them vaccines.

"No Ceilings' Report Shows There's Still A Long Way To Go In Achieving Women's Equality (Huffington Post)
By Rahel Gebreyes
March 17, 2015
Huffington Post

The saying goes that a woman's work is never done, and new data about international women's rights proves that's definitely the case for global gender equality.

A report released this month by No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project contains both good and bad news for women's equality and health on a global level. The report is produced for No Ceilings by the Clinton Foundation in partnership with the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation.

Among the positives are meaningful gains in the areas of health, legal rights and education for women internationally. The global maternal mortality rate has fallen 42 percent in the last 20 years. The majority of constitutions worldwide (about four out of five) include language that attempts to guarantee gender equality. Girls and boys now enroll in primary school at almost even rates, virtually closing the gender gap in early education.

Equal rights and opportunities for women are still lagging when it comes to full economic participation, family planning, and leadership roles. Only about 55 percent of women are part of the global labor force, compared with 82 percent of men. More than 220 million women around the world want to prevent pregnancy but lack contraception. Just 5 percent of CEOs in Fortune 500 companies are women.

As TIME writer Charlotte Alter explained in a HuffPost Live conversation on March 12, the improvements show that real change is possible, even if it's slow-moving.

"When we commit to change, we can do it. We did it in health and education a lot. A 40 percent reduction in maternal mortality is huge," she told host Caroline Modarressy-Tehrani. "If we are really committed to doing this, it can happen. We just have to continue to commit and dedicate the funds and the resources and the energy to these issues."

For example, by restructuring the way girls are educated, women's advocate Cheryl Saban said we can position them to fill the countless jobs in growing fields like math and computer science.

"We're getting there. We're targeting STEM curriculum for girls. We're letting them know that they can do it, that they can do the math, that they can do the engineering, and we want them to learn to code," she said.

The main conclusion Saban drew from the No Ceilings report is that women are still not on an equal footing with men globally, from birth and throughout their lives.

"Women need to be counted. A lot of women are not registered as a human being in this world. … That's something that we see in this report," she said.

"No Ceilings" Report Shows Major Gains and Gaps in Women's Equality (Feminist Newswire)
March 16, 2015
Feminist Newswire

The "No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project" report contains data collected over the past 20 years, following the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing, where the 1995 Declaration and Platform for Action made women and girls a priority. The groundbreaking 14th plank of the platform declared "Women's rights are human rights," laying the groundwork for governments worldwide to implement action plans for the goal of full participation for women and girls.

Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation, called the report "encouraging" and "impressive" in an interview with C-Span this morning. Smeal emphasized the importance of data in effecting change. "You can't make progress unless you know exactly where you are," she said.

The "No Ceilings" data-driven approach to gender equality shows that significant gains have been made for women and girls, especially in the maternal mortality rate, which is down 42 percent globally since 1995. Other improvements include global enrollment rates for boys and girls in primary school, which is now almost equal.

There are, however, many areas that still need drastic improvement. The United States is the only developed country that does not offer paid maternity leave, and it is only 1 of 9 countries worldwide that does not provide for paid maternity leave. Equal representation in government worldwide is also lagging, and although the number of women in the United States Congress is at an all-time high, women still only make up around 20 percent of Congress. Furthermore, globally 1 in 4 girls are married before her 18th birthday, and in Niger that rate skyrockets to 3 in 4 girls. Progress is uneven, and women and girls still lag behind -specifically marginalized women.

As far as further progress goes, Smeal is optimistic. "You'd be surprised – just having a goal does help [equality] in many countries," Smeal said. "I'm very excited about what the new goals will be."

SENATOR CLINTON CALLS ON NUCLEAR REGULATORY COMMISSION TO ADDRESS CONTINUING SAFETY, SECURITY AND EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS PROBLEMS AT INDIAN POINT

Cites Concerns with Failure to Install Adequate Emergency Siren System and Coming Move to Dry Cask Storage

Washington, DC – Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton today called on the Chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) to address continuing problems at Indian Point with safety, security and emergency preparedness. In a letter to Chairman Klein, Senator Clinton highlighted in particular two issues that exemplify the concerns: the failure of Entergy to install an adequate new emergency siren system and the coming move to dry cask storage of spent fuel at Indian Point.

"The continuing drumbeat of problems at Indian Point has undermined public confidence in both Entergy and the NRC. How the siren and dry cask storage issues are handled in the coming months will send a signal to the public about whether there is a renewed commitment to public safety by federal regulators and the plant's owners. I urge the NRC to use this opportunity to demonstrate a new seriousness about getting it right at Indian Point," Senator Clinton wrote.

Senator Clinton has worked to push both the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) and Entergy to improve safety, security and emergency preparedness at the plant, including the siren system. Senator Clinton added a provision to the energy bill in 2005 to require Entergy to install a new siren system with battery backup in response to repeated failures of the Indian Point siren system due to a lack of backup power. That provision was signed into law in August of 2005, and the NRC set a January 2007 deadline for having the system operational. Entergy applied for and received an extension of the deadline to April 15th, and subsequently missed the deadline. NRC fined Entergy $130,000 and Senator Clinton announced that she would sponsor Senate companion legislation to a bill to be sponsored in the U.S. House by Congresswoman Nita Lowey (D-Westchester/Rockland) and Congressman John Hall (D-Hudson Valley), that would steer fines levied by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for safety violations to counties surrounding nuclear facilities in order to assist them with emergency planning (see - http://clinton.senate.gov/news/statements/details.cfm?id=274453&&)

Earlier this year, Senator Clinton announced that she would be asking the DHS inspector general to evaluate why Entergy has failed to meet established deadlines to achieve operability of a new alert and notification system for the Indian Point nuclear power plant (see - http://clinton.senate.gov/news/statements/details.cfm?id=281505&&). Senator Clinton has also continued to call for the NRC to conduct an Independent Safety Assessment (ISA) at Indian Point and has introduced legislation to require an ISA at the plant.

The following is the text of Senator Clinton's letter to NRC Chairman Klein:

Chairman

Nuclear Regulatory Commission
Washington, D.C. 20555

Dear Chairman Klein:

I have worked hard over the last six years to push both the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) and Entergy to improve safety, security and emergency preparedness at Indian Point. While improvements have been made, problems persist at the plant. At the same time, new issues and challenges continue to emerge. I write today regarding two issues that exemplify these two types of concerns: the failure of Entergy to install an adequate new emergency siren system; and the coming move to dry cask storage of spent fuel at Indian Point.

I am extremely dismayed about the continued failure of Entergy to put a siren system in place that meets the requirements of the Energy Policy Act of 2005, and the related Nuclear Regulatory Commission orders. We will soon reach the one year anniversary of the date by which the new siren system with backup power was supposed to be in place. When that original deadline approached, Entergy applied for and received an extension of the deadline to April 15th of 2007. Entergy subsequently missed that extended deadline, and was fined $130,000 by the NRC. Since that time, Entergy and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) have been in talks to discuss how the new siren system can be modified to meet the applicable requirements. In my view, it is time for the NRC to become more involved in order to drive these talks to a conclusion, and then to use its enforcement tools to force Entergy to devote the resources that are required to achieve the long-delayed goal of having a new siren system in place that complies with the law and enhances public safety.

In addition, I note that Entergy will soon move spent fuel rods from pools at Indian Point to dry cask storage on site. This action will have benefits; in particular, it will enable Indian Point to empty the spent fuel pool that has been leaking water contaminated with strontium 90 into the environment. At the same time, any action involving spent fuel presents potential hazards and security risks. With these risks in mind, I urge you to take whatever measures are required to ensure that Entergy puts public safety and security first during this new phase of operations at Indian Point.

The continuing drumbeat of problems at Indian Point has undermined public confidence in both Entergy and the NRC. How the siren and dry cask storage issues are handled in the coming months will send a signal to the public about whether there is a renewed commitment to public safety by federal regulators and the plant's owners. I urge the NRC to use this opportunity to demonstrate a new seriousness about getting it right at Indian Point.

Sincerely yours,
Hillary Rodham Clinton

Politico: “GOP targets Clinton speech contracts”

By Katie Glueck

August 18, 2014, 3:41 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton has a Las Vegas money problem — conservatives are betting on it.

Over the weekend, the Las Vegas Review-Journal reported the details of Clinton’s typical speaking contract, stipulations that often include a chartered private jet “e.g., a Gulfstream 450 or larger jet”; a presidential suite at hotels; and business- or first-class seats for aides to the potential 2016 presidential candidate.

The eye-popping details, obtained through open records laws, broke ahead of Clinton’s scheduled speech at an Oct. 13 fundraiser for the University of Nevada-Las Vegas Foundation. Clinton is charging a discounted rate of $225,000 to speak at that gathering, according to the Review-Journal — down from the standard $300,000 — and her team has said the money will benefit her family’s foundation.

In recent months, the former secretary of state has struggled with how to talk about her family’s personal wealth, drawing across-the-board incredulous criticism when she said she and her husband were “dead broke” after leaving the White House at the end of President Bill Clinton’s second term.

At UNLV, Clinton’s speech already has been the subject of student complaints, with many urging her to donate the money back to the university foundation. Meantime, her speaking arrangements at other universities also have come under scrutiny.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Review-Journal report, citing a memo from 2013, found that on top of her fee, Clinton's speaking arrangements also usually include a $500 stipend for a traveling aide and funds for ground transportation and cellphone bills, among other pricey requirements.

The news was met with glee on the right, where conservatives see an opportunity to paint the likely 2016 Democratic front-runner as wealthy and out of touch — as Democrats successfully did to 2012 GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney. Several Republican officials were quick to seize on the report, which centered largely on emails between the UNLV Foundation and the Harry Walker Agency, which represents Clinton.

"How out of touch is @HillaryClinton?" tweeted Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus. "Private jets & presidential suites in addition to huge speaking fees."

RNC Communications Director Sean Spicer chimed in, "so very 1%."

The newspaper's report was published as Clinton mingled with political celebrities during a book signing for her new memoir in the luxurious Hamptons, where she vacations.

The report indicated that while Clinton typically charges $300,000, she will do the UNLV Foundation event for just $225,000. Beyond the expenses, the report also highlights other speaking requirements for the event, including that Clinton be the "only person onstage during her remarks" and have "final approval" of the moderator and the person doing the introduction.

The contract also emphasizes that the event should be closed to the press, "unless otherwise agreed to in writing," and that any journalists in attendance as guests need to be cleared by the agency.

A spokesman for Clinton did not reply to a request for comment about the reasoning behind the jet and other expenses. But a spokeswoman for the pro-Hillary Clinton group Correct the Record pushed back on Republican criticism, noting that Clinton "has often said how blessed she felt by the success she's had," and that gratitude has driven her policy positions.

It's an argument that echoes how many Democrats — including Clinton herself — have responded to the Romney comparisons: that ultimately, it's about policy, and she supports approaches that benefit "every child, regardless of their circumstances," as Correct the Record put it.

"That's why the right wing is so obsessed with Hillary and Bill Clinton's success," spokeswoman Adrienne Watson said in an email. "Because unlike leading Republicans, the Clintons recognize that success is a blessing rather than an entitlement. For Hillary Clinton, that blessing is a reason to support and focus on policies that promote and share the opportunity with others, unlike leading Republicans who live beholden to special interests or abuse their power."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tickets for the UNLV Foundation fundraiser start at $200 for individuals and go up to $20,000 for a table of 10 — with a “special menu” — though the latter category is sold out.

The details of the contract didn’t appear to spark much outrage on the left, with even many populist-inclined progressives — who view Clinton as too close to Wall Street and out of touch with working people’s needs — largely staying out of it. And such detailed requests in contracts for special appearances are hardly unheard of, especially among Hollywood celebrities and famous musicians.

Conservative blogs, however, were all over the report.

“The private-jet requirement should raise eyebrows on the Left,” wrote Ed Morrissey at the conservative blog Hot Air, gibing at the “carbon footprint” that would leave. “… They’d rally behind her in a general election, no doubt, but in a contested primary Clinton may find herself challenged on authenticity, too.”

RedState, an influential conservative blog, detailed the typical speaking requirements in list form, from the six-figure speaking fee to “Meals and incidentals for Hillary, her travel aides and advance staff, as well as all phone charges.”

“Nice work if you can get it,” the blog reads. “No, Hillary isn’t too out of touch with ordinary Americans, right?”

CNN: “Stepping up political game, Hillary Clinton agrees to help in midterms”

By Dan Merica

August 18th, 2014, 5:19 p.m. EDT

Washington (CNN) – Hillary Clinton has been able to exist slightly above politics for the last six years.

That will soon be coming to an end.

Clinton, the former secretary of state and frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, has committed to play a sizable role in fundraising for the party ahead of the 2014 elections, according to sources and aides for different campaign groups.

In addition to campaigning for specific candidates, aides to Democratic National Committee, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and the Democratic Governors Association confirmed to CNN that Clinton will headline fundraisers for each respective group in 2014.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is also slated to headline one of the most anticipated events of the year in Democratic politics in Iowa: Sen. Tom Harkin's Iowa Steak Fry on September 14.

Sen. Harkin's team announced Monday that Clinton – along with her husband former President Bill Clinton – will headline the fundraiser in the first-in-the-nation caucus state. The steak fry regularly draws big-name, national politicians and is seen as a required stop for any Democrat seeking the presidency.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill also told CNN that the former secretary of state will do more in Iowa than just attend the steak fry.

"She's looking forward to campaigning for her Democratic friends and colleagues and to helping the effort to move America forward, including a stop to see her old friend and colleague Senator Harkin to help raise money for important races in Iowa," Merrill said in a statement.

In addition, a DCCC source tells CNN that Clinton will fundraiser for the congressional campaign committee, including a women's event in San Francisco with Leader Nancy Pelosi.

"We're thrilled and grateful that she is lending her support to our shared goal of electing a Democratic House of Representatives that will put a stop to the endless cycle of dysfunction and shutdowns from this Republican Congress," Chairman Steve Israel said in a statement.

Since leaving the State Department in 2013, Clinton has largely tried to stay out of politics. Other than campaigning for candidates with whom she has a personal relationship – including Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe and her daughters mother-in-law – Clinton hasn't done any political fundraising.

But as likelihood of Clinton running for president in 2016 rises, political committees and groups have stepped started to ask Clinton for help in the 2014 midterms.

In April, while at an American Jewish Committee forum, Israel spoke with Clinton about what she is willing to do around the midterms.

According to Israel, Clinton said, " I want to help," to which Israel said, "Not the minute, but the second you are ready to help, you let me know."

Democrats have an uphill climb to taking back the House, and recent polling show the fight to keep Democratic control of the Senate will be close.

In an interview with CNN, Israel said he saw Clinton as able to go into a number of different states, but especially Illinois, California, New York, Florida, Pennsylvania and Arkansas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Her appeal is so broad. She excites our base. There are few people stronger than she is with swing voters," Israel said, listing Clinton attributes as a fundraiser and endorser.

It was widely assumed that Clinton would campaign for Democrats in 2014. The cadre of groups organizing around her possible 2016 bid – particularly Ready for Hillary – have tried to help midterm Democrats, and Priorities USA – a super PAC supporting her 2016 run – has told donors to focus on the midterms for now.

In July, Clinton told a Southern California public radio station that she is "committed" to helping midterms Democrats.

"I strongly am committed to doing what I can to keep the Senate in Democratic hands," she said.

Los Angeles Times: “Tom Harkin on steak fry invitation: 'Iowans still love Hillary'”

By Michael A. Memoli

August 18, 2014, 3:20 p.m. EDT

Accepting the invitation to headline Tom Harkin's steak fry fundraiser, Hillary Clinton made perhaps her most conspicuous move yet toward another presidential bid. But Iowa's longtime Democratic senator says he saw having both Clintons attend the event as simply a fitting way to cap a 37-year tradition.

Sometimes, Harkin said in an interview Monday, he approaches prominent Democrats to speak at his annual fundraiser. More often than not, there is no shortage of ambitious Democrats expressing an interest.

"But this is my last one. I really wanted both Bill and Hillary to come out," he said. "And they were both intrigued by it and supportive."

Harkin, who is retiring at the end of his fifth term in January, said this year's steak fry will "be a shot of adrenaline for Iowa Democrats" ahead of the November election. The election to replace Harkin is emerging as one of the most critical races in the nation in determining which party will control the Senate next year.

With that in mind, Harkin said he expects the former of secretary of state to focus on 2014, not 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We've got to maintain control of the Senate for all kinds of reasons," Harkin said. "I assume that's going to be her message. But I don't know, like I said, I haven't talked to her about it."

It will be Hillary Clinton's second steak fry, having joined Barack Obama and other candidates for the presidential nomination in 2007. Bill Clinton will be making his fourth appearance. "But this will be the first time together," Harkin said. "So this will be very exciting."

Vice President Joe Biden, who has not ruled out his own 2016 bid, headlined the event last year. His praise then for current Secretary of State John Kerry as "one of the best secretaries of state" in U.S. history was seen as a subtle dig at his would-be rival before an audience of party activists.

Bill Clinton only won the 1996 Iowa caucuses, when he was seeking reelection. Harkin was himself a presidential candidate in 1992. Hillary Clinton finished third in the 2008 caucuses. But Harkin said both will have much to thank Iowans for on their visit.

"Even though Obama came through in that last one, that's OK," he said. "Iowans still love Hillary and Bill both."

This year's steak fry will be Sept. 14 in Indianola.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: “When It’s Barack vs. Hillary, Where Does Bill Fit In?”

By Stephen Sestanovich, a professor at Columbia University and senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, is the author of “Maximalist: America in the World From Truman to Obama.”

August 18, 2014, 3:14 p.m. EDT

One of the most interesting features of last week’s now-famous dust-up between President Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton was the way Bill Clinton figured in the discussion. He’s become the Democrats’ Ronald Reagan, the former president all party members want on their side. Hillary’s boosters naturally claim Bill’s foreign-policy record for their own. But her detractors do the same thing. They say her interventionist talk amounts to “dissing” her own husband. Who’s right?

The case for seeing Hillary in apostolic succession to “Harry Truman, John F. Kennedy, and Bill Clinton” was made last Friday for Politico by Will Marshall. A co-founder in the mid-80’s of the Clinton-backed Democratic Leadership Council, Mr. Marshall called Mr. Obama’s foreign policy a case of “risk-averse retrenchment”—an “over-correction” to the excesses of George W. Bush. For Marshall (and others too), Hillary offers Democrats a chance to “reclaim their party’s tradition of tough liberalism.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We'll hear more of this view. But others saw the story differently. Harvard professor Stephen Walt argued that Obama and Bill Clinton share a "highly risk-averse" approach to foreign policy. All that "indispensable nation" talk in the '90s, Mr. Walt wrote, was mere cover for doing things on the cheap. And columnist James Fallows claimed that Obama's "don't-do-stupid-stuff" formula (derided by Hillary as "not an operating principle") was one that Bill Clinton would have admired for its "breadth and depth."

In fact, the case for continuity between the Clinton and Obama presidencies is very weak. After a shaky start, Bill Clinton's foreign policy became steadily more activist. "Local conflicts," he warned, "can become world-wide headaches if we allow them to fester." His administration's mantra for success was "diplomacy backed by force." Military spending turned upward. White House staffers called their boss "the president of the world."

There's every reason to think Hillary would like to revive her husband's more ambitious foreign policy. But it's just as clear she knows it won't be easy. Her interview with Jeffrey Goldberg ended with sober reflections (not much noticed) on what today's voters want. Recovery at home, she said, before activism abroad. Americans want to be sure they can take care of their families. Then they'll be ready to worry about the world. This is an Obama-like theme, but even here Hillary may have been putting the president on notice. Unless the economy improves, foreign policy won't be the only area where she'll tell the voters she can do better. That's how Bill Clinton ran for president. So will she.

MSNBC: Pressure builds on Clinton to speak out on Ferguson

By Alex Seitz-Wald

August 18, 2014 5:19 p.m. EDT

With the nation gripped by the unrest in Ferguson, Missouri, seemingly every political leader has weighed in, from President Barack Obama to ideological leaders like Democratic Sen. Elizabeth Warren and Republican Sen. Ted Cruz. But there's one conspicuous exception – Hillary Clinton.

In the week since a police officer shot and killed unarmed teenager Michael Brown, critics have noted that the former secretary of state and likely 2016 presidential contender has partied on Martha's Vineyard, signed books with celebrities in the Hamptons, and settled into a week of vacation on Long Island, but she has yet to say anything publicly about Ferguson.

A spokesperson for Clinton declined to comment again on Monday.

As a private citizen who holds no public office, nor is officially campaigning for one, Clinton is not obligated to say or do anything. But as she increasingly wades into politics ahead of a potential presidential run, it will be more and more difficult for her to stay mum on major issues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a rally on Sunday, civil rights leader and MSNBC host Al Sharpton called the protests a “defining moment” for the country on criminal justice. “Jeb Bush, Hillary Clinton, don’t get laryngitis on this issue,” Sharpton said. “Nobody can go to the White House unless they stop by our house and talk about policing.”

Both on the ground and on social media, many have wondered where Clinton is.

“Her party sees her as a public figure, not just another private citizen,” Kevin Madden, a former top adviser to Mitt Romney told msnbc. “They are increasingly looking to her as the next voice to emerge, beyond President Obama, since there is this recognition that Obama is being tuned out by the public. This is one of those issues and times where she’s going to need to say something, whether she wants to or not.”

On Friday, the Clinton Foundation released a “House of Cards” spoof starring Clinton and actor Kevin Spacey to celebrate Bill Clinton’s birthday.

Clinton should do more, said Rashad Robinson, the executive director of Color of Change, which has collected more than 100,000 signatures calling for accountability for the police officer who shot Brown.

“We’re seeing her on this book tour as America is having this deep conversation around race, and we want to know where Hillary is,” Robinson told msnbc. “She could be an incredibly important voice as someone who has walked the halls of power, understands the complications of these issues, and has championed a deep relationship with white working class people [and African Americans]… She could be a bridge.”

But a former Clinton aide, who asked not to be named as they are not authorized to speak on Clinton’s behalf, defended the former secretary of state. “It’s ludicrous to think that she should comment on every domestic issue,” the former aide said. “She’s a private citizen, and therefore is not obligated to comment.”

It’s certainly a different problem than the Missouri’s Democratic Gov. Nixon faces. Nixon, who was seen as too slow to intervene in the crisis before taking charge late last week, does not have the privilege of taking a pass. A popular two-term governor of a red state, Nixon is widely considered to be a promising national leader for the Democratic Party, and even a vice presidential option for Clinton, should she run and win the nomination. But the crisis has imperiled his future.

For most Americans who have likely never heard of Nixon before, the one thing he will be known for from now on is his handling of the turmoil in Ferguson. That outcome remains to be seen.

Ironically, many of those sympathetic to the protesters are finding that, among the potential 2016 presidential candidates, the person they most agree with right now is a Republican – Texas Sen. Rand Paul. In an op-ed for Time magazine, Paul said the county needs to combat the racial bias inherent in the criminal justice system and to demilitarize law enforcement.

Women's Wear Daily: Parties: "Lisa Perry Hosts Paddle & Party for Pink"

By Erik Maza

August 19, 2014

Hillary Rodham Clinton loves the Hamptons and the Hamptons loves her right back. She has been welcomed with open arms ever since she took up residence for a few weeks in Amagansett earlier this month. There she was hosting a fund-raiser with Bill Clinton for their foundation at the home of the philanthropists Joan and George Hornig in Water Mill. Later, she turned up at the screening of the new Meryl Streep movie, "The Giver," at the Amagansett home of producer Harvey Weinstein, a longtime pal.

On Saturday afternoon, she held a book signing at Bookhampton in East Hampton. The store, owned by another supporter, Charline Spektor, had been advertising it was "honored" to welcome the author.

On the day of, security began setting up around noon for the 5 p.m. appearance. The line went around the block. A phalanx of supporters, famous — Martha Stewart, Howard Dean — and not came to pay their respects.

"I had to give her a kiss because I love her so much," Stewart recalled later.

If Clinton were to run for president tomorrow, she seems to have the East End of Long Island locked up.

"I'm the biggest fan," Lisa Perry said. "It's incredible, the support, so who knows…," she said optimistically.

On Saturday, the designer and Richard Perry opened up their home in North Haven for the Paddle & Party for Pink fund-raiser, which benefits the Breast Cancer Research Foundation. Because the Perrys are Clinton supporters, there was, throughout the night, the hope that the former secretary of state herself would show up.

Donna Karan, a devoted supporter of various cancer research organizations, was there because she had designed, along with Perry, Stewart, Tory Burch, Kim Kardashian and others, a paddleboard to be auctioned off.

She was also unreserved about her enthusiasm for Clinton.

"Well, given the world situation right now, who else in the world could potentially fix our problems?" Karan said. "There's no question in my mind, never has been, we as a world need a woman, need a caregiver, need someone who really has the compassion and understanding, and has the experience, to deal with the world as it is today, which is in total chaos."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For her, the 2016 election cannot come soon enough.

"We need them now," the designer continued, referring to the Clintons. "They truly understand it. They've been everywhere. Where else can you have somebody who's that knowledgeable and aware of how to deal with the issues we're dealing with?" (Their admiration is mutual: The Clinton Foundation did, after all, give Karan its Global Citizen Award in 2012 for her work in Haiti, one of the former president's key causes.)

Paddle & Party has become a hot ticket in the three years the Perrys have hosted it, this year drawing Leonard and William Lauder; Ashley and Mary-Kate Olsen, who came with Olivier Sarkozy; Molly Sims; Hilary Rhoda and Sean Avery, and Danielle and Jodie Snyder of Dannijo. The Eighties singer Taylor Dayne was by the bar after a performance of some of her biggest hits, "Tell It to My Heart" among them. "I'm a vodka girl, usually a dirty martini. But tonight I couldn't really. I had to work, baby," she cooed of her drink of choice. "Tonight is very simple, vodka-soda splash."

The celebrity trainer Tracy Anderson was billed as a cohost of the benefit with Gwyneth Paltrow, but the actress did not show up. She has been recently dogged by tabloid reports that Chris Martin, from whom she's separated, has been dating Jennifer Lawrence.

"We're busy. She wasn't able to make it," Anderson said of Paltrow's absence. When pressed for a reason, her publicist intervened: "Next question."

The benefit wound up raising $1.5 million. As the night was wrapping up, it was clear Clinton would not be making an appearance — the New York Post later reported she was at an early birthday dinner for her husband. But Huma Abedin, Clinton's close aide, did materialize at the last minute, ensuring the prospective presidential candidate at least had a presence at a benefit hosted by important supporters. (Republicans were doing their own politicking last weekend — Gov. Chris Christie and Sen. John McCain were two of the marquee names at a fund-raiser at the East Hampton estate of billionaire Ronald O. Perelman.)

Abedin communed with the Perrys and posed for photos and, after a quick lap around the residence, headed over to check out the paddleboards. She declined interviews. "I'm not bidding on anything but all the boards are gorgeous," she said.

Bill and Hillary Clinton were no-shows at the Artists & Writers softball game in East Hampton on Saturday.

Bill participated as the umpire in 1988, before he became president, and came last year as a spectator.

One disappointed fan said he was told by several organizers, “He’ll be here any minute.” A group of people waited out by the entrance, some wearing Bill Clinton T-shirts, but he never showed.

At the table where the baseball jerseys with the players’ names were handed out, two “Clinton” jerseys sat unclaimed throughout the game.

“No celebs at all. No Alec Baldwin. No Bob Balaban,” my source complained. “Lori Singer turned a few heads in the on-deck circle in Nemo-orange gym shorts, but that was it.”

The real action was a block away on Main Street, where, by the seventh inning stretch, there were at least 300 people lined up for Hillary’s book signing of “Hard Choices.”

Media Matters for America: “Fox Calls Hillary Clinton A "Rock Star Diva" Over Contract Requirements Typical Of High Profile Speakers”

By Olivia Kittel

August 18, 2014, 9:53 p.m. EDT

Fox News' Special Report characterized former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's speaking contract requirements as outrageous, in an attempt to paint Clinton as an out of touch "diva," but Clinton's requirements are typical of contracts made by high profile politicians.

The Las Vegas Review-Journal reported the details of Hillary Clinton's speaking contract for her upcoming October fundraiser for the University of Nevada-Las Vegas, including Clinton's speaking fee as well as a number of stipulations ranging from private jet transportation, luxury hotel accommodations, and travel arrangements for aides.

On the August 18 edition of Fox News' Special Report, host Bret Baier and Fox correspondent James Rosen seized on the report to paint Hillary Clinton as a "rock star diva" with outrageous demands. Baier introduced the segment claiming "Hillary Clinton has a list of demands that critics say would make a rock star diva proud." Rosen detailed Clinton's "demands" which included a private jet, a luxury suite, and travel stipends for Clinton's aides:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[VIDEO]

Rosen added that "the disclosure of a contract rider so extensive and luxurious, even by the notoriously diva-ish norms of the lecture circuit will likely not help with an existing image problem," highlighting Clinton's previous supposed gaffe about her family's wealth.

ABC News reported in June that Clinton's speaking fee would be donated to the Clinton Foundation "rather than directly into Clinton's own wallet."

Moreover Clinton's contract requirements are typical of contracts for high profile politicians, including former GOP lawmakers:

Former President George W. Bush required private jet travel as well as strict press limitations in his speaking contracts.

Former Alaska Governor and vice-presidential candidate Sarah Palin required first class plane tickets or a private aircraft, as well as a luxury suite and two single rooms in a luxury hotel and required strict press limitations.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich required "payment of 'first class expenses,' including the hotel of Gingrich's choice, and 'first class airfare,'" as well as hotel suites with two bathrooms.

Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has required clients to pay for meals and lodging -- including a two-bedroom suite with a king-sized bed on an upper floor with a balcony -- as well as "first class travel expenses for up to 5 people to include a private plane."

Fox continues to fixate on Clinton's wealth in a campaign to misportray her as out of touch with the middle class.

Huffington Post blog: Ian Reifowitz: “Dear Hillary: 'Don't Do Stupid Stuff' Would've Kept Us Out of Iraq and Vietnam. Pretty Smart, No?”

By Ian Reifowitz, author of “Obama’s America: A Transformative Vision of Our National Identity”

Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama may (or may not) have hugged it out, but there is no mistaking that the former secretary of state is looking to create some distance between herself and the president she served.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In her interview with The Atlantic, when Jeffrey Goldberg spoke of finding "harmony between muscular intervention" -- "We must do something" -- vs. let's just not do something stupid," clearly referring to the thinking of the current and most recent former presidents, Clinton characterized both approaches as "extremes." She instead advocated a middle path that, in essence, splits the difference between W. and O.

Going further, she criticized what has become a shorthand for the president's first principle of foreign policy, arguing that "great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle." What this great nation does not need, I would submit, is a president whose foreign policy is only going to be half as destructive as that of George W. Bush.

But first, let's clarify what "don't do stupid stuff" actually means. It means don't send our armed forces somewhere unless there would be serious consequences to our security if we didn't, and, additionally, unless there are no other alternatives. And, within those parameters, avoid a major commitment of ground forces unless no other military option would suffice. It's much more than a throwaway line. If you want a fuller description of President Obama's foreign policy that still fits in a sound bite, it's this: "Just because we have the best hammer does not mean that every problem is a nail."

That's what the president said in a West Point commencement address barely two months ago. He also said that he would not send troops into battle:

“... simply because I saw a problem somewhere in the world that needed to be fixed, or because I was worried about critics who think military intervention is the only way for America to avoid looking weak. ... America must always lead on the world stage ... but U.S. military action cannot be the only--or even primary--component of our leadership in every instance.”

That is an organizing principle worthy of a great nation, a nation that seeks peace and stability for the world, and security for its own people. That is the kind of nation we ought to be.

And whether it's "don't do stupid stuff" or "just because we have the best hammer does not mean that every problem is a nail," please think about how much stronger our country's security and overall health would have been in the past seven decades if our presidents had conducted foreign policy with the Obama Doctrine at the front of their minds. As Obama himself noted, "Since World War II, some of our most costly mistakes came not from our restraint but from our willingness to rush into military adventures without thinking through the consequences."

In 1953, an American- and British-backed coup overthrew the elected government in Iran led by Mohammed Mossadeq. Why? Because we thought he would move his country into the Soviet orbit. The result: Our puppet, the Shah, took power and suppressed the secular opposition. A quarter century later, the shah was overthrown by the theocratic, Islamic government that turned Iran into a bitter enemy of the U.S. The Soviets are gone, but the ayatollahs are still there. Count that as one for the Obama Doctrine.

That's not the only instance of covert U.S. interference in another country during the Cold War, many of them on behalf of, ahem, less than fully democratic regimes. Even more destructive than Iran or any of these was our disastrous war in Vietnam on behalf of a population that didn't want us there, and that rejected the government with whom we were allied. Imagine what our country would be like today if it hadn't been torn apart by Vietnam. And then, as David Axelrod reminded us, there was the stupidity that was invading Iraq.

In surveying the current landscape, Hillary Clinton expressed concern about "the breakout capacity of jihadist groups that can affect Europe, can affect the United States." Certainly, they are dangerous and should be a primary focus of our foreign policy. Then she added that jihadist groups ...

“... are driven to expand .... How do we try to contain that? I'm thinking a lot about containment, deterrence, and defeat. You know, we did a good job in containing the Soviet Union, but we made a lot of mistakes, we supported really nasty guys, we did some things that we are not particularly proud of, from Latin America to Southeast Asia, but we did have a kind of overarching framework about what we were trying to do that did lead to the defeat of the Soviet Union and the collapse of Communism. That was our objective. We achieved it.”

The idea that jihadi groups--brutal, aggressive, and, yes, as ISIL's mass murders have shown, evil as they are--represent a threat that requires us to muster a response similar to our containment of a nuclear-armed world power is, to use the word of the day, stupid. And remember what was said above about Iran and Vietnam. We overreacted during the Cold War as well. To her credit, Clinton recognizes those "mistakes," but what she fails to realize is that the "overarching framework" and the need for an "organizing principle" is exactly what led us into those mistakes.

During the Cold War, our policy of containment had a core strategic element: the domino theory, which led us into a war that we did not need to fight in Southeast Asia. The strategic model itself bears a significant share of the blame. It is very tempting to create a model of how the world works and to try and shoehorn events and trends into that model. But it's a bad idea.

In criticizing the Obama Doctrine, Clinton bemoaned its lack of an overarching vision, some kind of model. That is, however, its strength, in particular given our position as the Number 1 status quo country on the planet. We are, without question, the world's preeminent military power. We devote more funds to military forces than do the next eight countries combined

When I say we are, or at least ought to be, a status quo power, I mean that our main goal should be to make sure no other power threatens our security or the stability of the world. A successful foreign policy has to assess each threat according to the principles of the Obama Doctrine. Having an "overarching framework" (again, see Iran and Vietnam) can cause a president to inflate a situation beyond the threat it actually poses. The invasion of Iraq under George W. Bush is a separate case because, well, that country posed no threat to us at all.

During the Cold War, if we'd been more confident in the ultimate superiority of our political and economic system--despite its serious problems--compared to that of Soviet communism, we could have avoided those mistakes by recognizing that, in the long run, we were going to win. Just like Muhammad Ali, Barack Obama understands that when you are the smarter, more talented competitor in the ring, you can let the other guy swing wildly until he tires himself out, the old rope-a-dope strategy. The Soviet Union ultimately collapsed, unable to keep up with us in terms of the freedom or economic opportunities democratic capitalism offered. Our interventions on behalf of anti-communist thugs, whether they "succeeded" as in Iran, or abjectly failed as in Vietnam, had no effect on that collapse.

Hillary Clinton calls for us to embrace a more robust organizing principle for our foreign policy than "don't do stupid stuff." Her reference to the Cold War is telling, and at least suggests that she sees expansionist jihadist groups as a fundamental threat reminiscent to that posed by the USSR. Sounds to me like a new "Global War on Terror," the kind of thing that could potentially lead us into another unnecessary and destructive conflict. Talk about stupid.

BuzzFeed: “Martin O’Malley Makes New Friends, Keeps Old Ties In New Hampshire”

By Ruby Cramer

August 19, 2014, 11:05 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The governor is spending a lot of time in the early primary state these days.

When he arrived on Sunday afternoon at the small, shaded park in Somersworth, N.H., Martin O’Malley cut across the lawn, looking for an old friend. Sen. Jeanne Shaheen, his boss three decades ago on the Gary Hart campaign, was about to leave the Democratic county picnic when O’Malley wrapped her in a hug.

About an hour later, after a short speech and dozens of handshakes, O’Malley was greeted by a new familiar face, when Louise Korn, a 70-year-old Democrat from the nearby city of Rochester, approached his picnic table. “I met you in 2012, and we’re still working for you,” she said. “I’ll see you when you’re president.”

“Hey, thank you,” O’Malley replied. “I accept your nomination!”

The stop in Somersworth, an annual picnic for the Strafford County Democratic Committee, marked the Maryland governor’s third trip in nine months to New Hampshire, home to the first presidential primary. Many attendees had met O’Malley before, underscoring his political and personal ties to the state.

Some relationships stretch back three decades, to the 1984 campaign, when a Hart staffer arranged for O’Malley to stay on a friend’s floor in Manchester. Others are still fresh. Democrats in the state remember the governor’s speech late last year at the party’s Jefferson-Jackson dinner, about fighting crime as mayor of Baltimore. Or they recall seeing him afterward, at the Puritan Backroom bar in Manchester, playing with Marty Quirk, the Irish musician about town.

After years of campaigning for Democrats in the state — and more recently, as he’s considered pursuing his own White House bid — O’Malley has become a somewhat familiar figure on the New Hampshire political scene.

“Now I’m starting to see people that remind me that we met,” O’Malley said in an interview at the picnic, before he left to headline a fundraiser for New Hampshire state senate candidates. “What I hadn’t fully appreciated until that Jefferson-Jackson dinner about a year ago was the number of people I had met in coming here almost every four years for somebody," he said, ticking off names like John Kerry, Hillary Clinton, and Maggie Hassan, the current governor.

"I've made other new friends in the course of things," O'Malley said. "People have been very kind to me here in the early going."

Kathleen Kelley Arnold, an active Democrat whose father hosted O'Malley in 1984, has watched the governor develop those relationships over the last 30 years. "He has some strong ties in New Hampshire," said Kelley Arnold, whose husband is running for Manchester mayor. "I probably didn't recognize it at the beginning, but he certainly has kept those strong connections going."

O'Malley has also gotten the attention of a new generation of activists in the state. After the Jefferson-Jackson dinner last fall, he was joined at the Puritan Backroom by a bevy of young aides and volunteers from Shaheen's ongoing Senate campaign — many of whom had never met or seen O'Malley until that night.

"They loved him," said Will Kanteres, a Manchester real estate executive who worked with O'Malley on the Hart campaign. "They could relate to him on a generational level."

The governor has barely registered on the early 2016 polls — some surveys show him at under 1% — and would face a very deep fundraising challenge to compete against Clinton. Hart, the U.S. senator from Colorado who went up Vice President Walter Mondale, was polling just as poorly before his upset in the primary. Friends from that campaign talk about the Hart experience often. Some say the memory drives O'Malley forward. Others cast Clinton as a Mondale.

"We say we don't believe in miracles," said Dan Calegari, a senior Hart aide who helped get the win in New Hampshire. "Martin and I and the others participated in one. After seeing it once, why can't it happen again?"

In Somersworth, O'Malley didn't dismiss the comparison. "Perhaps these things are cyclical, but I do sense a tremendous yearning out there that was also present in 1984 for a new generation of leadership and to hear a new perspective from a new generation of leaders that will help us solve our problems," he said. "That's very resonant now. Maybe that's part of what people are hearing or saying."

"Everywhere we go, Democratic activists will say phrases like, 'I'm glad we have new leaders,' 'It's good to hear from new leaders,'" O'Malley went on. "I hear that a lot. I heard that here. I heard it in Iowa. I heard it in Mississippi the other night."

"Maybe that's what they see."

Dan O'Neil, an alderman in Manchester and a friend of O'Malley's, said Democrats in the state are still waiting to see what Hillary Clinton does, but recognize that "she has not been here," he said. (Clinton has not returned to New Hampshire since the 2008 primary, but she is scheduled to appear in Iowa next month, at the state's premier Democratic Party event, the Iowa Steak Fry.)

"When they meet with O'Malley one-on-one, he's very personal. That's important," said O'Neil. "They expect politicians to reach out and touch you here."

A staffer for Ready for Hillary, the super PAC gathering an extensive list of Clinton supporters, also attended the picnic, a "Ready" button pinned to her lapel. The group maintains a Northeast headquarters, located in Manchester.

Lou D'Allesandro, a longtime state senator, referred to "the Hillary situation." Other candidates enjoy "pockets of support" in New Hampshire, he said, but Clinton's fanbase would be "hard to crack at this point in time" for anyone.

David Lang, the president of the Professional Firefighters of New Hampshire, a powerful group in the state, said he's also heard from Joe Biden, another possible candidate. The vice president invited Lang to "come over and say hello" at the airport as he was traveling during a recent visit to the state, Lang said.

But still, O'Malley maintains a notable distinction in the state: He is the only Democrat openly acting like a presidential candidate. He is raising money for his PAC, visiting early voting states, and campaigning aggressively for Democratic candidates.

O'Malley's efforts have become more aggressive in recent months. After tens of thousands of immigrant minors flooded the U.S.-Mexico border — and as President Obama seemed open to expedite deportations — O'Malley called the children "refugees" and argued they be given due process. The White House called O'Malley to complain and then leaked the call to the press. ("I just focused on what we could do together," the governor said Sunday. "And I'm far more concerned about what happens to these kids than I am about whether somebody in the White House press office got their feelings hurt.")

In April, O'Malley convened more than 60 people at the Baltimore Hilton for lunch and a discussion about his record in Maryland, the 2014 midterm races, and his path forward. The group included friends, former advisers, and political supporters he's known for years from Maryland and other states.

After lunch, a group discussion veered into questions about O'Malley's decision-making process ahead of the 2016 race. One attendee described the meeting as a "brainstorming" session with the people he's close to. "The feeling was overwhelming, 'Martin, run. Go ahead and do it," the person said.

The scene was the same at a "young professionals" event late last month in Washington that helped raise money for O'Malley's PAC.

"There was palpable energy there," said one former aide who attended and still sounded surprised weeks later by the crowd. The two-floor venue, at a bar called Local 16, was filled with people. At one point, the person recalled, he turned to another former O'Malley staffer and said, "Oh my god, this is real."

Abbas to Declare End of Oslo Peace Process

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas may be planning to announce the cancelation of the Oslo accords between Israel and the Palestinians, a senior Palestinian officials has said. Dr. Ahmed Majdalani, a senior PA official and member of the Palestine Liberation Organization Executive Committee, told the Palestinian news agency Ma'an in an interview published Sunday that Palestinian leaders were considering the drastic move in light of the failure of those agreements to bring about a Palestinian state. The Palestinian National Council is set to meet in mid-September to discuss the Palestinians' next move in the stalled peace talks.

Israel Resists EU Proposal to Expand Arab Role in Peace Talks

An EU proposal to expand the Quartet as a way of jump-starting the stymied Israel-Palestinian diplomatic track elicited shrugs in Jerusalem on Sunday, with officials saying that what is needed is a Palestinian desire to hold talks, not "bureaucratic creativity." "From our perspective, the problem is that the Palestinians have no desire to conduct serious negotiations, and no amount of bureaucratic creativity can help that," one official said. The EU's foreign policy chief Federica Mogherini said at a meeting of EU foreign ministers on Friday that Jordanian, Saudi and Egyptian representatives would take part in an expanded meeting of the Quartet on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly later this month in the hopes of jump-starting some sort of diplomatic process.

Saudis Satisfied With US Assurance Deal Will Bring Stability

Saudi Arabia is satisfied with assurances from U.S. President Barack Obama about the Iran nuclear deal and believes the agreement will contribute to security and stability in the Middle East, a senior Saudi official said on Friday. Saudi King Salman met with Obama at the White House on Friday to seek more support in countering Iran, as the Obama administration aimed to use the visit to shore up relations after a period of tensions. The visit is the king's first to the United States since ascending to the throne in January 2015, and comes after the United States agreed to a nuclear deal with Iran in July.

Netanyahu Rejects Calls for Israel to Accept Syrian Refugees

Prime Minister Netanyahu said Sunday that Israel was not indifferent to the tragedy of refugees from Syria and Africa, but added that the country was too small to absorb those fleeing from their homelands and that immediate steps would be taken to prevent infiltrators from entering its borders." Israel is a small country, and we do not have the geographic and demographic depths [to absorb them]," Netanyahu told ministers at the cabinet meeting in Jerusalem. "Therefore, we must control our borders and prevent migrant worker infiltrators or generators of terror."

Mother of Palestinian Baby Slain in Arson Attack Dies

Reham Dawabsheh, who was critically wounded in an arson attack on her home in the Palestinian village of Duma, succumbed to her wounds in the early hours of Monday, bringing the number of victims in the July 31 attack to three. Reham, 27, suffered from burns to 90 percent of her body and has been fighting for her life at the Tel HaShomer Medical Center in Ramat Gan for a little over five weeks. Her baby son Ali Dawabsheh was burned to death and killed instantly, while her husband Saed Dawabsheh, who suffered burns to 80 percent, fought for his life for a little over a week before succumbing to his wounds. Her elder son, four-year-old Ahmad, is suffering from burns to 60 percent of his body and still in serious condition.

Hamas: Truce with Israel only After Gaza gets Airport, Seaport

Hamas said on Sunday that any long-term truce agreement with Israel should include the reopening of the airport and the building of a seaport in the Gaza Strip. The airport, which is named after Yasser Arafat, is located in the southern Gaza Strip. It stopped operating at the beginning of the second intifada, when the IDF destroyed parts of its tarmac. Musa Abu Marzouk, a senior Hamas official, said that such an agreement should also include the reopening of the Rafah border crossing with Egypt and the lifting of the blockade on the Gaza Strip. Abu Marzouk's remarks came amid reports that Israel and Hamas are conducting indirect negotiations to reach an agreement over a long-term truce.

Netanyahu Faces Uphill Battle to Secure Majority in Gas Vote

The Knesset on Monday was set to vote on a controversial reform of Israel's natural gas sector, but by Sunday night Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did not appear to have clinched a parliamentary majority to approve the plan. As part of the special session called during the summer recess, the Knesset was slated to vote on whether to transfer the monopoly-approving authority of Economy Minister Aryeh Deri — who has refused to exercise his ministerial power to fast-track the new gas deal with energy companies — to the cabinet. According to reports Sunday, the prime minister was pinning his hopes on persuading members of the Joint (Arab) List to skip the vote in exchange for a significant increase to budgets for the Arab community. By late Sunday morning, the party had denied reaching an agreement with Netanyahu.

7 Police Commanders Disciplined over Stabbing at Pride Parade

Six police officers and a Border Policeman were reassigned and four other police officers were formally reprimanded for their responsibility in the Jerusalem police's failure to prevent the stabbing at the Jerusalem Pride Parade in July, it was cleared for publication on Sunday. The most senior officer to be reassigned is the commander of the Moriah sub-district, Brig.-Gen. Kobi Davidian. He will not serve in command positions in the future. It was in his area that the attack occurred, and the commission holds him responsible for the failings of the officers under his command. The head of the intelligence branch in the Jerusalem District Police, Chief Supt. Doron Moshe, was also reassigned and barred from promotion to any command positions in the next seven years.

Refugee Crisis is Taking Place in Middle East, not in Europe

By Sever Ploscker

I had a dream: I hear knocking on my door in the middle of the night. I peek through the eyehole and see behind the door a long line of people in tattered and worn out clothes from hardship on the roads, some carrying toddlers and children on their shoulders and in their hands, their faces full of exhaustion and anger, seeking compassion.

If I open the door, they will flood my apartment, fill the house with words in Arabic and a Muslim prayer. If I don't open the door, they will remain behind it, hungry and thirsty, their children crying bitterly. A raging sea of refugees.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I woke up sweating. There was no one behind my door. Not yet.

Israel is watching what is known as "the refugee crisis in Europe" with a mixture of sharing in grief and malicious joy. Grief over the refugees, (restrained) joy over the exposure of the hypocritical Europeans' face.

Correspondents of television channels from Israel are reporting with shock on the heart of stone of the governments, which are locking their gates to prevent the poor refugees from entering, on merciless police officers and on the death raging on the escape routes from the Middle Eastern hell to the European heaven.

The descriptions and images tell the story of a human tragedy, but there are also dry numbers, and according to those numbers there is no refugee crisis in Europe. The European Union's population numbers 500 million people. If all 28 EU member countries meet their commitments this year without leaving a single refugee homeless, they will be taking in an average of 80,000 refugees a month: 0.015 percent of the EU's population. That's not a crisis, not a flood and not a demographic danger.

There is no real economic problem here either: The absorption of a million refugees in the EU countries will require an investment of €50 billion (about $55 billion) – only 1 percent of the EU's annual product (€19 trillion). That's pocket money, which pales into insignificance compared to the future economic contribution of a young working population to the aging Europe.

Europe is not being threatened by an economic or demographic refugee crisis, but by a political crisis reflecting the rise in power of the different populist movements. As usual, these movements are looking for scapegoats, looking for someone to blame for "the situation." Sometimes they blame the bankers, sometimes the rich people, sometimes the Jews (even if they are physically absent), sometimes the professional associations, sometimes the local Muslims, and recently they are blaming the refugees from the Middle East and Africa.

The loud populism has turned the not-so-big number of refugees, which the EU has no practical problem taking in, into an intimidating flood at Europe's gates. That's nonsense, but it creates efficient intimidation.

An unbearable refugee crisis is taking place exclusively in the Middle East, in our area. The civil war in Syria – with a death toll of about 300,000 people so far, at least 15,000 of them children – has driven millions out of the country. According to estimates, the small Jordan has already taken in some 700,000 refugees from Syria and hundreds of thousands from Iraq, and Lebanon has taken in at least 1.5 million. In these countries there is really no more room for a single asylum seeker.

And this is where my nightmare begins. What if tens of thousands of people arrive tomorrow from the battle and oppression areas in Syria and Iraq at border in the Golan Heights, seeking refuge in Israel? What if they knock on our gates, take the risk and climb the fences with their crying children in their hands? What if they prefer to live in an enemy country than die in a whirlpool of war and terror or on escape routes?

In the blink of an eye, a refugee crisis could arrive at Israel's doorstep. When that happens, it will be interesting to see how our ministers and commentators respond when CNN broadcasts heartbreaking images of an exhausted refugee family at the Golan border, begging confused IDF soldiers with cocked weapons to allow it to run for its life into the Jewish state.

Let's lower the rebuking moral tone towards Europe and prepare for the definitely not trivial possibility of lines of refugees at our doorstep.

Palestine's Crisis of Leadership: Did Abbas Destroy Palestinian Democracy?

By Ramzy Baroud

The crisis of leadership throughout Palestinian history did not start with Mahmoud Abbas and will, regrettably, be unlikely to end with his departure. Although Abbas has, perhaps, done more damage to the credibility of the Palestinian leadership than any other leader in the past, he is also a by-product of a process of political fraud that started much earlier than his expired Presidency.

Abbas' unforeseen announcement on August 27 that he, along with a few others, will resign from the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) Executive Committee and his call for an emergency session of the Palestine National Council (PNC) is a testament to his poor management. More, it shows his utter disregard for the minimally-required threshold of responsible leadership.

Abbas, like his predecessor Yasser Arafat, has used and discarded the PLO and its various, now near-defunct, institutions as his personal political playground: summoning PNC members to vote on pre-determined and decided agendas and to cast and re-cast roles within the PLO's Executive Committee as a way to punish and reward.

Now, at the age of 80, Abbas is obviously concerned about his legacy, the fate of the PLO and his Palestinian Authority (PA), once he is gone. Whatever political maneuvering he has planned for the future (including the selection of new Executive Committee members, which will be overseen by him and by his allies) is hardly encouraging. According to the Unity deal signed between Abbas' faction, Fatah and Hamas, the restructuring of the PLO as a pre-requisite to include both Hamas and the Islamic Jihad in one unifying and relatively representative Palestinian body was a top priority.

Well, not anymore. Hamas is furious with Abbas' call for reconvening the PNC, a two-day session scheduled to be held in Ramallah, West Bank next month. The Gaza-headquartered Movement is calling on Palestinian factions not to participate. Either way, further Palestinian disunity is assured.

Now that unity remains elusive, Hamas is seeking its own alternatives to breaking the Gaza siege by conducting what is being described as 'indirect talks' with Israel, via the notorious former British Prime Minister, Tony Blair. The latter has reportedly met Hamas leader, Khaled Meshaal, on more than one occasion. The discussions included a long-term ceasefire between Hamas and Israel in exchange for the permission of a safe sea passage where Palestinians in Gaza can enjoy a degree of freedom, bypassing Israeli and Egyptian siege and restrictions.

Needless to say, if the reports regarding Blair's role in the indirect negotiations and Hamas' intentions are accurate, it would indeed be a great folly. On the one hand, Blair's pro-Israel record disqualifies him from the role of any honest mediation. On the other, Resistance or truce is not a political decision to be determined by a single faction, no matter how great its sacrifices or how trustworthy its intentions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In addition, Abbas is in no position to criticize Hamas for its talks with Blair. It is particularly disingenuous that Abbas and his party are accusing Hamas of flouting Palestinian Unity and consensus, while both— Abbas and Fatah— have contributed to Palestine's political afflictions more than any other leader or faction in the past. In fact, while Gaza subsisted and suffered terribly under a protracted Israeli siege and successive wars, Abbas operated his PA outfit in Ramallah with the full consent of the Israeli Government. The so-called 'security coordination', chiefly aimed at crushing Palestinian Resistance in the West Bank, continued unabated.

This is what Israeli political commentator, Raviv Drucker, wrote in Haaretz in an article that reprimanded Israeli Prime Minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, for failing to appreciate the value of Abbas: "Our greatest high-tech geniuses working in the most sophisticated laboratories could not invent a more comfortable Palestinian partner. A leader with no one to the left of him in the Palestinian political arena and one who, when his enemy, Israel, bombs his people in Gaza, comes out with a statement criticizing those who kidnap Israeli soldiers."

Abbas has shown little compassion for Gaza. Neither has he demonstrated any respect for the Palestinian people nor has he invested sincere efforts aimed at making Palestinian unity his top priority. It is rather telling that he is activating the PNC, summoning its nearly 700 members, not to discuss the intensifying Palestinian crises— from Gaza to Jerusalem to Yarmouk—but rather to concoct another cozy arrangement for him and his cronies.

Yet, this crisis of leadership precedes Abbas.

The PNC's first meeting was held in Jerusalem in 1964. Since then and for years now, despite the Parliament's many flaws, it serves an important mission. It was a platform for Palestinian political dialogue; and, over the years, it helped define Palestinian national identity and priorities. But gradually, starting with Arafat's elections as the head of the PLO in February 1969, the PNC ceased being a Parliament, and became, more or less, a political rubber stamp that validated all decisions made by Arafat's PLO and, specifically, his Fatah faction.
This has been highlighted repeatedly throughout history with several prominent examples:

On November 12, 1988 the PNC convened in Algiers to approve of a political strategy based on UN Resolutions 242 and 338, the habitual US condition for engaging the PLO. At the end of deliberation and, based on that approval, Arafat announced an independent Palestinian State, to be established in the Occupied Territories, with East Jerusalem as its capital.

Despite this, the US still argued that the PNC statement did not qualify for an 'unconditional' acceptance of Resolution 242, hence pressing Arafat for more concessions. Arafat flew to Geneva and addressed the UN General Assembly on December 13, 1988, since the US refused to grant him an entry visa to speak at the UN Headquarters in New York. He labored to be even more specific.

However, the US maintained its position, compelling Arafat, on the next day, to reiterate the same previous statements, this time, explicitly renouncing "all forms of terrorism, including individual, group or state terrorism."

This was not the only time the PNC and its respected members were dragged into the political gambles of Palestinian leaders. In 1991, they voted in favor of direct negotiations in Madrid between Palestinians and Israel, only to be hoodwinked by Arafat, who negotiated a secret agreement in Oslo that paid little heed to Palestinian consensus. PNC was once more summoned to Gaza in 1996 to omit parts of the Palestinian Charter deemed unacceptable by Netanyahu and the then

US President, Bill Clinton. As PNC members voted, Clinton, present at the meeting, nodded in agreement.

But unlike Arafat's misuse of democracy and manipulation of the PNC—which is no longer representative or, with its current factional makeup is, frankly, irrelevant—Abbas' game is even more dangerous.

Arafat used the Council to ratify or push his own agenda, which he mistakenly deemed suitable for Palestinian interests. Abbas' agenda, however, is entirely personal, entirely elitist and entirely corrupt. Worse, it comes at a time when Palestinian unity is not just a matter of smart strategy, but is critical in the face of the conceivable collapse of the entire Palestinian national project

There is no doubt that the moment when Abbas exits the scene has arrived. That could either become a transition into yet another sorry legacy of an undemocratic Palestinian leadership or it could serve as an opportunity for Palestinians, fed up with the endemic corruption, political tribalism and across-the-board failure, to step forward and challenge the moral collapse of the Palestinian Authority and the charade of self-serving 'democracy' of factions and individuals.

Subject:	[Iran] Our visit to the White House yesterday

VoteVets.org
Country. Service. Action.

John -

VoteVets supporter and Gold Star Mom Karen Meredith made a promise to her son when she buried him after he was killed in Iraq 11 years ago. Her promise was that she would do everything she could to ensure no other mother had to go through the pain she felt at that moment.

Yesterday afternoon she fulfilled that promise.

I was honored to join Karen, VoteVets supporter and Gold Star Mom Michelle DeFord, Major General (Ret.) Paul Eaton, Colonel (Ret.) Lawrence Wilkerson, Petty Officer (Ret.) Rick Hegdahl and a number of other veterans at the White House to meet in person with President Obama and Secretary Kerry in support of a diplomacy-first approach with Iran that will keep them from obtaining a nuclear weapon, and us out of another war in the Middle East.

And when I had my chance to talk to the President and Secretary Kerry -- the first thing I did was tell them about the hundreds of thousands of veterans, military family members, and VoteVets supporters who stood with them on this issue for the better part of two years.

It was an important week for VoteVets: not only did our work directly help to stop attempts to scuttle the historic agreement that will prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, but VoteVets led a delegation to the Capitol where we met with Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and thirty representatives supporting the agreement, and we also stopped by a number of congressional offices to carry your voices with us in conversations with other members who were still on the fence.

This victory for the safety and security of our nation, and members of our military, would not have been possible with the work and commitment of over 100,000 veterans, military family members, and VoteVets supporters who made their voices heard on this issue.

Help us continue our work on behalf of veterans and military family members with a $3 contribution to VoteVets today.

(President Obama embraces VoteVets supporter and Gold Star Mom Michelle DeFord in the White House)

President Obama said it best at our meeting:

"These veterans have come together in their defense of our national security. They believe in maintaining the strongest military the world has ever known. They are proud of our military capabilities and recognize that there are times when it is necessary that we take military action. But what they also understand is that American power relies as well on strong and principled diplomacy."

We were proud to support him in this effort -- even as outside groups poured millions of dollars into stopping the deal. By elevating the voices of veterans in this debate, we were able to successfully articulate a vision for America's role in the world that doesn't always rely on military power first, but recognizes diplomacy as a powerful tool as well.

We are the only progressive veterans group who could have stepped in to fill this much needed role. VoteVets' veterans from every state and congressional district in the country participated in our campaign to support this agreement. That's something we can ALL be proud of.

Help VoteVets continue our work with a $3 contribution today.

It's been an exciting few days in Washington, D.C. And I want you to know that every minute I was here, meeting with members of congress, and even in the White House, I was thinking of each and every one of you who made this important victory for the future of our country possible.

This moment belongs to all of us.

All my best,

Jon Soltz

Sen. McCain offers $300 million prize for new auto battery (AP 6/23/08)
By Glen Johnson
John McCain hopes to solve the country's energy crisis with cold hard cash. The bounty would equate to $1 for every man, woman and child in the country, "a small price to pay for helping to break the back of our oil dependency," McCain said in remarks prepared for delivery Monday at Fresno State University in California.

By Sasha Issenberg
In November 1974, a year and a half after his release as a prisoner of war, John McCain traveled to Saigon to visit the South Vietnamese army war college, where he delivered a half-hearted pep talk to allies he knew were about to get routed. Six months later, Saigon fell to the North Vietnamese army, marking the war's end.

McCain Driving Debate, But Some Fear Swerving (Washington Post 6/22/08)
By Michael D. Shear and Juliet Eilperin
John McCain has demonstrated a knack for driving the daily political debate, forcing his opponent to respond to a challenge to meet in town hall debates, accusing him of being "delusional" about terrorism and saying he flip-flopped on public financing for his campaign. But even as McCain's strategists claim tactical victories, Republicans outside the campaign worry that underlying weaknesses in its organization and message are costing him valuable time to make the case for his own candidacy.

How McCain's Public Financing Two-Step Helps Obama (ABC News Blog 6/22/08)
By Jake Tapper
...At the beginning of 2007, McCain suggested that he would be interested in entering into the public financing system for the general election. But for the primaries, he was planning on raising $100 million of private funds and opting out. That became a problem last summer, when his campaign all but disintegrated and had very little money...Democrats charged that McCain had used his ability to qualify for federal matching funds as collateral, but the bank and McCain's lawyers said that was not true.

Drill Deeper (Washington Post 6/22/08)

IF THERE IS a silver lining in the price of gasoline shooting past $4 a gallon, it's that it has sparked an intense debate in the United States about its energy security -- or lack thereof. President Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) have given the impression that relief for drivers lies in off-shore drilling and the construction of nuclear power plants. In fact, those solutions wouldn't produce results for years.

What Obama Should Say On Iraq (Newsweek 6/30/08)

Now That We've 'Won,' Let's Come Home (NYT 6/22/08)

By Frank Rich

...In America, the war has been a settled issue since early 2007. No matter what has happened in Iraq since then, no matter what anyone on any side of the Iraq debate has had to say about it, polls have consistently found that a majority of Americans judge the war a mistake and want out...The good news for Democrats — and the big opportunity for Barack Obama — is that John McCain and the war's last cheerleaders don't recognize that immutable reality. They're so barricaded in their own Vietnam bunker that they think the country is too.

There's little dispute in Republican circles that Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty is the leading candidate at the moment to be selected as John McCain's running mate. Yesterday we made the case for Pawlenty as the right pick; today we argue the opposite.

Lieberman's Costly Support for McCain (Time 6/22/08)

By Jay Newton-Small

Joe Lieberman is having a not-so-secret affair on his political spouse of the past four decades. The Connecticut Senator — now an independent, but until 2006 a staunch Democrat, married to the party — is not just campaigning for presumptive Republican nominee John McCain; he is, to even the most objective eye, in a deep state of rapture.

We're in the thick of a pretty intense presidential campaign, but that doesn't mean all the scores from the 2004 election have been settled. Veterans who served with John Kerry during the Vietnam War released a letter and documents last week that they hoped would put the lie to claims that his Navy service was anything less than exemplary.

3 in 10 Americans Admit to Race Bias (Washington Post 6/22/08)

S.As Sen. While fewer whites, about two-thirds, said they would be "entirely comfortable" with it, that was more than double the percentage of all adults who said they would be so at ease with someone entering office for the first time at age 72, which McCain (R-Ariz.) would do should he prevail in November.

Document attached, 2016 highlights below:

Fox News' Fox and Friends: 10 minute segment with Rick Perry. Perry said private companies, the US government, and foreign allies should work together more closely on cyber-security; Perry said allies aren't sure if they can trust the US, particularly Israel, given US involvement in Iran nuclear talks; Perry said the US can eliminate ISIS with the help of Middle East allies, but they will have to learn they can trust us first; quoted Tony Blinken that our plan to eliminate ISIS is working; Perry said we had the opportunity to eliminate ISIS and Assad several years ago, but POTUS is more interested in making a deal with Iran than combating ISIS with regional allies; Perry said the government is allowing some veterans to fall through the cracks, as demonstrated by the VA scandal, and that's one of the reasons he's running for president; Perry deflected as to whether Bush made his announcement yesterday to draw attention away from Perry's announcement; quoted HRC, saying a Federal Court declared voting restrictions signed into law by Perry purposely discriminated against minority voters, and that Perry applauded the gutting of the Voting Rights Act; Perry said it makes sense to have to show an I.D. in order to vote; Perry and hosts mocked HRC about flying on a private plane, rather than commercial; Perry said HRC is taking on the people of Texas, and "dissed" the people of Texas with her remarks about their voting I.D. laws; Perry said he's empowered minorities across the state; Perry said Texas has the highest high school graduation rates for Blacks and Hispanics in America.

CNN's New Day: Segment on HRC's voting rights speech. CNN reporters claim that HRC is calling for drastic change to current voting laws. Reporters state that voting actions are done state by state, and that it may be difficult for HRC to actually act upon this. They claim that this proposal is very bold, but also common sense. The United States has needed laws to make voting easier and more continent for people. Reporters question whether or not she will be able to deliver upon her suggested proposals. Reporters state that during her speech she called out her Republican opponents, but this may have legitimatized them instead of hurting them. Reporters claim that HRC has had a switching political issues record with her changing her attitudes towards issues frequently. For example, reporters claimed that HRC went from not supporting driver's licenses for illegal immigrants to supporting drivers licenses for illegal immigrants. HRC has gone from believing that same sex marriage is a state by state issue to believing that it is a constitutional right. Rick Perry claims that he will be very different this time around. Reporters say that Rick Perry cannot be counted out. Reporters claim that he is a great retail politician. CNN reporters claim that Perry could do well in some of the early states. Rick Perry is maybe the only candidate who is leading with every type of voter in the Republican Party.

MSNBC's Morning Joe: Began show discussing Rick Perry's announcement and chances in the Republican primary. Noted Rubio's gaffe on Iraq again and discussed the contrast between Rubio and Bush. Moved on to Martin O'Malley and the article about a centrist Democratic Party and mentioned he is trying to run a campaign left of HRC but Sanders already occupies that position. Martin O'Malley hopes to win by running as a progressive alternative to HRC. Showed clip of his announcement speech. Talked about the 2007 WaPo op-ed that he wrote with Harold Ford entitled "Our Chance to Capture the Center." Read a quote from the article. This seems to be an indication that the party has moved left, you don't have voters in the primary interested in a centrist-Clinton type. Interesting contrast between what O'Malley was saying a few years ago and what he's saying now. It reflects the reality, where is he going to run against HRC if not to her left? She can move to the center more easily. Argued Sanders has more built-in support and "strikes a nerve with the Democratic left that O'Malley is still struggling to hit." Think neither is a huge threat to HRC but Sanders will get more traction.

Mme Secretary:

Below is the NYT story on the book. It is very long and convoluted. The story makes our fundamental claim that neither they nor the author has any evidence to support the book's charges, and includes the relevant State Department official saying you did not weigh in on the decision. It is still unfair and misleading.

OUR RESPONSE

We got a few stories placed today debunking claims in the book ahead of the NYT story,
Attached is the memo cataloging the debunking stories that we are sending tonight to our friends and allies. We are also leaking this response document to the press so it gets more circulation. We are also posting the memo on our Facebook page.

In a separate email, I will forward to this group the memo we sent to the NYT that outlines our case. We will also post this document on our Facebook page.

Because the stories broke late, morning shows did not ask for guests. But I have asked Jeremy Bash and Tommy Vietor to go on cable tomorrow for us to respond to the book. I think they will both be good at dismissing the charges as ridiculous. At this point, I think they are better surrogates than Senators, because they can do the political response better. But please let me know if any of you have other ideas for surrogates. Also - if you have other questions or concerns or ideas on the story overall.

Thanks, Jen

Cash Flowed to Clinton Foundation as Russians Pressed for Control of Uranium Company

The headline in Pravda trumpeted President Vladimir V. Putin’s latest coup, its nationalistic fervor recalling an era when the newspaper served as the official mouthpiece of the Kremlin: “Russian Nuclear Energy Conquers the World.”

The article, in January 2013, detailed how the Russian atomic energy agency, Rosatom, had taken over a Canadian company with uranium-mining stakes stretching from Central Asia to the American West. The deal made Rosatom one of the world's largest uranium producers and brought Mr. Putin closer to his goal of controlling much of the global uranium supply chain.

But the untold story behind that story is one that involves not just the Russian president, but also a former American president and a woman who would like to be the next one.

At the heart of the tale are several men, leaders of the Canadian mining industry, who have been major donors to the charitable endeavors of former President Bill Clinton and his family. Members of that group built, financed and eventually sold off to the Russians a company that would become known as Uranium One.

Beyond mines in Kazakhstan that are among the most lucrative in the world, the sale gave the Russians control of one-fifth of all uranium production capacity in the United States. Since uranium is considered a strategic asset, with implications for national security, the deal had to be approved by a committee composed of representatives from a number of United States government agencies. Among the agencies that eventually signed off was the State Department, then headed by Mr. Clinton's wife, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

As the Russians gradually assumed control of Uranium One in three separate transactions from 2009 to 2013, Canadian records show, a flow of cash made its way to the Clinton Foundation. Uranium One's chairman used his family foundation to make four donations totaling $2.35 million. Those contributions were not publicly disclosed by the Clintons, despite an agreement Mrs. Clinton had struck with the Obama White House to publicly identify all donors. Other people with ties to the company made donations as well.

And shortly after the Russians announced their intention to acquire a majority stake in Uranium One, Mr. Clinton received $500,000 for a Moscow speech from a Russian investment bank with links to the Kremlin that was promoting Uranium One stock.

At the time, both Rosatom and the United States government made promises intended to ease concerns about ceding control of the company's assets to the Russians. Those promises have been repeatedly broken, records show.

Graphic | Donations to the Clinton Foundation, and a Russian Uranium Takeover Uranium investors' efforts to buy mining assets in Kazakhstan and the United States led to a takeover bid by a Russian state-owned energy company. The investors gave millions to the Clinton Foundation over the same period, while Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's office was involved with approving the Russian bid.

The New York Times's examination of the Uranium One deal is based on dozens of interviews, as well as a review of public records and securities filings in Canada, Russia and the United States. Some of the connections between Uranium One and the Clinton Foundation were unearthed by Peter Schweizer, a former fellow at the right-leaning Hoover Institution and author of the forthcoming book "Clinton Cash." Mr. Schweitzer provided a preview of material in the book to The Times, which scrutinized his information and built upon it with its own reporting.

Whether the donations played any role in the approval of the uranium deal is unknown. But the episode underscores the special ethical challenges presented by the Clinton Foundation, headed by a former president who relied heavily on foreign cash to accumulate $250 million in assets even as his wife helped steer American foreign policy as secretary of state, presiding over decisions with the potential to benefit the foundation's donors.

In a statement, Brian Fallon, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign, said no one "has ever produced a shred of evidence supporting the theory that Hillary Clinton ever took action as secretary of state to support the interests of donors to the Clinton Foundation." He emphasized that multiple United States agencies, as well as the Canadian government, had signed off on the deal and that, in general, such matters were handled at a level below the secretary. “To suggest the State Department, under then-Secretary Clinton, exerted undue influence in the U.S. government’s review of the sale of Uranium One is utterly baseless,” he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American political campaigns are barred from accepting foreign donations. But foreigners may give to foundations in the United States. In the days since Mrs. Clinton announced her candidacy for president, the Clinton Foundation has announced changes meant to quell longstanding concerns about potential conflicts of interest in such donations; it has limited donations from foreign governments, with many, like Russia’s, barred from giving to all but its health care initiatives. That policy stops short of Mrs. Clinton’s agreement with the Obama administration, which prohibited all foreign government donations while she served as the nation’s top diplomat.

Either way, the Uranium One deal highlights the limits of such prohibitions. The foundation will continue to accept contributions from foreign individuals and businesses whose interests, like Uranium One’s, may overlap with those of foreign governments, some of which may be at odds with the United States.

When the Uranium One deal was approved, the geopolitical backdrop was far different from today’s. The Obama administration was seeking to “reset” strained relations with Russia. The deal was strategically important to Mr. Putin, who shortly after the Americans gave their blessing sat down for a staged interview with Rosatom’s chief executive, Sergei Kiriyenko. “Few could have imagined in the past that we would own 20 percent of U.S. reserves,” Mr. Kiriyenko told Mr. Putin.

Now, after Russia’s annexation of Crimea and aggression in Ukraine, the Moscow-Washington relationship is devolving toward Cold War levels, a point several experts made in evaluating a deal so beneficial to Mr. Putin, a man known to use energy resources to project power around the world.

“Should we be concerned? Absolutely,” said Michael McFaul, who served under Mrs. Clinton as the American ambassador to Russia but said he had been unaware of the Uranium One deal until asked about it. “Do we want Putin to have a monopoly on this? Of course we don’t. We don’t want to be dependent on Putin for anything in this climate.”

A Seat at the Table

The path to a Russian acquisition of American uranium deposits began in 2005 in Kazakhstan, where the Canadian mining financier Frank Giustra orchestrated his first big uranium deal, with Mr. Clinton at his side.

The two men had flown aboard Mr. Giustra’s private jet to Almaty, Kazakhstan, where they dined with the authoritarian president, Nursultan A. Nazarbayev. Mr. Clinton handed the Kazakh president a propaganda coup when he expressed support for Mr. Nazarbayev’s bid to head an international elections monitoring group, undercutting American foreign policy and criticism of Kazakhstan’s poor human rights record by, among others, his wife, then a senator.

Within days of the visit, Mr. Giustra’s fledgling company, UrAsia Energy Ltd., signed a preliminary deal giving it stakes in three uranium mines controlled by the state-run uranium agency Kazatomprom.

If the Kazakh deal was a major victory, UrAsia did not wait long before resuming the hunt. In 2007, it merged with Uranium One, a South African company with assets in Africa and Australia, in what was described as a $3.5 billion transaction. The new company, which kept the Uranium One name, was controlled by UrAsia investors including Ian Telfer, a Canadian who became chairman. Through a spokeswoman, Mr. Giustra, whose personal stake in the deal was estimated at about $45 million, said he sold his stake in 2007.

Soon, Uranium One began to snap up mining companies with assets in the United States. In April 2007, it announced the purchase of a uranium mill in Utah and more than 38,000 acres of uranium exploration properties in four Western states, followed quickly by the acquisition of the Energy Metals Corporation and its uranium holdings in Wyoming, Texas and Utah. That deal made clear that Uranium One was intent on becoming “a powerhouse in the United States uranium sector with the potential to become the domestic supplier of choice for U.S. utilities,” the company declared.

Still, the company’s story was hardly front-page news in the United States — until early 2008, in the midst of Mrs. Clinton’s failed presidential campaign, when The Times published an article revealing the 2005 trip's link to Mr. Giustra's Kazakhstan mining deal. It also reported that several months later, Mr. Giustra had donated $31.3 million to Mr. Clinton's foundation.

Though the article quoted the former head of Kazatomprom, Moukhtar Dzhakishev, as saying that the deal required government approval and was discussed at a dinner with the president, Mr. Giustra insisted that it was a private transaction, with no need for Mr. Clinton's influence with Kazakh officials. He described his relationship with the former American president as motivated solely by a shared interest in philanthropy.

As if to underscore the point, five months later Mr. Giustra held a fund-raiser for the Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative, a project aimed at fostering progressive environmental and labor practices in the natural resources industry, to which he had pledged $100 million. The star-studded gala, at a conference center in Toronto, featured performances by Elton John and Shakira and celebrities like Tom Cruise, John Travolta and Robin Williams encouraging contributions from the many so-called F.O.F.s — Friends of Frank — in attendance, among them Mr. Telfer. In all, the evening generated $16 million in pledges, according to an article in The Globe and Mail.

"None of this would have been possible if Frank Giustra didn't have a remarkable combination of caring and modesty, of vision and energy and iron determination," Mr. Clinton told those gathered, adding: "I love this guy, and you should, too."

But what had been a string of successes was about to hit a speed bump.

Arrest and Progress

By June 2009, a little over a year after the star-studded evening in Toronto, Uranium One's stock was in free-fall, down 40 percent. Mr. Dzhakishev, the head of Kazatomprom, had just been arrested on charges that he illegally sold uranium deposits to foreign companies, including at least some of those won by Mr. Giustra's UrAsia and now owned by Uranium One.

Publicly, the company tried to reassure shareholders. Its chief executive, Jean Nortier, issued a confident statement calling the situation a "complete misunderstanding." He also publicly contradicted Mr. Giustra's contention that the uranium mining deal had not required government blessing. "When you do a transaction in Kazakhstan, you need the government's approval," he said, adding that UrAsia had indeed received that approval.

But privately, Uranium One officials were worried they could lose their joint mining ventures. American diplomatic cables made public by WikiLeaks also reflect concerns that Mr. Dzhakishev's arrest was part of a Russian power play for control of Kazakh uranium assets.

At the time, Russia was already eying a stake in Uranium One, Rosatom company documents show. Rosatom officials say they were seeking to acquire mines around the world because Russia lacks sufficient domestic reserves to meet its own industry needs.

It was against this backdrop that the Vancouver-based Uranium One pressed the American Embassy in Kazakhstan, as well as Canadian diplomats, to take up its cause with Kazakh officials, according to the American cables.

"We want more than a statement to the press," Paul Clarke, a Uranium One executive vice president, told the embassy's energy officer on June 10, the officer reported in a cable. "That is simply chitchat." What the company needed, Mr. Clarke said, was official written confirmation that the licenses were still valid.

The American Embassy ultimately reported to the secretary of state, Mrs. Clinton. Though the Clarke cable was copied to her, it was given wide circulation, and it is unclear if she would have read it; the Clinton campaign did not address questions about the cable. .

What is clear is that the embassy acted, with the cables showing that the unnamed energy officer met with Kazakh officials to discuss the issue on June 10 and 11.

Three days later, a wholly owned subsidiary of Rosatom completed a deal for 17 percent of Uranium One. And within a year, the Russian government would substantially up the ante, with a generous offer to shareholders that would give it a 51 percent controlling stake. But first, Uranium One had to get the American government to sign off on the deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Power to Say No

When a company controlled by the Chinese government sought a 51 percent stake in a tiny Nevada gold mining operation in 2009, it set off a secretive review process in Washington, where officials raised concerns primarily about the mine's proximity to a military installation, but also about the potential for minerals at the site, including uranium, to come under Chinese control. The officials killed the deal.

Such is the power of the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States. The committee comprises some of the most powerful members of the cabinet, including the attorney general, the secretaries of the Treasury, Defense, Homeland Security, Commerce and Energy, and the secretary of state. They are charged with reviewing any deal that could result in foreign control of an American business or asset deemed important to national security.

The national security issue at stake in the Uranium One deal was not primarily about nuclear weapons proliferation; the United States and Russia had for years cooperated on that front, with Russia sending enriched fuel from decommissioned warheads to be used in American nuclear power plants in return for raw uranium. Instead, it concerned American dependence on foreign uranium sources. While the United States gets one-fifth of its electrical power from nuclear plants, it produces only around 20 percent of the uranium it needs, and most plants have only 18 to 36 months of reserves, according to Marin Katusa, author of "The Colder War: How the Global Energy Trade Slipped From America's Grasp."

"The Russians are easily winning the uranium war, and nobody's talking about it," said Mr. Katusa, who explores the implications of the Uranium One deal in his book. "It's not just a domestic issue but a foreign policy issue, too."

When ARMZ, an arm of Rosatom, took its first 17 percent stake in Uranium One in 2009, the two parties signed an agreement, found in securities filings, to seek the foreign investment committee's review. But it was the 2010 deal, giving the Russians a controlling 51 percent stake, that set off alarm bells. Four members of the House of Representatives signed a letter expressing concern. Two more began pushing legislation to kill the deal.

Senator John Barrasso, a Republican from Wyoming, where Uranium One's largest American operation was, wrote to President Obama, saying the deal "would give the Russian government control over a sizable portion of America's uranium production capacity."

"Equally alarming," Mr. Barrasso added, "this sale gives ARMZ a significant stake in uranium mines in Kazakhstan."

Uranium One's shareholders were also alarmed, and were "afraid of Rosatom as a Russian state giant," Sergei Novikov, a company spokesman, recalled in an interview. He said Rosatom's chief, Mr. Kiriyenko, sought to reassure Uranium One investors, promising that Rosatom would not break up the company and would keep the same management, including Mr. Telfer, the chairman. Another Rosatom official said publicly that it did not intend to increase its investment beyond 51 percent, and that it envisioned keeping Uranium One a public company

American nuclear officials, too, seemed eager to assuage fears. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission wrote to Senator Barrasso assuring him that American uranium would be preserved for domestic use, regardless of who owned it.

"In order to export uranium from the United States, Uranium One Inc. or ARMZ would need to apply for and obtain a specific NRC license authorizing the export of uranium for use reactor fuel," the letter said.

Still, the ultimate authority to approve or reject the Russian acquisition rested with the cabinet officials on the foreign investment committee, including Mrs. Clinton — whose husband was collecting millions of dollars in donations from people associated with Uranium One.

Undisclosed Donations

Before Mrs. Clinton could assume her post as secretary of state, the White House demanded that she sign a memorandum of understanding placing limits on her husband's foundation's activities. To avoid the perception of conflicts of interest, beyond the ban on foreign government donations, the foundation was required to publicly disclose all contributors.

To judge from those disclosures — which list the contributions in ranges rather than precise amounts — the only Uranium One official to give to the Clinton Foundation was Mr. Telfer, the chairman, and the amount was relatively small: no more than $250,000, and that was in 2007, before talk of a Rosatom deal began percolating.

But a review of tax records in Canada, where Mr. Telfer has a family charity called the Fernwood Foundation, shows that he donated millions of dollars more, during and after the critical time when the foreign investment committee was reviewing his deal with the Russians. With the Russians offering a special dividend, shareholders like Mr. Telfer stood to profit.

His donations through the Fernwood Foundation included $1 million reported in 2009, the year his company appealed to the American Embassy to help it keep its mines in Kazakhstan; $250,000 in 2010, the year the Russians sought majority control; as well as $600,000 in 2011; and $500,000 in 2012. Mr. Telfer said that his donations had nothing to do with his business dealings, and that he had never discussed Uranium One with Mr. or Mrs. Clinton. He said he had given the money because he wanted to support Mr. Giustra's charitable endeavors with Mr. Clinton. "Frank and I have been friends and business partners for almost 20 years," he said.

The Clinton campaign left it to the foundation to reply to questions about the Fernwood donations; the foundation did not provide a response.

Mr. Telfer's undisclosed donations came in addition to between $1.3 million and $5.6 million in contributions, which were reported, from a constellation of people with ties to Uranium One or UrAsia, the company that originally acquired Uranium One's most valuable asset: the Kazakhstan mines. Without those assets, the Russians would have had no interest in the deal: "It wasn't the goal to buy the Wyoming mines. The goal was to acquire the Kazakh assets, which are very good," Mr. Novikov, the Rosatom spokesman, said in an interview.

Amid this influx of Uranium One-connected money, Mr. Clinton was invited to speak in Moscow in June 2010, the same month Rosatom struck its deal for a majority stake in Uranium One.

The $500,000 fee — among Mr. Clinton's highest — was paid by Renaissance Capital, a Russian investment bank with ties to the Kremlin that has invited world leaders, including Tony Blair, the former British prime minister, to speak at its annual investor conference.

Renaissance Capital analysts talked up Uranium One's stock, assigning it a "buy" rating and saying in a July 2010 research report that it was "the best play" in the uranium markets. In addition, Renaissance Capital turned up that same year as a major donor, along with Mr. Telfer and Mr. Giustra, to a small medical charity in Colorado run by a friend of Mr. Giustra's. In a newsletter to supporters, the friend credited Mr. Giustra with helping get donations from "businesses around the world."

A Renaissance Capital representative would not comment on the genesis of Mr. Clinton's speech to an audience that included leading Russian officials, or on whether it was connected to the Rosatom deal. According to a Russian government news service, Mr. Putin personally thanked Mr. Clinton for speaking.

A person with knowledge of the Clinton Foundation's fund-raising operation, who requested anonymity to speak candidly about it, said that for many people, the hope is that money will in fact buy influence: "Why do you think they are doing it — because they love them?" But whether it actually does is another question. And in this case, there were broader geopolitical pressures that likely came into play as the United States considered whether to approve the Rosatom-Uranium One deal.

Diplomatic Considerations

If doing business with Rosatom was good for those involved with the Uranium One deal, engaging with Russia was also a priority of the incoming Obama administration, which was hoping for a new era of cooperation as Mr. Putin relinquished the presidency — if only for a term — to Dmitri A. Medvedev.

"The assumption was we could engage Russia to further core U.S. national security interests," said Mr. McFaul, the former ambassador.

It started out well. The two countries made progress on nuclear proliferation issues, and expanded use of Russian territory to resupply American forces in Afghanistan. Keeping Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon was among the United States' top priorities, and in June 2010 Russia signed off on a United Nations resolution imposing tough new sanctions on that country.

Two months later, the deal giving ARMZ a controlling stake in Uranium One was submitted to the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States for review. Because of the secrecy surrounding the process, it is hard to know whether the participants weighed the desire to improve bilateral relations against the potential risks of allowing the Russian government to control over the biggest uranium producer in the United States The deal was ultimately approved in October, following what two people involved in securing the approval said had been a relatively smooth process.

Not all of the committee's decisions are personally debated by the agency heads themselves; in less controversial cases, deputy or assistant secretaries may sign off. But experts and former committee members say Russia's interest in Uranium One and its American uranium reserves seemed to warrant attention at the highest levels.

"This deal had generated press, it had captured the attention of Congress and it was strategically important," said Richard Russell, who served on the committee during the George W. Bush administration. "When I was there invariably any one of those conditions would cause this to get pushed way up the chain, and here you had all three."

And Mrs. Clinton brought a reputation for hawkishness to the process; as a senator, she was a vocal critic of the committee's approval of a deal that would have transferred the management of major American seaports to a company based in the United Arab Emirates, and as a presidential candidate she had advocated legislation to strengthen the process.

The Clinton campaign spokesman, Mr. Fallon, said that in general, these matters did not rise to the secretary's level. He would not comment on whether Mrs. Clinton had been briefed on the matter, but he gave The Times a statement from the former assistant secretary assigned to the foreign investment committee at the time, Jose Fernandez. While not addressing the specifics of the Uranium One deal, Mr. Fernandez said, "Mrs. Clinton never intervened with me on any C.F.I.U.S. matter."

Mr. Fallon also noted that if any agency had raised national security concerns about the Uranium One deal, it could have taken them directly to the president.

Anne-Marie Slaughter, the State Department's director of policy planning at the time, said she was unaware of the transaction — or the extent to which it made Russia a dominant uranium supplier. But speaking generally, she urged caution in evaluating its wisdom in hindsight.

"Russia was not a country we took lightly at the time or thought was cuddly," she said. "But it wasn't the adversary it is today."

That renewed adversarial relationship has raised concerns about European dependency on Russian energy resources, including nuclear fuel. The unease reaches beyond diplomatic circles. In Wyoming, where Uranium One equipment is scattered across his 35,000-acre ranch, John Christensen is frustrated that repeated changes in corporate ownership over the years led to French, South African, Canadian and, finally, Russian control over mining rights on his property.

"I hate to see a foreign government own mining rights here in the United States," he said. "I don't think that should happen."

Mr. Christensen, 65, noted that despite assurances by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission that uranium could not leave the country without Uranium One or ARMZ obtaining an export license — which they do not have — yellowcake from his property was routinely packed into drums and trucked off to a processing plant in Canada.

Asked about that, the commission confirmed that Uranium One has, in fact, shipped yellowcake to Canada even though it does not have an export license. Instead, the transport company doing the shipping, RSB Logistic Services, has the license. A commission spokesman said that "to the best of our knowledge" most of the uranium sent to Canada for processing was returned for use in the United States. A Uranium One spokeswoman, Donna Wichers, said 25 percent had gone to Western Europe and Japan. At the moment, with the uranium market in a downturn, nothing is being shipped from the Wyoming mines.

The “no export” assurance given at the time of the Rosatom deal is not the only one that turned out to be less than it seemed. Despite pledges to the contrary, Uranium One was eventually delisted from the Toronto Stock Exchange and taken private. As of 2013, Rosatom’s subsidiary, ARMZ, owned 100 percent of the company.

John: Re our previous exchange of e-mails, I have taken the 25 pages of Chapter 3 of "Hard Choices" and boiled them down to 2 pages which surrogates hopefully could use when talking about HRC's record. Please be frank and let me know whether it would be useful to do the same with the rest of the book. If it is not useful, please say so...it will save me a lot of time doing the rest of the book. Warmest regards. Les Hyman

ASIA: THE PIVOT

Upon becoming Secretary of State, HRC broke precedent by focusing initially on the AsiaPacific region that is home to more than half the world's population, including several of our most trusted allies and valuable trading partners. She made her first trip as Secretary to Japan, then on to Indonesia, South Korea and finally China in order to send a message to Asia and the world that America was back.

HRC believed that the U.S. should be doing more to manage our increasingly complex relationship with China. Her goal was a sophisticated strategy that encouraged China to participate as a responsible member of the international community, while standing firm in defense of our values and interests.

Her initial task was to reassert America as a Pacific power without sparking an unnecessary confrontation with China. While previously American attention had focused on Northeast Asia because of our troop commitments in Japan and South Korea, countries like Indonesia, Malaysia, and Vietnam were growing in economic and strategic importance but were not receiving the attention of the U.S. so HRC went there.

HRC's unique methodology was to get out beyond Foreign Ministries and palaces and instead meet with citizens, especially community activists and volunteers; journalists; students and professors; business, labor and religious leaders, all part of the civil societies that help hold governments accountable and drive social change. HRC's many meetings with civil societies in the Asia-Pacific area, many of which previously had been ignored, made countless friends for the United States.

No previous U.S. Secretary of State ever had visited the headquarters of ASEAN (the Association of Southeast Asian Nations) located in Jakarta (Indonesia). HRC was the first. Previous American officials had skipped ASEAN conferences which some saw as a sign of America's flagging presence in the Asia-Pacific, even as China was seeking to expand its influence. After HRC went to the ASEAN headquarters, the Secretary-General of ASEAN said about HRC: "Your visit shows the seriousness of the United States to end its diplomatic absenteeism in the region".

In her visit to South Korea, a wealthy and advanced democracy, and in meetings with President Lee Myung-bak, HRC restated the commitment of the U.S. to that country which lived in the shadow of North Korea, a repressive and bellicose neighbor to the north.

In March of 2009, a crew of American TV journalists were reporting from the border between China and North Korea. Two of the women reporters were arrested and dragged back to North Korea where they were sentenced to 12 years of hard labor. HRS spent hours on the phone with leaders in Beijing, Moscow, Tokyo and other capitals drumming up support for a strong UN resolution imposing sanctions on the regime in Pyongyang. Her efforts paid off when all the members of the UN Security Council agreed to impose additional sanctions on North Korea (the toughest measure ever imposed on that country). They resulted in Kim Il -Sung saying that he would release the women journalists if he received a personal visit from Bill Clinton. Many in the White House opposed sending the former President, but HRC convinced President Obama to do what was necessary to rescue the two innocent American civilians. Clinton went, and In 20 hours the American journalists were released.

Another part of HRC's strategy was to bring India more fully into the Asian-Pacific political scene. Having another large democracy with a full seat at the table in the region could help encourage more countries to move toward political and economic openness, rather than follow China's example of autocratic state capitalism.

As an example of her strategy, HRC traveled to the Indian port city of Chennai on the Bay of Bengal, a commercial hub that looks out toward the vibrant trade and energy routes of Southeast Asia. She wanted to show that the U.S. understood that India was more than Delhi and Mumbai. She spoke about India's role in the Asia-Pacific region, stating that the strategic fundamentals of our relationship with India -- shared democratic values, economic imperatives, and diplomatic priorities -- were pushing both countries' interests into closer convergence.

While China's rise and its mix of authoritarianism and state capitalism offered an attractive example to some Asian countries, HRC cited many counterexamples to disprove those theories, to wit: Japan, Malaysia, South Korea, Indonesia and Taiwan were all democratic societies that delivered tremendous economic benefits to their people.

In July of 2012, HRC took an extended tour across the Asian-Pacific region to emphasize that democracy and prosperity go hand in hand. She started in Japan, one of the strongest and richest democracies in the world, and then visited Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos where she became the first Secretary of State to step foot in that country in fifty-seven years.

A major goal of U.S. strategy in Asia was to promote political reform as well as economic growth. Everywhere Secretary Clinton went she pledged that the United States would be a strong partner to all those across Asia and the world who were dedicated to human rights and fundamental freedoms. A Washington Post editorial declared that HRC's speech had offered "hope that the U.S. pivot to Asia will go beyond simple muscle-flexing and become a multi-layered approach to match the complexity of China's rise as a modern superpower."

After Rocket, Israel Revokes Entry Permits for Gazans

Israel said Wednesday it was revoking permits for 500 Palestinians from the Gaza Strip to enter Jerusalem ahead of Friday prayers because of rocket fire from the Palestinian enclave. A spokeswoman for COGAT, the Defense Ministry unit which coordinates with Gaza and the West Bank, told AFP the repealing of some measures that eased restrictions on Palestinians during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan applied to this week only and was "because of the rocket" which hit southern Israel on Tuesday night, causing no injuries. Defense Minister Ya'alon said Israel had destroyed the rocket launcher and canceled "some of the Ramadan reliefs to Gazas."

UN Chief Urges Israel to Restore Travel Permits

UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged Israel on Wednesday to ease restrictions on travel for Palestinian Arabs during the month of Ramadan, hours after Israel announced it was revoking permits for 500 Gazans to enter Jerusalem for prayers because of the latest rocket attacks. Ban "welcomes Israel's measures to ease some restrictions on Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza," Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs Jeffrey Feltman told the Security Council, according to AFP. The cancellations of travel permits announced on Wednesday only applied to this week, Israel said, and it should resume next week allowing up to 800 Gazans to travel for prayers to the Al-Aqsa Mosque.

Israel: Abbas Preventing Easing Measures

Jerusalem police are ready to implement easing measures to thousands of Muslim worshipers expected to arrive during the month of Ramadan to pray on the Temple Mount. The measures include allowing for the entry of hundreds of buses from the Palestinian Authority without waiting or checking at the entrance points to the capital, thus preventing long lines at the entrance to the Temple Mount. The Ministry of Public Security said that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas chose to prevent of exemptions. Coordinator of Govt' Activities in the Territories, Yoav Mordechai, said to Palestinian news agency "Ma'an" and stated the Authority is not helping advance the process.

Former Obama aides: US Needs Tougher Iran Deal

A group of prominent American security advisers, including five with ties to President Barack Obama's first term, warned on Wednesday that a deal on curbing Iran's nuclear program was at risk of failing to provide adequate safeguards. In an open letter, the group of former US officials and foreign policy experts cautioned that an Iran nuclear deal would "fall short of meeting the administration's own standard of a 'good' agreement" unless it included a tougher line on United Nations nuclear inspections and conditions for sanctions relief.

Mazuz to Arab MKs: Thank Us for Your Citizenship

Deputy Interior Minister Yaron Mazuz (Likud) caused an uproar in the Knesset on Wednesday when told Arab MK Hanin Zoabi that the State of Israel was "doing you a favor in giving you ID cards" during a discussion on the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law. Mayhem broke out following the controversial remarks, with MK Michal Rozin (Meretz) walking up to the podium with her ID card, while others demanded Mazuz to apologize. Mazuz's refused to apologize for his remarks and said: "Anyone who supports terrorism won't be here." Prime Minister Netanyahu then took to the podium, saying: "I am talking about the issue of hypocrisy. You have the right to be elected or say these things, and the right is given, and we will protect that right. But we don't have to agree with the hypocrisy. I didn't hear condemnations from the MKs here on the real war crimes happening in Syria, and Yemen. I didn't hear a word on these issues, all I hear is false preaching against IDF soldiers."

Ex-U.S. Envoy Dan Kurtzer Blasts Oren's Criticism

Former U.S. Ambassador to Israel Daniel Kurtzer published a scathing rebuttal on his Facebook page to the criticism recently directed at the Obama administration by MK Michael Oren, and suggested Israel's former ambassador to the U.S. was blatantly ignoring the facts to further his political career. "Oren is a well-trained historian," wrote Kurtzer, "but his op-eds are replete with factual errors; and the judgments he derives from what he purports to be "facts" seem strange. Did he form judgments and then jerry-rig the facts to fit his case? It appears so, but that is what is so sad." Kurtzer argued that Oren's "astounding and confounding" statements show he failed to understand and carry out his responsibilities. "If Oren had been a politician during these years," wrote Kurtzer, "then his views, however mistaken, would matter little. But part of his job was to help his own government understand us and our government, and we now see that he failed miserably on both counts."

PM Meets Leaders of Druze Public amid Tensions

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with leaders of Israel's Druze community on Wednesday, to discuss the tensions surrounding the recent events in the Golan Heights. Also present at the meeting were Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon, IDF Chief of Staff Gadi Eizenkot, Interior Minister Gilad Erdan, and Police Commissioner Yohanan Danino. Addressing the gathering, Netanyahu stressed the need to prevent the recurrence of events such as happened on Monday, when a mob of Druze protesters attacked an IDF ambulance that was transporting two Syrian war casualties to an Israeli hospital, killing one and critically injuring the other - as well as lightly wounding several IDF soldiers. "Your sons, all of our sons, serve and fight in the IDF and defend the nation" Netanyahu said. "All of us obey the law and all of us are loyal citizens, butit is our duty of course to condemn that and to make sure these lawbreakers will not turn such things to a norm."

The U.N.'s Israel Inquisition

Another skewed report that blames the Jewish state for war crimes.

Editorial

U.N. reports on Israel sometimes remind us of the classic Monty Python sketch "Nobody Expects the Spanish Inquisition!" with its screwball combination of comic ineptitude and malignant predictability. So it is with Monday's inquisi—er, "Inquiry"—by the U.N. Human Rights Council on last summer's war between Israel and its terrorist enemies in Gaza.

The 183-page report, from former New York State Justice Mary McGowan Davis and Senegalese lawyer Doudou Diene, purports to be even-handed by citing both Israel and Hamas for possible war crimes and violations of international law. That's something of an achievement for the Council, which has a lopsided record of condemning Israel and whose current members include Qatar, Russia and Venezuela.

Yet the report is fundamentally an anti-Israel document. The bias begins with a preposterous claim that Israel continues to "occupy" Gaza, despite its 2005 withdrawal, on the theory that Israel has the capacity "to send troops within a reasonable time to make its power felt." By that standard, the U.S. occupies Canada and the Bahamas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The report accuses Israel of using "disproportionate" force and targeting residential buildings, while playing down that Hamas made a point of operating from civilian areas as a shield against Israeli retaliation and to flaunt civilian casualties. It also indicts Israel by way of unconfirmed assumptions submitted as evidence of guilt, as in this gem: "Given the absence of information suggesting in each case that the anticipated military advantage at the time of the [Israeli] attack was such that the expected civilian casualties and damage to the targeted and surrounding buildings were not excessive, there are strong indications that these attacks could be disproportionate, and therefore amount to a war crime."

Israel refused to cooperate with the inquiry, since there was little question what its conclusions would be. A similar inquiry into the 2008-2009 Gaza war, led by South African jurist Richard Goldstone, charged Israel with war crimes and potential crimes against humanity—only to be later recanted by Mr. Goldstone in a newspaper op-ed. The current inquiry was initially going to be chaired by Canadian academic William Schabas—until it turned out he had been paid to consult for the Palestinians.

This is typical of the U.N., but it's not trivial. As Benjamin Wittes and Yishai Schwartz noted Wednesday in the Lawfare blog, "approaches [to International Humanitarian Law] that begin as a way of constraining Israeli military action quickly migrate to constraining U.S. military action." That goes especially for the Gaza inquiry's presumption that the Israeli military must furnish proof that its targets have military value, or otherwise be suspected of war crimes.

The Obama Administration says it will oppose bringing the report to the U.N. Security Council, but it lent legitimacy to the enterprise when it joined the Human Rights Council after the Bush Administration had stayed away. If the President wants to demonstrate his support for Israel, one place to start would be to withdraw from the Council for producing this shameful report.

What war crimes did Israel commit in Gaza?

While world powers are exempted from investigation and punishment, and tyrant regimes in Africa and in the Middle East are reprimanded from time to time but don't give a damn, Israel is stuck in a bad place in the middle.

By Nahum Barnea

I beg the forgiveness of the distinguished members of the human rights community, but the talk about war crimes in regards to the fighting in Gaza is hollow talk at best, and false talk at worst.

War crimes compared to who? Compared to what? Compared to what Russia is doing in Ukraine? Compared to what the United States did in Iraq? In Afghanistan? Compared to what China is doing in Tibet?

I won't be revealing any exciting news to my readers if I say that the international community's investigation procedures are selective. World powers are exempted from investigation, exempted from punishment: Tyrant regimes, which destroy nations, in Africa and in the Middle East, are reprimanded from time to time, but don't give a damn. Israel is stuck in a bad place in the middle.

In light of this reality, Judge McGowan Davis' report spares Israel. Yes, there was an excessive use of ammunition in many cases, disproportional damage to residential buildings, unnecessary killing of children and civilians, and in two cases a fire frenzy in order to prevent a soldier's abduction. But every decision maker in the international community knows that there is no practical way of waging military operations while keeping sterile, with zero flaws.

Like in other Western countries, the public opinion's sensitivity towards fallen soldiers, and the government and army's fear of losing the public opinion's support, increase the number of civilian casualties on the other side.

On Monday, after the report was published, sources in the Israeli government complained bitterly that the report made an analogy between Israel and Hamas. I'm not sure I understand them. When reports issued by international commissions of inquiry directed all their criticism at Israel, claiming that Israel was a sovereign state which is committed to international law, unlike its enemies in Gaza, those same sources complained that Israel was being discriminated against. Now, when a commission of inquiry on behalf of the United Nations makes an effort to balance its criticism, those same sources are complaining again.

The prime minister, the defense minister and the IDF commanders during Operation Protective Edge wanted to kill as many Hamas fighters and fighters of other terror organizations as possible. They were not thirsty for the blood of civilians in Gaza. On the contrary: The fear of a legal or diplomatic entanglement over unnecessary fire made them insist on warning procedures such as "roof knocking," waste sophisticated and expensive ammunition and keep fighter jets in the air for hours, all so as not to make a mistake.

Ironically, what made Hamas accept a ceasefire in the end was not the casualties among its fighters but the extent of damage in the civilian neighborhoods.

The problem with Operation Protective Edge was not the war crimes, but the fact that Israel found itself in a war. The Israeli government prevented the transfer of salaries to Hamas, prevented the transfer of goods and reinforced the siege on the Strip as much as it could. Had the government let into Gaza in 2014 everything it lets in today, there would have been no Protective Edge.

This is where the leaders' guilt lies. It also has to do with the management of the operation, the intellectual fixation, the slow movement, the fear of taking risks and the negligence in defending the soldiers and civilians near the border.

A number of lessons have been learned in the year that has passed since the operation. The secret Qatar-mediated negotiations with Hamas and the ease of the siege point to that. In addition, operational lessons have been learned in the sea, in the air and on the land.

But let us not delude ourselves: If and when another round is launched vis-à-vis Gaza, it won't be any different from the previous round, neither in the reports it generates nor in the feeling of pain, waste and missed opportunity it leaves behind.

Main Topics: Roman Columns, Pawlenty, McCain VP Watch, DNCC

Summary of Shift: Most of the news surrounded the DNCC, with a focus on the speeches by Bill Clinton and Joe Biden last night. Though there was little direct McCain coverage, many stations speculated about McCain's VP choices. Also, the McCain camp's "Barackopolis" smear about the Obama's nomination stage appearing too 'Roman' has been fully embraced by the media, with all networks pondering the visuals of the speech tonight. Tim Pawlenty made the rounds auditioning for VP today.

Hurricane Gustav is by far the prime news item outside of political coverage. Other stories include the Caylee missing girl case, the FDIC bank report, and efforts by Russian leaders to shore up support in neighboring countries.

Highlights, No Clip:
1. FNC: MIKE HUCKABEE: Well you know let the Democrats have their show. That's what this is about. I'm sure next week the Democrats are going to be beating up on the Republicans for the way things are staged. I'm more concerned about the content of his speech, what he's going to say, than where he says it and I think Republicans need to be focused on his policies, not the platform from which he speaks quite frankly.

Clips:
Highlight #1
Pawlenty Says McCain is Architect of Surge (CNN 08/28/08 7:30am)
CHETRY: All right. Well, let's take a look at who the Democrats chose. Last night, Senator Joe Biden gave his big speech at the Democratic Convention. And he took on Senator McCain's position on Iraq. Let's listen.

[...]
CHETRY: And you know, governor, even the Bush administration seems poised at this point to set a date for withdrawal in conjunction with the Iraqis. So will the McCain administration be able to carry that policy forward?

TIM PAWLENTY: Well, first of all, the success in Iraq that we're experiencing and seeing is directly the result in large part to the surge. And as you know, Senator McCain was the key architect and the person who had the courage to call for it and to move it forward.

And so this whole opportunity is a result of Senator McCain's substantial leadership and his courage to call it out. And he, too, has said we can withdraw and should begin to withdraw troops from Iraq but he wants to do it at a time and under a circumstance where we can bring our troops home with victory and Iraq can govern itself and be a stable place.

And this success or this corner that's been turned in Iraq is directly attributable to the strategy that John McCain embraced and had the courage to put forward.

CHETRY: You know, Biden also argued last night that the American economy has been driven into a ditch and that the war is costing American taxpayers $12 billion a month. How does John McCain plan to keep the tax cuts in place but also be able to continue to fund the war?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PAWLENTY: Well, what John McCain has said in contrast to Senator Obama and Senator Biden is we should keep a lid on taxes, not raise them like they want to do. Number two, this economy is dependent obviously on energy issues. And John McCain has been bold saying we need to produce more energy here in America, including offshore drilling.

Senators Biden and Obama are opposed to that. And importantly, whether it's energy or the economy, we need somebody in the White House who can work across party lines in a bipartisan manner. John McCain's actually done that time and time again on major significant issues.

Barack Obama and Joe Biden are two of the most partisan people in the United States' Congress. And Barack Obama has no record, no record of reaching across party lines and working on something of major national significance. That's actually been controversial.

CHETRY: All right. We want to thank you for joining us. Governor Tim Pawlenty. And perhaps we'll see you tomorrow at 11:00 a.m. you never know.

PAWLENTY: OK, Kiran. Thank you. ROBERTS: 30 minutes after the hour. Coming to you live from Denver, Colorado, this morning in INVESCO Field at Mile High. Day four of the Democratic National Convention. Good morning. I'm John Roberts. We've move half mile down the road from the Pepsi Center to INVESCO Field, a 76,000 person stadium, home, of course, to the Denver Broncos. So you get some kind of an idea of what it's for an entire network and convention production team to pick up, and move down the street and set up. We had our folks shoot this time lapse video spanning several days. Hundreds of engineers, producers and technical operators all for tonight's big speech by presidential candidate Barack Obama.

Pawlenty Talks About ProChoice McCain Running Mate, VP (MSNBC 08/28/08 8:37am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Why do you think Mitt Romney would be a great choice for John McCain?

TIM PAWLENTY: Unlike Senator Obama, Mitt Romney's actually done something, he's actually run something. He's been an executive in business, he's actually been an executive of a large state, a-
[...]
CHUCK TODD: The conservatives like him, even the tax guys will forgive him for that cigarette vote. He knows what I'm talking about. He is a younger generation so it ends up balancing a generational. [...] Might be able to help him in Wisconsin, which I think is a little more possible than what you call that the finger of Michigan?

SCARBOROUGH: Can John McCain afford to pick a prochoice Vice Presidential candidate?

PAWLENTY: Well I think John McCain has said he wants a senior team and an administration that reflects his values, his priorities, he's pretty solidly prolife so I think he's going to have a team that reflects that. [...] Joe Lieberman is a wonderful individual, a capable individual, someone he trusts and likes so ultimately that's Senator McCain's call.

MIKE MURPHY: What is the weakness in John McCain going forward? Vulnerability?

PAWLENTY: I don't speak to my strengths or weaknesses as a VP candidate, but as for Senator McCain, you look at what he needs or what he could benefit from in a running mate. I think its someone who can amplify his great record. Do it in a way that's credible-

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: That's not a weakness.

PAWLENTY: What do you think?

BRZEZINSKI: I think he's perfect. [laughter]

SCARBOROUGH: How do you make this sell, after Republicans takeover when there's 155 billion dollar surplus in 2001, 8 years later, record deficits, record debts, we're spending way too much money in foreign wars, we've got a slumping economy, we've got the biggest housing crisis ever, the dollar is in decline, people are struggling out there, why should anybody vote for that Republican party in 2008?

PAWLENTY: Well Joe Senator McCain is not a continuation of President Bush and his record reflects that as the Maverick, as an independent, whether it be the surge, whether it be prescription drugs from Canada, whether it be spending, whether it be torture, whether it be nuclear arms proliferation, he has been his own person. Also, importantly, what it takes to heal this country and move forward is going to take bipartisan leadership and not the rhetoric about it, but actually getting it done. There's one candidate in this race that's actually done that and not just talked about it and that's Senator John McCain. And that's what the country is going to need.

TODD: He just made the case for Lieberman didn't he? McCain-Lieberman spin. [...]

Pawlenty Blasts Obama (ABC 08/28/08 7:40am)
TIM PAWLENTY: Well I've certainly heard it through news accounts that he's having a rally in Ohio tomorrow. Speculation is he'll unveil his Vice Presidential running mate there but beyond that I don't have much I can add or say about the issue.

DIANNE SAWYER: Have you had any conversations with him? [...] Do you think in your view the Vice Presidential pick should be pro-life?

PAWLENTY: I think Senator McCain has said he wants an administration, particularly senior leaders who reflect his values and principles and vision for the country. He of course is a prolife person. He doesn't have a litmus test but I think he'll pick someone who shares his values and views. [...] My goodness its amazing that we're three days into the Democratic Convention and 50 or days away from the election and they're still pleading with the American people to convince us that Barack Obama is ready to be President. The fact of the matter is he is not. President Clinton had 12 years as Governor as an executive and commander and chief of the national guard before he became President and Hillary Clinton, Bill Clinton and Joe Biden all said during the primary season Barack Obama was not ready. Bill Clinton called it a roll of the dice. Joe Biden said he wasn't ready for the job as did Hillary Clinton. And for them to say that he's ready with great enthusiasm is quite hypocritical, at least inconsistent with what they said previously. Next is Joe Biden's and Barack Obama's judgment. The record is replete with they've made a lot of errors in judgment and John McCain has a steady hand on the throttle.

SAWYER: But on the question of resume, some Democrats have said you're the same age as Barack Obama. You've been Governor for just two years. You were in the legislature, he was in the legislature. Does this raise questions about you being a heartbeat away from being commander in chief.

PAWLENTY: Well setting aside the issue of Vice President, Dianna, I've been Governor for six years, commander in chief of the Minnesota National Guard for six years, when I was in the legislature I was also Majority Leader and done a variety of other things, but the questions for Senator Obama are continuing to be what have you done and what have you run? His accomplishments are nonexistent or essentially nonexistent and he hasn't run anything. He hasn't been an executive and he hasn't been in charge of anything. And lastly, the big problem - one of the big problems facing our country - is the ability to work across party lines and get things done. John McCain actually has a record in that regard. Barack Obama does not. He has good oratory, but when you shut the teleprompter off there's not much else there.

SAWYER: [...] Does the McCain camp think gee we envy the enthusiasm of 70,000 people in an arena like this PAWLENTY: I think it feeds right into what Americans are starting to realize that this is really about celebrity and not much substance. This Roman-like facade, or facade with Roman columns is a perfect metaphor for or a right kind for an interesting production, but behind it there's not much there. And so its almost like he wants to come out and be somebody called it the other day emperor like in the setting, at least the facade so I think it feeds into the big hoopla, big production, it's about celebrity, it's about entertainment. But as with the facade, there's not much behind it.

Pawlenty: "I think the American people can smell hypocrisy" (FNC 08/28/08 10:00am)
TIM PAWLENTY: I think the American people can smell hypocrisy. A few months ago you had Bill Clinton, Hillary Clinton, and Joe Biden all saying Barack Obama wasn't ready to be President. It was a roll of the dice. It was a fairy tale. He didn't have the requisite experience. And now, not long ago, Joe Biden said he would be honored to run as John McCain as his vice President because it would be good for the country.

Dear Jake and John:

I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.

Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, “politics as usual’ is immediately heard as “politics as usual in Clinton-world.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words ‘politics as usual’ it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon's 'silent majority,' -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women's rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

"The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which "brings us together in a peaceful loving state."

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking's insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Dear John,

??

Over the past six years, we have watched in shock and disbelief as the disastrous foreign policies of George Bush have tragically increased turmoil and chaos across the globe, endangering the fundamental security of the American people.

??

In the Middle East, our leaders' penchant for relying on military force and a botched attempt to impose democracy, have made the situation there more dire than it has been in decades. The neglect of diplomacy threatens critical American interests throughout the region.

??

We must elect new leaders who understand today's geopolitics and are prepared to discard the cowboy diplomacy that has marred the 21st century. We need leaders who have the sophistication to deal with complex affairs of state and the competence to create a constructive dialogue where necessary to ease tensions around the globe.

??

That's why we are supporting Jay Footlik for Congress. Having worked with Jay in the Clinton White House, we know him to be a dedicated and talented public servant. He is committed to the highest values for which America stands and possesses the knowledge and understanding of current international issues that will allow him to be a productive force in the formulation of policy ideas in the United States House of Representatives.

??

Jay will take to Congress a unique background and practical experience that allows him to comprehend the root causes of the conflicts in the Middle East. He has a strong desire to get our country back on track – both in our dealings abroad and at home. In particular, Jay has unique insight into the most critical problems facing our country today – resolving the war in Iraq, dealing with the threat of an Iranian nuclear force, and reducing our dependence on oil.

??

Electing Jay Footlik will give the people of the 10th district of Illinois a representative who will put principle over self-preservation, and a patriot who will put what's best for the country over the demands of private interests.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: Palin Rally in Reno, NV 10/21/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- Goes into depth about Biden comments-- lays out the 5 "crisis" scenarios we might face, based on Obama's foreign policy plans
    - 1- meeting with world's worst dictators (e.g. Iranian leaders) without preconditions
    - 2- sending the military to pakistan (a partner in the war on terror) without approval of the govt
    - 3- preventing victory in iraq, even though it's in sight
    - 4- Russia could invade ukraine next (if there's a repeat of his indecision and moral equivalence after georgia invasion)
    - 5- biden's next speaking engagement -- these warnings from joe biden are similar to his earlier assessment throughout the primary.
- Says Obama camp wasnt pleased when his "staged photo-op" was interrupted the "real question from a real voter," so now they're attacking Joe the Plumber
    - Says problem is Americans are identifying with Joe, Palin cites "Tito the builder," a Colombian immigrant who wonders why Obama camp is trying to prevent Joe from reaching his dreams
- Says Obama is "hiding his real agenda" of redistributing your hardearned money
    - Calls Obama "the wealth-spreader," keeps up attack that "now is not the time to be experimenting with socialism"

Reno, NV: Palin Rally 10/21/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- Piper on stage with Palin
- Before event, a "God bless the USA" singalong with Lee

Speech Highlights
God bless the USA, beautiful absolutely beautiful. it makes you proud to be an american.

a couple of ppl id like to intro you to - piper's here. and 1 of my fave 3rd grade teachers, Mr. Chuck Heath from AK. and todd's on the road, he sends his very best. so does john mccain a couple of issues in press recently. it is not mean-spirited to talk about someone's record, someone's plans, or associations.

2 wks from today, cast vote for next president. theres no time to wait.

did you hear that senator biden said at a fund-raiser on sunday that he guarantees if barack obama is elected we will face an international crisis within the first six months of their administration? i guess we've got to say, "thanks for the warning, joe." he told his dem donors there were at least 4 -5 scenarios that would threaten Dem administration. he did not specify what these scenarios would be. you'll just have to go to the obama foreign-policy agenda for clues.

for clues, look to Obama fopo policy. crisis situation #1 meeting with terrorists without iran without preconditions. #2 sending the military to pakistan without the approval of the government. invading the sovereign territory of a partner in the war on terror. #3 opposed the surge . he's voted to cut off funding for troops. he wants to pull out, leaving iraqis at mercy of iranians and shiites. by his own admission, american troops might want to go back. #4 indecision and moral equivalence after georgia invasion, russia could invade ukraine next. #5 biden's next speaking engagement the real problem is that these warnings from joe biden are similar to his earlier assessment throughout the primary. he said that barack obama was not up to the job. he is not ready to be president. he said that the presidency is not something that lends itself to on-the-job training. the same joe biden who said he would be honored to run on the ticket with john mccain because he said the country would be better off with john mccain. he will put the country first, fighting for you.

i want a pres. who's not afirad to say 'victory. a president ready to lead on day 1, pres w/ judgment truthfulness experience ready to meet-- or better yet, avoid next internatl crisis. i want mccain as next comm-in-chief

NV, you have great history of understanding of troops. if you would do us the honor of letting us honor those who have served or are serving. TY. TY for loving our country this election going to come down to wire. i know we can count on battle-horn state. are you ready to make mccain next POTUS? ready to help carry this state to victory? ready to send us to DC to shake things up?

i know you are here b/c you understand the stakes, for the future. tough times, more than ever we need tough leader w/ bold and free and fair plan w/ pragmatic solutions. we need mccain.

we'll help families keep homes and retirees keep savings, investments they worked so hard for and trusted others with. help students. we'll get econ back on rgith track. first w/ tax relief to all americans and businesses. small business is backbone. this country is made great by entreprenerial spirit. we're going to let you keep more of what you earn and produce, thats how jobs are created. we'll lower income taxes and double chidl tax deduction and cut the capital gains tax and cut business taxes - right now, the business tax in US is 2nd highest in world, we'll cut that to help keep Am businesses in america.

on taxes, clear choice. our opponent is not being candid about his tax plans. again, its not neg or meanspirited, we're gonna keep doing this - calling someone out. its in fairness to you to have everyone understand what the choice is. you have to really listen to his words. he's hiding his real agenda of redistributing your hardearned money. he says hes for a tax credit, which is when govt takes your money and gives it to someone else. we're for a tax cut which is when govt just takes less. this allows you to invest acc. to your priorities.

we need to hand it to Joe The Plumber. he succeeded in getting our opponent to do something no one else has: state his agenda in plain language. senator obama says that he wants to, quote, spread the wealth. he wants -- what that means is that government is taking your money and doling it out however politicians see fit. that's not good for our economy. barack obama calls it spreading the wealth. joe biden calls higher taxes patriotic. joe the plumber said it sounded to him like socialism. and now is not the time to experiment with socialism. so when he left joe's neighborhood in toledo, i dont think our opponent was too pleased. their staged photo-op got ruined w a real person w/ a real question. he asked question, stood for so many americans. and now theyre investigating and attacking Joe The Plumber.

but americans are IDing w/ Joe The Plumber. in NM i saw ed the dairyman, i saw Tito the builder. here we have dave the cop, ann the engineer, jon the only GOP in my HS (laughs). tito the builder isnt pleased at how obama camp and the media have been roughing up Joe The Plumber. Tito wants to know why the heck are you going after Joe The Plumber? he has an idea, a future, he has somewhere he wants to go, why are you stopping that? tito is an immigrant from colombia. he says everyone can do waht they want. i was born in colombia, but i was made in the usa.

so tito isnt the only mccain supporter who feel that way. signs have shown the same. if you work hard and want to get ahead and believe america is the land of possibilites and dont want your hopes dashed by obama tax incr, and dont like how he was attacked for asking obama a question, then we're all Joe The Plumber. do we have some here? doesnt sound like we have a lot of fans of obama the wealth-spreader here today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

our opponent's plan discourages productivity and it will stifle the entrepreneurial spirit that has made this country unique and it has made it the greatest country on earth.

our opponent's plan is just more big government, and john and i think that is the problem, not the solution. instead of taking your hard-earned money and spreading your wealth, we want to spread opportunity so people like you and joe the plumber can create new wealth and create new jobs.

so we're gonna put govt back on side of ppl. we're going to confront the $10 trillion debt that the federal government has run up. thats not right, not fair, that wont happen on our watch. john and i will impose a spending freeze in the federal government's budget on but the most vital functions of government. we have to do this for the fed gvot to be expected to live w/in its budget as you are in your homes, in your businesses, as we have to do as govs and mayors.

you can count on us to follow thru on our promises b/c we're the only ones w/ track records of reform. we havent just been talking the talk, but walked the walk.

as a sen, mccain has confronted abuses of pwr and as he'll tell ya, he has scars to do it. from his own party and from other party also, he's been known as teh maverick taking on the special interests and insider dealings. as pres, he'll end them once and for all.

my track record. as mayor, i eliminated personal prop. taxes and sm. business inventory taxes. we made our town a place where businesses could grow and thrive. it was a progrowth, proprivate sector agenda. we were able to hang that shingle outside our city door that said We're open for business! and it worked, and we took off a vibrant, booming community b/c we had a progrwoth, proprivate sector agenda. we got govt out of the way to let businesses grow and thrive.

as gov, i vetoed nearly $0.5B in wasteful spending. there too, we ruffled some feathers. we suspended state fuel tax and returned a chunk of surplus back to ppl b/c they can spend it better than govt can spend it for them.

in AK, we got back to basics and put govt back on side of the ppl, we'll use that same commonsense approach to reform DC b/c in our admin, i promise we'll never forget who we're accountable to, we'll be working for you, the ppl of USA. you the ppl.

are you ready to send us to DC shake things up and clean things up?

john and i will set this country firmly on a path to energy indep. we're gonna develop new energy sources and tap into what we've already got: oil, natural gas, coal. we'll create thousands of new jobs instead of circulating billions and being beholden to volatile regimes that use energy as a weapon. we'll develop alternative sources, clean coal technology and safely drill. we'll drill here and drill now. and that's when you start to chant. we'll drill baby drill and mine baby mine. for security and for prosperity and job opportunities, we need american energy by american ingenuity and american workers. USA!

i appreciate that. you really do get it and i appreciate you guys.

1 of the missions that we'll take on for you, in addition to energy indep and govt reform, should we be blessed to serve you, esp close to my heart, that is to help fams w/ kids with special needs. it was mother teresa who said that god has created everyone of us, every human, for greater things, to love and be loved. no matter our party or backgrd or affiliations or gender, there is a voice of humanity there in those words. it speaks to all of us. john and i have vision of america where every innocent life counts and everyone has the chance to contribute. where every child is cherished. thats the spirit i want to bring to DC. as gov, i secured more assistance and funding to students w/ special needs. as VP, we'll do more, ushering spirit that says life is sacred, it matters, it should be protected. ill make sure that children, that all our fams know, yep they'llhave advocate in WH.

nov 4 coming quickly. itll come down to what we believe in. mccain and i belivee in what reagan believed in: fwd mvmt of frdm not constant expansion of govt. best of USA not all gahtered in DC, but in goodness of everyday, hardworking ppl in ppl in our factories, teaching, fighting our wars, protecting us and protecting the virtues of frdm. we so believe in the promise of this country in all of its opportunites. and we believe america is not the problem, america the solution. USA. we may not be a perf nation but we learn from our mistakes. collectively we represent some perfect ideals. we're that beacon of hope for all that seek equality and frdm and opportunity. we're still that shining city on a hill reagan spoke of.

and i thank god we have a man ready and worthy to lead that nation. he inspires us w/ heroic and trustworthy deeds and not just words. if you believe what we believe, you're ready to shake up DC and WS, and you want to clean up DC, , we're asking for your vote.

you'll hear our opponents go on and on about how they'll "fight for you". since my running mate usually wont say this for himself, ill tell ya: there is only 1 candidate in this race who has ever really fought for you. he is the only man with courage to keep fighting for you. he is john mccain.

Engaging Iran Crucial Despite Odious Rants

Washington, D.C. - Today, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will speak to the United Nations General Assembly. He will make predictably odious statements, and they will be seized upon by conservatives in the U.S. as evidence that the U.S. should abandon its policy of engaging the Iranian regime. These critics should be ignored. This past summer has demonstrated that engagement weakens - not strengthens - the Iranian regime. The willingness of the U.S. to sit down for negotiations in an effort to address Iran's nuclear program and possibly to reorient the relationship emboldened those Iranians seeking reform and undermined regime hardliners who thrived on conflict with the U.S. Our willingness to engage has also led to a more cohesive international stance on Iran and will force Iran to clarify its position toward the West. Finally, engagement with Iran puts focus on the core issues - its nuclear program, human rights, and its role in the region - while delegitimizing Ahmadinejad's theatrical ravings.

Conservatives who argue for abandoning engagement are stuck in the failed policies of the past: unilateral and unrealistic sanctions, useless saber-rattling, and wild notions of regime change. This stance defies the opinions of top military leaders and leading Iran experts. While the U.S. must be ready to deploy internationally backed pressure if needed, the best means forward with Iran is to stay committed to the policy of engagement.

Ahmadinejad on the defensive as he heads to the UN General Assembly. A year ago, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad traveled to New York for the UN General assembly emboldened. His country having achieved the ability to "influence all the region's security dilemmas," in the words of Iran experts Ray Takeyh and Suzanne Maloney, Ahmadinejad delivered a rambling, hate-filled tirade, attacking Israel and the West.

This year, Ahmadinejad is on the defensive. The instability following the elections has opened schisms that continue to threaten Ahmadinejad's base of support. Earlier this month a conservative clerical association in Qom rebuked him, urging the President his supporters to "concentrate their minds seriously on economic woes and social challenges and avoid uttering unnecessary and provocative remarks," according to the Los Angeles Times. His regime's egregious violations of demonstrators' rights have dampened international enthusiasm for him and his outrageous anti-Semitism and anti-Westernism.

The Obama administration's willingness to engage has further undermined Ahmadinejad abroad and at home. Former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns says the Administration's early efforts at engagement effectively put him "on [the] defensive prior to this election because of our ability now to open up the vista for the possibility of negotiations." As National Iranian American Council President Trita Parsi put it last June, Obama's "diplomatic outreach and removal of this threat perception has not necessarily created fissures among the Iranian elite in and of itself, but it has weakened the glue that created unity among Iran's many political factions."

[Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, 9/23/08 . Ray Takeyh and Suzanne Maloney, via Brookings, 12/08 . Los Angeles Times, 9/08/09. Nick Burns, 6/11/09 . Trita Parsi, 6/22/09]

Engagement remains the best route to advance core US interests. After the speeches are over, engagement will clarify Iran's position - and that of other nations - and build international support for an effective, common approach.

- Chester Crocker, a Reagan-era State Department official, says that the administration's critics misunderstand engagement. He writes in the New York Times, "Let's get a few things straight. Engagement in statecraft is not about sweet talk. Nor is it based on the illusion that our problems with rogue regimes can be solved if only we would talk to them. Engagement is not normalization, and its goal is not improved relations. It is not akin to détente, working for rapprochement, or appeasement... diplomatic engagement is proven to work - in the right circumstances."
- Secretary Gates said earlier this month, "Our view, and the view that we have shared, I might say, strongly with all of our friends and allies, in the region as well as elsewhere, is that the way to deal with the Iranian nuclear program at this point is through diplomatic and economic efforts."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Karim Sadjapour of the Carnegie Endowment argues, "Engagement is not an end in itself, but rather a means that seeks, among other things, to curtail Iran's nuclear ambitions and moderate its regional policies. I hope that negotiations will bear fruit, and I think that Undersecretary of State Bill Burns is an incredibly skilled and thoughtful diplomat."
- Former Undersecretary of State and Bush administration point man on Iran Nick Burns said in a recent interview with World Politics Review that, "I think negotiations are the right way to go. I don't think they have a strong possibility of succeeding, but the ability of the U.S. to get countries to support sanctions depends on the U.S. going to negotiations."
- Deputy National Security Advisor Tom Donilon also spoke with the New York Times' Roger Cohen about a "back end" to the policy of engagement. According to Cohen, "[t]he back end is punitive sanctions, in the event engagement fails, that would change the Iranian calculus on further uranium refinement: cutting off Iranian banks' access to credit; extending that isolation to insurance and shipping; stopping refined petroleum products from reaching Iran." However, as Cohen adds, for that back-end to be available "Obama will need to prove his outreach is more than rhetoric and that other nations have bought into the notion that a near-boycott of Iran should be imposed."
- Brookings Institution Iran expert Suzanne Maloney testified before Congress that despite the new obstacles that have emerged following Iran's presidential elections, engagement represents the only path forward. "The Obama administration's interest in engagement was never predicated on the palatability of the Iranian leadership - indeed, until very recently the conventional American wisdom tended to presume a second Ahmadinejad term - but on the urgency of the world's concerns and the even less promising prospects for the array of alternative U.S. policy options."

[Chester Crocker, NY Times, 9/14/09 . Robert Gates, 9/04/09 . Karim Sadjapour, 9/23/09 . Nick Burns, World Politics Review, 9/4/09 . Roger Cohen, NY Times, 8/02/09 . Suzanne Maloney, 7/22/09]

The conservative position on Iran - saber-rattling, unilateral sanctions, and emphasis on regime-change - is dangerous, rejected by U.S. national security leaders. Former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations and prominent neoconservative John Bolton recently wrote in a Wall Street Journal op-ed that "[a]dopting tougher economic sanctions is simply another detour away from hard decisions on whether to accept a nuclear Iran or support using force to prevent it." Meanwhile, Dick Cheney's former national security advisor John Hannah called for regime change this month, writing, "nothing seems more likely to enhance the prospects for peacefully resolving the nuclear issue than the Islamic Republic's replacement by a more democratic government."

Meanwhile, top military and defense officials, former diplomats, and Iran experts agree that unilateral, hostile action against Iran would be "disastrous."

- Former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Burns also explained the serious repercussions of a military strike in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last May: "Air strikes would undoubtedly lead Iran to hit back asymmetrically against us in Iraq, Afghanistan and the wider region, especially through its proxies, Hezbollah and Hamas. This reminds us of Churchill's maxim that, once a war starts, it is impossible to know how it will end." More recently he affirmed that the use of force "does not make sense at this time."
- Carnegie Iran expert, Karim Sadjapour is "convinced that Khamenei and Ahmadinejad would actually welcome a military strike; it may be their only hope to silence popular dissent and heal internal political rifts."
- Iran expert Robin Wright and national security expert Robert Litwak, "Yet a military strike is also likely to backfire, instead rallying Persian nationalism around the regime, just as Saddam Hussein's 1980 invasion mobilized support for the revolution at a time it was running out of steam."
- Secretary Gates, who was originally appointed to the position by George W. Bush, agrees, in fact saying that it would be disastrous. He wrote in Parameters journal last year that, "Another war in the Middle East is the last thing we need. In fact, I believe it would be disastrous on a number of levels."
- Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Admiral Michael Mullen said last year on FOX News, "I'm fighting two wars, and I don't need a third one... I worry about the instability in that part of the world and, in fact, the possible unintended consequences of a strike like that and, in fact, having an impact throughout the region that would be difficult to both predict exactly what it would be and then the actions that we would have to take to contain it."
- Abbas Milani, Director of Iranian Studies at Stanford University, stated that unilateral sanctions "only help solidify the regime" by reunifying conservatives around their hostility to Western nations.

Netanyahu Confirms: Israel Operates in Syria from Time-to-Time

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Tuesday "we operate in Syria from time to time to prevent Syria from becoming a front against us." He was speaking at the Galilee Conference in Acre, a day after he had met in Paris with Russian President Vladimir Putin on the margins of the climate conference. Netanyahu said he had met with over a hundred world leaders, and based on what he experienced in Paris, nothing could be further from depictions of Israel as a pariah state. "We have a disagreement on the Palestinian issue with some of the countries, especially a number of countries in Western Europe...They think the rift with the Palestinians is a territorial dispute, but it's not."

Dawabsha Family Hoping for Progress in Arson Case

The grandfather of a Palestinian boy whose entire family was killed in an arson attack in the West Bank said he hoped reports of a major breakthrough in a Jewish terrorism case referred to the investigation into that attack. On Monday there was a widely reported "major development" in an ongoing investigation into an incident of Jewish extremist violence, although police and the Shin Bet security service have been reticent as to the case in question.

Israel Demolishes Terrorist's Jerusalem Home Who Killed Two

Israeli security forces on Wednesday demolished the East Jerusalem home of Hamas terrorist Ibrahim al-Akari, who killed two Israelis in a vehicular terror attack in November of last year. Some 1,200 Police and Border Police troops were deployed to the Shuafat refugee camp ahead of the planned demolition to maintain order and prevent violent rioting in the flashpoint refugee camp. "The forces were instructed to show zero tolerance for any attempt to harm security forces or disrupt the public order," police stated. The demolition went ahead as planned without any unusual incidents.

Israeli Government, Military Disagree Over Unrest

Two months into a wave of stabbings, shootings, and vehicle attacks by Palestinians targeting Israelis, gaps are emerging between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the military, and intelligence chiefs over what is driving the violence. While there is agreement over broad aspects of the violence, the deeper causes are disputed. Netanyahu has repeatedly accused 80-year-old Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of directly inciting the unrest. In contrast, the military and Shin Bet point to a variety of economic and socio-political factors fuelling Palestinian anger and frustration, particularly among young men and women in the Israeli-occupied West Bank.

Riots at Kadoorie University in the West Bank Get Out of Hand

A crisis broke out at Kadoorie University in Tulkarm, after the university administration asked the students to stop clashing with the IDF near the campus, since this disrupted the studies. The student union, which is controlled by Fatah, was angry at the request and continued to lead the disturbances. In response, the university administration announced the dissolution of the student union and the dismissal of its members. Sources in the Kadoorie University student union accused the university administration of collaboration with Israel. Senior PA officials intervened in the crisis, and a document of understandings is expected to be signed today that will end the crisis.

With Israeli-EU Relations Strained, Israel Looking at India, China

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his Indian counterpart, Narendra Modi, sat kiddy-corner in armchairs at this week's international climate summit near Paris, talking and laughing. "We have the best of relations, and they can be made even better," Netanyahu told Modi at the meeting. To which Modi responded, "I am happy that often we can talk easily on telephone, we can discuss everything." A brief encounter between Netanyahu and European Union foreign policy envoy Federica Mogherini was far frostier. Mogherini approached Netanyahu in the hallway, and they shared little more than a handshake.

Restoring Tourism w/ Egypt; Jordan Labor Program Progresses

Deputy Regional Cooperation Minister Ayoub Kara (Likud) met with an Egyptian diplomat at the Taba border crossing with Egypt on Tuesday in order to discuss ways to restore the strong tourist ties between the two countries. "We will defeat terrorism, which cannot be allowed to interfere with our daily lives," Kara told The Jerusalem Post. Separately, Kara met with representatives of the Eilat airport, the Wadi Araba border crossing with Jordan, and the manager of the Taba border crossing with Egypt, Yizhak Hai, about progress on the plan to bring Jordanian day workers to work in hotels in Eilat. Under the plan, which began in the past month, there are currently 150 Jordanian workers working in Eilat and by the end of the month, there will be 500. The government target is to eventually reach 1,500 Jordanian workers in Eilat.

IDF Holds Surprise Drill in the Gaza Region

The IDF on Wednesday is holding a surprise general staff drill in the southern region, so as to raise the army's preparedness. In the drill the various Southern Command units will be deployed to practice a variety of potential operations, with a focus on the Gaza region and the western Negev. Throughout the drill residents in the region are likely to feel the heavy presence of military vehicles and planes in the south, as well as in some of the coastal region. In Eilat the IDF Medical Corps are to practice establishing a field hospital.

New Situation in Syria that Enables Israel to Target Hizbullah

By Amir Bohbot

What causes Hizbullah to continue to stockpile more and more missiles and rockets? The Shiite terror organization, which is up to its neck in fighting alongside Assad's army in Syria, has not abandoned its effort to enlarge its rocket reserves, which are intended in due time to be aimed at Israel, in what is dubbed the "Hizbullah war." Reports say that Hizbullah possesses over 120,000 missiles and rockets, including Scud-D missiles that can reach every point in Israel.

Hizbullah has analyzed its challenge vis-à-vis Israel and reached the conclusion that the next war will be shorter than it expected—and judging by the public statements made by high-ranking IDF officers, in the war Israel will respond more aggressively than in the past. For this reason, Hizbullah's leaders understand that it has to prepare a new doctrine designed to target strategic installations in Israel, IDF bases and government symbols. In order to do so, it has to arm itself with precise rockets and missiles.

Syria and Iran have joined Hizbullah's effort. The Iranian defense industries are in charge of manufacturing the rockets and the missiles, as well as UAVs. The weapons find their way to Syria, and from there on convoys to Hizbullah headquarters in Lebanon. In the past two years, Defense Minister Moshe Yaalon has said on every possible platform that Israel has red lines, and has emphasized the arms transfers from Syria to Lebanon, warning that Israel would not hesitate to attack. And indeed, according to foreign reports, Israel has acted on its threats.

At first the Israeli effort was aimed at moments when the convoys were on the Syrian-Lebanese border, in "buffer" zones, so as not to embarrass any party and not to create a chain reaction. But like in any pursuit of terror organizations, which learn and become more sophisticated, the pace of smuggling has picked up, and at least according to foreign reports, the IAF has been compelled to carry out strikes on the outskirts of Damascus as well.

Nasrallah threatened and warned Israel not to continue, but to no avail, since Israel considers precise missile attacks to be a real threat to the State of Israel's home front.

A high-ranking officer in the IDF Intelligence Research Department said recently to Walla News that Hizbullah was a "learning organization, that develops and builds itself—and it has good teachers." She said that Israel does not make light of Hizbullah, which is the main threat to us at the moment. "We are in a daily war of minds with the organization, and we have to think like it does in order to know the next move and not to find ourselves left behind. If we want to prevent, we have to read the enemy and raise all the possibilities. This is a routine challenge [in operating] against them."

So why did Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu decide now, of all times, to reveal the IAF's activity in Syria? It is all a matter of momentum, of finding a window of opportunity. What has changed in the past few weeks as opposed to the past few years is that Israeli intelligence—according to foreign reports—has located more arms convoys, making it possible to attack them effectively.

In addition, the coordination mechanism between Russia and Israel works effectively, at least judging by the statements of the two countries' leaders. The fact that Israel did not down the Russian plane that infiltrated into Israeli territory improved the relationship between Israel and Russia even more. Putin publicly expressed this, and praised the relationship with Israel while aiming a barb at Turkey, which is not particularly popular in Israel either.

As it looks now, Israel has decided to strike while the iron is hot and to take advantage of the good atmosphere with Russia in order to demand the prevention of the arms transfer from Syria to Hizbullah. We can presume that Russia will undertake to help but will not do anything on the matter in order to preserve a reasonable relationship with Assad, the Revolutionary Guard and Hizbullah—with which it is fighting against ISIS.

Conversely, we cannot discount the possibility that Russia will turn a blind eye when the IAF crosses the skies of Damascus and drops precise munitions on missiles—which are liable in the next war to hit the IDF General Staff base, oil reservoirs or Israel Electric Corporation power plants.

The Illusion of Palestinian Sovereignty

The West Bank's division into 'territorial capsules' makes it hard for Palestinians to mass against Israeli aggression; instead, there are 'lone-wolf stabbers.'

By Amira Haas

Israeli military incursions into the West Bank's Area A and even Area B – the districts where only Palestinians live and the Palestinian Authority operates – have one positive aspect. Yes, even when they include the destruction of radio stations or raids on hospitals. Despite all the shock and the denunciations, these raids are a lesson in reality. For a few hours, they destroy the illusion of Palestinian sovereignty. It's a virtual sovereignty, fragmented and curtailed. Therefore, it's an illusion – but an illusion that works.

Broadcasters in Hebron think they can tell their listeners where soldiers are located, as if they lived in an independent state. Palestinian Facebook users inhabit a virtual reality twice over: They see the real world in cyberspace and are convinced that it protects them from raids and arrests. Doctors treat people with bullet wounds and forget that the sovereign is the settlement defense forces, which don't recognize the immunity of medical institutions.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas receives ambassadors with great pomp, but is dependent on exit permits from the army. And professors from abroad are shocked when Israeli security services raid the campus of Al-Quds University in Abu Dis; their political geography classes evidently ended in 1993. That is when Zionism achieved one of its greatest military and diplomatic successes.

Short of expelling every Palestinian or "causing them to flee," this is the outcome most closely resembling transfer that was possible to achieve. The international political circumstances didn't allow the territory to be emptied (again) of its Palestinian inhabitants. So reservations were set up (Areas A and B). They were supposed to be temporary, but meanwhile they've become permanent.

It's not important for now whether this is exactly what Zionist leaders intended when they concocted the Oslo Accords' interim agreements. The result is the same either way: Palestinian pseudo-sovereignty in territorial capsules, which is one of the main reasons why the current uprising hasn't taken off.

The checkpoints that surround these enclaves block any mass demonstration that might, for instance, seek to march toward another water-sucking, land-swallowing settlement or a shepherds' village that's about to be demolished. But what's most effective of all, from the standpoint of Israeli interests, is that people have gotten used to the illusion. Within these population enclosures, life is lived in a way that closely resembles normalcy.

In Tel Rumeida, the silence is blood-curdling. But beyond the concrete that isolates the neighborhood, one hears the enticing municipal clamor of Hebron. Cars honk, vendors in the market sell their wares, pedestrians chat. A multitude of seminars takes place in the hotels of cozy Jericho and Ramallah, while half an hour's drive to the north, Israel's Civil Administration is demolishing the houses of the tiny village of Hadidiyeh and the army is once again expelling 13 families from their tents in Khirbet Khumsa. Studies at An-Najah National University in Nablus take place as normal, but a few kilometers southward, settlers burst into the villages of Madama and Burin and sow fear.

Just how strong the delusion of sovereignty is can be seen in the way East Jerusalem residents, and even Palestinian citizens of Israel, often travel to these West Bank enclaves and feel a sense of relief. In these enclosures, which are free of any army presence, they get a break from routine Israeli racism and vulgarity. This temporary feeling of rest and relief is only strengthened by the necessary return to Israel via an intimidating path of walls, barbed-wire fences, pointed rifles, threatening policemen and soldiers, and deluxe, verdant suburbs for Jews only.

The foreign ruler and his permanent aggression are divided into fractions and experienced differently in every Palestinian "territorial cell," as they are called in army jargon. The more numerous, smaller and fragmented these territorial cells are, the harder it is for the Palestinians to develop a uniform response to Israeli aggression and violence.

That is how the phenomenon of the lone-wolf stabbers emerged – for lack of any other choice. This is a privatizing of the natural and general urge to rebel, a response to Israeli violence that breaks up into dozens of supposedly unconnected little incidents.

This privatization of the struggle is the opposite of an intifada, which is a mass uprising. But because it has become such a widespread phenomenon, it constitutes an internal message: that the normalcy of the enclaves isn't normal.

GMF invites you to a discussion with author Robert Kaplan on his most recent book In Europe's Shadow: Two Cold Wars and a Thirty-Year Journey Through Romania and Beyond, in which Kaplan examines larger questions of geography, imperialism, the role of fate in international relations, the Cold War, the Holocaust, and how Romania continues to shape its destiny today.

In Europe's Shadow: Two Cold Wars and a Thirty-Year Journey Through Romania and Beyond
Robert Kaplan first visited Romania in the 1970s, when he was a young journalist and the country was a bleak Communist backwater. It was one of the darkest corners of Europe, but few Westerners were paying attention. What ensued was a lifelong obsession with a critical, often overlooked country—a country that, today, is key to understanding the current threat that Russia poses to Europe. In Europe's Shadow is a vivid blend of memoir, travelogue, journalism, and history, a masterly work thirty years in the making—the story of a journalist coming of age, and a country struggling to do the same. Through the lens of one country, Kaplan examines larger questions of geography, imperialism, the role of fate in international relations, the Cold War, the Holocaust, and more.

Here Kaplan illuminates the fusion of the Latin West and the Greek East that created Romania, the country that gave rise to Ion Antonescu, Hitler's chief foreign accomplice during World War II, and the country that was home to the most brutal strain of Communism under Nicolae Ceau escu. Romania past and present are rendered in cinematic prose: the ashen faces of citizens waiting in bread lines in Cold War–era Bucharest; the Bărăgan Steppe, laid bare by centuries of foreign invasion; the grim labor camps of the Black Sea Canal; the majestic Gothic church spires of Transylvania and Maramureș. Kaplan finds himself in dialogue with the great thinkers of the past, and with the Romanians of today, the philosophers, priests, and politicians—those who struggle to keep the flame of humanism alive in the era of a resurgent Russia.

Upon his return to Romania in 2013 and 2014, Kaplan found the country transformed yet again—now a traveler's destination shaped by Western tastes, yet still emerging from the long shadows of Hitler and Stalin. In Europe's Shadow is the story of an ideological and geographic frontier—and the book you must read in order to truly understand the crisis with Russia, and within Europe itself.

Robert Kaplan is currently a senior fellow at the Center for a New American Security and contributing editor at The Atlantic. Prior to this, he worked for Stratfor as the chief geopolitical analyst from March 2012 to December 2014. In 2009, he was appointed to the Pentagon's Defense Policy Board and served through 2011. From 2006 to 2008, he was the Class of 1960 Distinguished Visiting Professor in National Security at the U.S. Naval Academy. He is the bestselling author of sixteen books on foreign affairs and travel, including In Europe's Shadow, Asia's Cauldron, The Revenge of Geography, Monsoon, The Coming Anarchy, and Balkan Ghosts. Foreign Policy magazine twice named him one of the world's "Top 100 Global Thinkers."

Derek Chollet is the counselor and senior advisor for security and defense policy at GMF. From 2012 to 2015, Chollet was the U.S. assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs, where he managed U.S. defense policy issues related to the nations and international organizations of Europe (including NATO), the Middle East, Africa, and the Western Hemisphere, as well as advising Secretaries of Defense Leon Panetta and Chuck Hagel. Prior to joining the Pentagon, Chollet served at the White House as special assistant to the president and senior director for strategic planning on the National Security Council staff. From 2009 to 2011, he was the principal deputy director of Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's policy planning staff. Chollet is also the author, co-author, or co-editor of six books on U.S. foreign policy.

The German Marshall Fund of the United States (GMF) strengthens transatlantic cooperation on regional, national, and global challenges and opportunities in the spirit of the Marshall Plan.

GMF contributes research and analysis and convenes leaders on transatlantic issues relevant to policymakers. GMF offers rising leaders opportunities to develop their skills and networks through transatlantic exchange, and supports civil society in the Balkans and Black Sea regions by fostering democratic initiatives, rule of law, and regional cooperation.

Founded in 1972 as a non-partisan, non-profit organization through a gift from Germany as a permanent memorial to Marshall Plan assistance, GMF maintains a strong presence on both sides of the Atlantic. In addition to its headquarters in Washington, DC, GMF has offices in Berlin, Paris, Brussels, Belgrade, Ankara, Bucharest, and Warsaw. GMF also has smaller representations in Bratislava, Turin, and Stockholm.

Winning the Social Media War Against ISIS

Let's stop here. There is no war online against ISIS in which the United States can seize victory, because there is no online victory to be seized. "Winning" a war implies specific objectives that can actually be met. On the internet, there is no clear ground to be gained, and no reliable way to measure success when it comes to countering violent extremism—as many have mentioned, you can't measure if someone decides to not join ISIS.

Winter is coming to the United States' national electric grid. El Niño – an ocean temperature event that affects global weather – is on its way and is expected to be one of the strongest events in recent history. Already, we have seen El Nino's warmer ocean currents create severe weather conditions, causing blackouts throughout the Asian and Pacific regional energy grids. Experts have expressed similar fears that such extreme weather events might spell danger for the United States' energy grid. These and other events revive the necessary conversation regarding the resiliency of our bulk-power system. The United States should consider supporting distributed energy policies, specifically microgrids, to guard against future strains on the nation's ageing energy infrastructure.

Climate Change, Diplomacy and National Security- A Conversation with Foreign Minister Tony de Brum, Marshall Islands

In December, negotiators from around the world will convene in Paris to negotiate and agree to a deal to address the challenge of climate change. While most attention has been on the position of major economies like China, Europe, and the United States, one group that has played a role in the negotiations far beyond the size of their populations are the Alliance of Small Island States. Their clear moral authority, as "front-line" states of climate change, shows how soft power can accelerate diplomacy.

College of Charleston Event – Climate Change: Risks for National Security

Today, the U.S. Navy is preparing for an open Arctic, the Marines are deploying in response to historic typhoons, and the Army is preparing its bases to use less energy than they produce. Climate change is already a major consideration for US military planners. Meanwhile, American politicians continue to ignore the issue. Join us for a discussion with senior flag officers as they discuss the steps the US military has taken and future implications for our national security.

Implications of the Trans-Pacific Partnership For Global and Regional Stability

Final negotiations on TPP concluded on October 5th, 2015 and the long-awaited trade deal now begins a 90-day waiting period before being brought for discussion and vote by the United States Congress. TPP is a cornerstone of the Asia Pivot and includes 11 Pacific nations. Its implementation will increase US access to growing markets across the region while eliminating thousands of import tariffs and other barriers to free international trade. The deal also strengthens relationships between the US and vital partners including Japan, Australia, Canada, Malaysia, Vietnam, and Mexico.

Reducing our Dependent on Fossil Fuels is a National Security Imperative
Spencer Shweky
In 2013, the EIA projected that world energy consumption would grow by 56% between 2010 and 2040, with fossil fuels continuing to supply almost 80% of the 2040 total. This trajectory threatens not only to alter the nature of the earth's climate, but to fundamentally destabilize the global security environment.

The Iran Nuclear Agreement & Congress's Role
Sam Hickey
The dangers of nuclear weapons programs span a spectrum of catastrophe: from a meltdown at a nuclear reactor, to a state detonating a nuclear weapon, to terrorists setting off a dirty bomb. The paradox of the security and insecurity that nuclear weapons concurrently provide has yet to be reconciled, but for now, the U.S. must provide direct aid to the international institution responsible for maintaining the peaceful use of nuclear science and technology; the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

McCain Lobs Attacks Overseas at Barack Obama (ABC 07/23/08 6:42pm)
CHARLES GIBSON: Barack Obama may be out of the country but he's not been out of range from attacks by John McCain. Day after day the republican candidate has challenged Obama's domestic policies and being quick to point out his inexperience in foreign affairs. [...]

DAVID WRIGHT: Senator I want to start by asking you about an extraordinary statement you just made in that town hall meeting.

JOHN MCCAIN: So apparently Senator Obama would rather lose a war in order to win a campaign.

WRIGHT: That's pretty strong language. Do you really think he's that craven?

MCCAIN: I think that it's very clear that Senator Obama has refused to recognize that the strategy in Iraq called the surge has succeeded.

WRIGHT: But what you seem to be saying there is that it's all about personal ambition for him and not about what he honestly thinks is right for the country.

MCCAIN: I do not believe that any objective observer can conclude that the surge did not work and he should know better if he wants to be commander-in-chief and certainly behave differently as far as our presence and our strategy in Iraq.

WRIGHT: But it sometimes seems, as an outside observer, that both of you guys sometimes get stuck in the past. Senator Obama's kind of stuck in 2003 and whether the war was a good idea in the first place and you kind of seem stuck sometimes in 2007 and whether the surge was the right strategy. Shouldn't this debate really be about the future and where we go from here?

MCCAIN: Oh, you're exactly right. It's all about the future and the future, in my view, we have succeeded, but it's still fragile.

WRIGHT: You yourself have said--

MCCAIN: The point is that we are responsible for our records. I was right. Senator Obama was wrong. So therefore, I think that I have more credibility on what the future should be as opposed to Senator Obama who, if he' had his way, we would be very likely be involved in a wider war today.

WRIGHT: Charlie Gibson today sat down with Senator Obama in Jerusalem and, as you can imagine, they talked a lot about the Middle East peace process. How would that initiative look different in a McCain administration than it would in an Obama administration?

MCCAIN: My policy and support for the state of Israel has been very consistent. I visited there many, many times. I would be personally engaged in the efforts to bring about a peaceful settlement between the state of Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

WRIGHT: You've been touring here in the states, had the domestic states all to yourself and yet, we're talking an awful lot about foreign policy. It seems like the narrative of this campaign is being driven by whatever Senator Obama does and that you're left to kind of react to that.

MCCAIN: It may seem like that to you. It doesn't seem like that to me. We're gettin' very good crowds. We're doin' well in the polls. So I'm very happy with where we are.

Pfotenhauer: Correct Chronology Does Disservice to US and Iraqi Military; McCain's Challenge on Iraq Strategy Resulted in Change of Sec. of Defense (MSNBC 07/23/08 2:50pm)
ALEX WITT: […] When it comes to the war in Iraq, John McCain continues to repeat two lines of attack against Barack Obama. [He] charges that his […] rival is flat out wrong when it comes to a timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq and McCain accuses Barack Obama of being willing to lose a war in order to win a political campaign. […]

Let's talk about the interview last night during which Senator McCain said that the surge helped with the Sunni or Anbar awakening. However, in fact, if you look at the historical details […] the surge […] began after that Anbar awakening yet the campaign is still sticking by the senator's remarks. [Witt reads campaign statement about error in interview.] Do you agree with that?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: I do agree with it and it's not just our opinion. If you talk to General Petraeus or […] other military commanders or, if you even talk to your colleague Joe Scarborough, they'll say there is no way the awakening could have been successful if it weren't for the surge. The surge effort is what made that possible.

Barack Obama and his supporters can try to litigate what came first or what was crucial but that's really an attempt to undermine the significance and the impact of the American troops and their sacrifice and their effort and that's something that does a disservice to the American military, men and women that put your lives on the line as well as the Iraqis forces who put their lives on the line, in order to fight back al-Qaeda.

WITT: […] when you hear details […] and you see, 'Oh there's going to be a question about the timing here,' and you know the media is going to get on this to try to get the facts out correctly, how does that make you feel?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How do you approach then, dealing with things?

PFOTENHAUER: […] this is a 24-7 job, as you know […] we have a candidate who is extraordinarily well versed, in these matters, and […] he's been on the record for years, if you will, on them and so he knows a tremendous amount about what's happened on the ground and he has the judgment and the proof is before the world right now.

He has the judgment to make the right call like he did when he went into Iraq, came back, challenged his own president, demanded a change in strategy. It even resulted in the in a change of the secretary of defense, in order to put his country's interest above his political interests and get to a successful place in Iraq where we can now, all of us, be talking about victory, if you will, rather than advocating the withdrawal and defeat that Senator Obama did.

WITT: […] I am totally out of time, but, if you can give me a yes or no answer on this. […] Will John McCain announce his VP choice this week […]?

PFOTENHAUER: I don't know.

Olbermann Attacks McCain's History and Definition of the Surge in Iraq (MSNBC 07/23/08 08:04pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: Which came first the surge or the surge? Apparently the surge did. […] Senator McCain who yesterday wanted you to believe that the surge predated the Sunni awakening in Anwar, now wants you to believe that the surge started before President Bush said it did. If that is not confusing enough, the presumptive Republican nominee would also have you believe that the surge and the Anbar awakening, and the counterinsurgency in Iraq are all the very same thing. In front of the cheese case, at the king super market […] the Senator tried to clear up any confusion of when he believes the surge actually began. […] It is worth noting that the vast majority of surge troops went to Baghdad not to Anbar, and the same Sheik that MCCain claimed to Katie Couric that the surge was able to protect was himself assassinated in September 2007 when the surge was at its peak. But let us return to our cheese case […]

JOHN MCCAIN: First of all a surge is really a counterinsurgency strategy and it's made up of a number of components. And this counterinsurgency was initiated, to some degree, by Colonel McFarland in Anbar province, relatively on his own. When I visited with him in December of 2006, he had already initiated that strategy in Remadi by going in and clearing in holding in certain places. That is a counterinsurgency. And he told me at that time he believed that that strategy, which is, "the surge", part of the surge, would be successful. So, then, of course, it was very clear that we needed additional troops in order to carry out this insurgency.

Prior to that counterinsurgency, prior to that, they had been going into places killing people or not killing people and then withdrawing and the new counterinsurgency surge entailed going in and clearing a holding which Colonel McFarland had already started doing. Then, of course, later on there were additional troops and General Petraeus has said that the surge would not have worked and the Anbar awakening would not have taken place successfully if they hadn't have had an increase in the number of troops. So, I'm not sure, frankly, that people really understand that a surge is part of a counterinsurgency strategy, which means going in, clearing holding, building a better life, providing services to the people and then clearly a part of that, an important part of that was additional troops to help ensure the safety of the Sheiks and to gain, regain control of Remadi, which was a very bloody fight and then the surge continued to succeed in that counterinsurgency.

REPORTER: when you say surge then you're not referring to the one President Bush initiated, you're saying it goes back several months before then.

MCCAIN: Yes. And again, because of my visits to Iraq, I was briefed by Colonel McFarland in December of 2006 where he outlined what was succeeding there in this counterinsurgency strategy, which we all know of now of now as the surge.

OLBERMANN: So, it was a secret surge. […]

CHRISTOPHER HAYES: This is really remarkable, right. This is a central tent pole for McCain's vision for Iraq,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

what he is running on. Yesterday he portrayed the fact that he does not understand what it is. Okay. They didn't choose the name the surge because it sounded cool, they weren't naming a rock band, right? They chose the surge because it referred to a surge or increase in troops, full stop. It is distinctive from everything else that happened in Iraq […]

OLBERMANN: So Senator Surge who is now Senator Secret Surge, to push back against criticism that he didn't know when the surge began, he manages to make this seem like he doesn't even understand what a surge is or what this surge was. […]

Fred Kagan Attempts to Dismiss McCain's Misunderstanding on the History of the Surge (MSNBC 07/23/08 08:04pm)
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: […] focusing on domestic issues after making a big gaffe on the timeline of the Iraq war, I don't know if it was a big gaffe but it happened. During a national TV interview, Senator McCain was asked about Obama's stance that the surge was only one factor that led to reduced violence. Senator Obama has also attributed improved security to the Sunni Awakening and the Shiite government's crackdown on the militias. This was John McCain's answer:

JOHN MCCAIN: Colonel McFarlane was contacted by one of the major Sunni Sheiks, because of the surge we were able to go out and protect that Sheik and others and that began the Anwar Awakening. I mean that's just a matter of history.

BRZEZINSKI: Here's the problem, the events Colonel Sean McFarlane was involved in pre-dated the surge. Reports say he wasn't even in the Anwar province at the time. [...] The McCain campaign has responded by saying: " Senator McCain is correct. As General Petraeus has made clear, the surge is the reason why the Anbar Awakening was so successful in tearing up Al Qaeda. The surge strategy that was supported by John McCain and opposed by Barack Obama was responsible for the reduction in violence we have seen over the last year and a half. " What do you make of this sort of timeline of events in terms of what John McCain is saying about the surge and what he attributes it to and does it match reality?

FRED KAGAN: It absolutely does match reality. There is no question that you would not have had the Awakening take form and expand in Anwar, and you certainly would not have had the Awakening spread around into Baghdad and south of Baghdad and throughout the country without the surge forces. And there is no question about that. [...] I spoke with one of the very prominent Sunni Sheiks in Anwar and I ran this very question by him and I said you know there are some people that are saying the Awakening happened independently of the surge and he said "what idiot said that".

BRZEZINSKI: Ok I want to cover a lot of ground with you if I can. Columnist Robert Novak is now saying that he was used by the McCain campaign. Can you weigh in on this; Novak is now questioning the so-called scoop that a top McCain aide gave him about him potentially announcing his Vice Presidential pick this week.

KAGAN: No I'm not a McCain spokesman. I am an expert on Iraq and I am happy to talk to you about Iraq issues. [...]

BRZEZINSKI: What do you make over this gaffe, over the timing of the Sunni or the Anwar Awakening?

KAGAN:I think that this is a trivial, I think gaffe is even too strong. I've spoken with John McCain; John McCain understands the timeline and the cause and events very clearly. What troubles me is that we are in here parsing very precise words that Senator McCain might have said and we are missing the fact that Senator Obama's description of what went down in Iraq in the last 18 months is just 180 degrees wrong. It's just wrong. […] So I think focusing on this question of did McCain get himself tangled up in a sentence or not is so microscopic an issue compared to the absolute false of the vision of the last 18 months that Senator Obama and his supporters have been describing that its hard to for me to believe that we are even having this discussion.

ANDREA MITCHELL: […] What can the international community do to stop Iran from coming a Nuclear power

short of an attack?

KAGAN: Well there is nothing that we can do short of an attack to force Iran to give up it's nuclear program. And so if Senator Obama is actually serious in saying that he will not tolerate a nuclear arms race, at the end of the day the only way you can make sure that doesn't happen is with an attack. There are a variety of thinks that you can do short of an attack and hope that it will work but hope is not a method here. We've got a very much of an audacity of hope going on […]

Highlight #3
Dana Bash Takes a Look at McCain's Attempts to Grab Your Attention (CNN 07/23/08 7:23pm)
LOU DOBBS: Senator McCain today strongly criticized Senator Obama for supporting a congressional ban on offshore oil drilling. McCain said crude oil prices dropped sharply after President Bush ended the executive ban on offshore drilling and Senator McCain is absolutely correct. Crude oil prices have plunged more than $20 a barrel since the president lifted that ban on the 14th of July. Crude oil prices today closing just below $125 a barrel. […]

DANA BASH: Call this 'counter-programming.'

JOHN MCCAIN: We know that Americans are sitting around the kitchen table tonight, figuring out whether they can keep their home or not.

BASH: While Barack Obama is overseas John McCain is trying to convince voters back home he's working to ease their pain. He staged a photo-op, food shopping with a Pennsylvania family, going out of his way to show and tell he gets it.

MCCAIN: The price of a gallon of milk just went over $4 a gallon. Renee said that that was the highest she had ever seen it.

BASH: At a town hall he even suggested the price of oil is down because of a controversial White House decision he supported, lifting the federal ban on offshore drilling.

MCCAIN: The President of the United States announced […] a week or so ago that we would be lifting the moratorium on offshore drilling. The price of oil dropped ten dollars! We need to drill offshore!

BASH: But talking pocketbook politics is only half of McCain's double-barreled strategy while Obama is abroad. The other, trying to keep Obama from bolstering his foreign policy credentials this week by pounding away on his Iraq plans.

MCCAIN: He is in favor of unconditional withdrawal. An unconditional withdrawal, my friends, without paying attention to the facts on the ground could lead to our failure.

BASH: Republicans frustrated with Obama's overseas spotlight are trying to be clever in getting their message out. The Republican National Committee will run these radio ads in Berlin while Obama is there.

RNC RADIO AD: When our military needed necessary resources, Barack Obama failed to stand up.

BASH: But, not that Berlin. The towns of Berlin in three battleground states, Wisconsin, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania and the McCain campaign is resorting to sarcasm to get attention, handing out fake French press passes, dubbing the McCain media, 'The JV Squad, "Left Behind to Report in America."'

Another Way McCain advisors know they'll get attention is to tease the media on McCain's search for a running mate. The plan was to do that by going to New Orleans to meet with someone on the VP buzz list, Louisiana governor, Bobbi Jindal, but it didn't happen. The trip was cancelled because of bad weather.

New Issue of Democracy: A Journal of Ideas Now Available

September 16, 2013

Dear John,

A quarter-century ago, one of the most influential white papers in modern American politics was published. "The Politics of Evasion," by William A. Galston and Elaine C. Kamarck, was a wake-up call to a Democratic Party that had lost three straight presidential elections and seemed completely at sea.

All these years later, there's another party on a losing streak. And this is why we asked Bill and Elaine to revisit their seminal essay and see how it's held up. We present "The New Politics of Evasion," in which the authors size up what they got right, what they got wrong, and how it came to be that the Republicans became the party that can't face up to uncomfortable truths about itself.

The issue next features a very sharp and timely piece on U.S.-Russia relations by Andrew Weiss . While he is tempted to say that as long as Putin is around an enduring improvement in relations is hopeless, he does see some areas where cooperation is possible.

We also have Richard V. Reeves, Isabel Sawhill, and Kimberly Howard on what they call the "parenting gap," which leaves millions of children behind long before school has started. It's high time, they write, that progressives get over concerns about appearing to lecture poor parents, while also ensuring that they get the tools to be better parents. Finally, Henry Farrell takes on the new technology intellectuals who purport to explain how technological advances are changing our societies, but all too often settle for attention-grabbing (and meaningless) jargon.

In our Responses slot this issue, labor leaders Bruce Raynor and Andy Stern reply to Rich Yeselson's "Fortress Unionism" essay. And as usual, we love our book reviews: Joan Walsh on George Packer. Seyla Benhabib on the recent biography of Albert O. Hirschman. J.J. Goldberg on Daniel Jonah Goldhagen's new book on anti-Semitism. Meg Jacobs on austerity politics. And Diana Wueger on how progressives can change the terms of the gun debate.

We have a Facebook page , so please take a moment to "Like" us. If you're on Twitter, be sure to follow us @demjournal . If you're not a subscriber, sign up for a subscription . Or give a tax-deductible donation to keep the magazine going strong!

Thank you as always for reading, and enjoy! I'm sure you will.

Life of the Party by Ethan Porter
Party platforms don't matter—but they can, and they should. A platform-writing process that included party faithful could energize our politics.

About Democracy: A Journal of Ideas
Democracy: A Journal of Ideas is a quarterly journal of progressive thought edited by Michael Tomasky. E.J. Dionne Jr., of The Washington Post and the Brookings Institution, serves as Editorial Chair. Founded by Kenneth Baer and Andrei Cherny, Democracy serves as a place where ideas can be developed and important debates can be spurred. Democracy is the progressive analogue of conservative journals such as Commentary, the Public Interest, and the National Interest, and it showcases breakthrough thinking on the major domestic and foreign policy issues of our time. Democracy is sold in bookstores nationwide, and its readers—in print and at www.democracyjournal.org —can be found in 90 countries around the world. It was named Best New Publication by the Utne Independent Press Awards in 2008, and has been described by Politico as "what Obama's reading."

Subject: Which President told the Cubans "I wish you well"?

May 30, 2014

Dear Friends:

Finally, a President went to Cuba and uttered the words we've longed to hear.

"I wish you well."

Only, it wasn't President Obama.

This message to Cuba's people came from the President of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Tom Donohue.

It came up, as he wrapped up his visit to the island with an appearance at the University of Havana, and took questions from the press. When Daniel Trotta of Reuters asked Mr. Donohue, "Is Cuba a good investment?" he responded as follows :

> "Cuba would be a better investment if it had issues like arbitration, and agreements that would protect intellectual property, and ways that we could resolve our differences. But I believe that Cuba, 91 miles from our shore, with the new and extraordinary port that's being built here, has the potential to develop as a very good investment not only for Americans, U.S. citizens, but from people around the world, and I wish you well."

To borrow a phrase from Vice President Biden , this is kind of a big deal.

In our reports on economic reform and gender equality , we discussed how Cuba's own policies produced enviable achievements in critical areas like education and health but at unsustainable costs. Since he became Cuba's President, Raúl Castro has authorized greater liberties - from legalizing cell phones to overseas travel - while at the same time cutting the size of the state's payrolls and opening employment opportunities for Cubans in the non-state sector.

In simple terms, Cuba's project going forward is about addressing its economic crisis and bringing its assets and expenditures into a balance that future Cubans can live with.

This is at odds with the core objective of U.S. policy. For more than 50 years, its goal has been to sink Cuba's system by strangling Cuba's economy. The era of reform ushered in by President Castro has, at times, posed a paralyzing dilemma to President Obama.

On one hand, President Obama diverted from the orthodoxy in his first term by opening talks with Cuba on some bilateral issues, and by taking truly useful steps to reform U.S. policy; by giving unlimited travel rights to Cuban Americans and restoring some channels of people-to-people travel for Americans not of Cuban descent.

On the other, he has left the embargo mostly in place, stubbornly enforced sanctions against financial institutions to tie up Cuba's capacity to engage in global commerce and trade, and distressingly allowed many excesses of our regime change program to remain in place.

Changing circumstances in Cuba have occasioned no fresh thoughts - and no Hamlet-like indecision - among the pro-sanctions hardliners.

Tim Padgett wrote perceptively this week about their support for policies that exact sacrifice and impose suffering on Cuba's people.

> "Incredibly, [the hardliners are] convinced that denying Cuba's fledgling entrepreneurs more seed money, cell phones and sage advice - that keeping them in the micro-economic Middle Ages - is the best way to change Cuba.
>
> "[W]hy wouldn't the Cuba-policyhardliners want to help accelerate that process? One answer is that it's too mundane: It doesn't fit their more biblical vision of a Cuban Spring in which the Castros are ousted by a fiery, exile-led uprising."

How else to explain their vitriolic reaction to the U.S. Chamber's visit?

"Sen. Marco Rubio," the Wall Street Journal reported, "blasted Mr. Donohue in a letter last week, calling the trip 'misguided and fraught with peril of becoming a propaganda coup for the Castro regime.'" Capitol Hill Cubans taunted The Chamber with a note suggesting they invest in North Korea. Senator Bob Menendez chastised Donohue, saying conditions in Cuba "hardly seem an attractive opportunity for any responsible business leader."

Donohue was cheerfully immune to all of this. He said, "the Chamber of Commerce takes human rights concerns seriously," as the AP reported, "calling it an issue that should be part of a 'constructive dialogue' between the U.S. and Cuba."

He knows -in ways the hardliners simply cannot accept - that the political problems that divide the U.S. from Cuba will never be solved through diplomatic isolation but through negotiation and engagement.

In this sense, the voices criticizing Donohue, powerful as they are, represent the past - and neither the U.S. Chamber nor the 44 members of the foreign policy establishment who appealed for reforms in a letter to President Obama are going back.

Instead, our policy going forward will be defined not by pressing for the system's failure, but by the principle that Cubans are better off - and U.S. national interest best secured - by respecting the desire of Cubans to succeed in a future of their own design.

It is up to President Obama to say the words, "I wish you well."

But time is running out. As Tom Donohue observed, "If [President Barack Obama] wants to get it done before the end of his term, he's got two years, so he'll have to get busy."

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

U.S. Chamber of Commerce leaders travel to Cuba

Tom Donohue, President of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce (USCC), visited Cuba with a 12-member delegation this week to learn about the country's economic reforms and its growing private sector, and to explore the potential for U.S. investment opportunities in Cuba, reports the BBC . Donohue, an advocate for lifting the U.S. embargo on Cuba, told Reuters he initiated the trip:

> "[B]ecause of the evidence that we're seeing in Cuba of an extraordinary expansion of free enterprise, the reduction in government jobs, and more private hiring, all of which is moving in the right direction."

The delegation included Steve van Andel, Chairman of the Chamber's Board of Directors and President of the Amway corporation, and Marcel Smits, Executive Vice-President and Financial Director of the Cargill corporation, along with other members of the USCC, according to Granma . This trip is the first by USCC executives since July 1999, when Donohue traveled to Havana for three days.

During the visit, the delegation met with Bruno Rodríguez Parrilla, Cuba's Foreign Minister and Rodrigo Malmierca Díaz, Minister of Foreign Trade and Foreign Investment. It also toured an auto repair cooperative that, for ten months, has been privately operated rather than state-run, according to the Associated Press .

Donohue gave a speech to officials and university students at the University of Havana on Thursday. He praised the economic reforms that Cuba has already implemented, but also urged Cuba's government to open its markets and increase the number of private businesses, wrote the AP : "We deeply believe that countries with strong private sectors free of excessive government control and ownership will have the most successful and productive economies." He said that supporting commercial ties with Cuba is not equivalent to disregarding human rights problems in the country:

> "Those of us who oppose the embargo are often accused of excusing or ignoring the Cuban government's record on human rights and personal freedom. ... In fact they need to be addressed by our governments in a constructive and ongoing dialogue."

Donohue met with President Raúl Castro on Thursday. According to CNN , they discussed how both countries can help to move relations forward in the future. Donohue said, "It was positive and we expect to talk again." The delegation returned to the U.S. on Friday.

The Chamber's trip to Cuba was harshly criticized by Cuban-Americans in Congress. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (FL-27) decried the visit as "just another Potemkin village tour." Senator Bob Menendez (NJ), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, accused Donohue of supporting a government that "jails foreign business leaders without justification, violates international labor standards and denies its citizens their basic rights." In response, Donohue stated:

> "I've been free to go where I want. I'm talking to people from the private and the public sector. We're going to meet with small businesses. We're meeting with people from other countries that are operating here. I think we'll get a fair look and we're enjoying ourselves. ...The great thing about the United States is that everybody is entitled to their opinion including the Members of the Congress and the Senate. We happen to have a different view. We think this is a very positive opportunity."

DeWayne Wickham, Dean of Morgan State University's School of Global Journalism and Communication, published an op-ed in USA Today expressing hope that the Chamber of Commerce trip would help to change this "blockade against U.S. businesses," and arguing that the U.S. misses out on investment opportunities in Cuba because of the embargo.

OFAC seeks $10 billion fine from French bank BNP Paribas

BNP Paribas, France's largest publicly-traded bank, may be fined $10 billion by the U.S. Department of Justice Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) in order to resolve an investigation into claims that the bank dodged U.S. sanctions against Iran, Sudan, and Cuba, reports France24 . According to the report, OFAC also wants BNP to fire twelve employees involved in the illegal transactions, to accept the temporary suspension of all transactions in and out of the United States, and to plead guilty to the charges brought, which would jeopardize the company's U.S. banking license.

If imposed, this penalty would represent one of the largest fines ever levied on a bank and, according to analysts, would be a 5% hit to the company's book value. The last time Cuba Central reported on OFAC's investigation into BNP, the bank was setting aside $1.1 billion of its profits in anticipation of paying the fines.

U.S. petitioned to release information on exiles accused of planning Cuba attacks

This week, two U.S. groups filed joint Freedom of Information Act requests asking the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. government to release information about the four Miami exiles arrested in Cuba for allegedly planning attacks against the island, reports Reuters . The anti-war ANSWER Coalition and the National Committee to Free the Cuban Five requested information from the FBI, CIA, and the Department of State. The coordinator of the National Committee to Free the Cuban Five, Gloria La Riva, remarked, "Cuba has asked the U.S. government for cooperation and the public has a right to know the truth."

José Ortega Amador, Obdulio Rodríguez González, Raibel Pacheco Santos, and Félix Monzón Álvarez were arrested on April 26, and said to admit to "planning an attack with the objective of inciting violence." Cuba's Interior Ministry claims that the four exiles "maintain close ties" with Luis Posada Carriles - a former CIA operative and Cuban exile living in Miami who has been involved in killings and terror attacks in an effort to overthrow the Cuban government for decades.

For more information on the case, see our previous coverage .

Miriam Leiva, independent journalist, advocates for engagement at events in the U.S.

Miriam Leiva, a long-standing critic of Cuba's government and the U.S. embargo, met in Washington last week with representatives of the State Department, the U.S. Congress, and the White House. In comments to EFE , she expressed support for President Raúl Castro's reforms, but said they don't go far enough. In her view, increased engagement between Cuba and the U.S. could pressure Cuba to accelerate changes, especially if U.S. sanctions could no longer be blamed for problems in Cuba.

Leiva and her late husband, Oscar Espinosa Chepe, worked for Cuba's government before leaving their positions and becoming public critics of the government. In 2013, she initiated a White House petition in support of the Obama Administration's loosening of travel restrictions policies.

Yoani Sánchez releases interview with Vice President Biden

Dissident Cuban blogger Yoani Sánchez published an April interview with Vice President Joe Biden on her newly launched online newspaper, 14ymedio . The Q&A includes questions about U.S. investment in Cuba, as well as freedom of expression and access to telecom services that are currently unavailable to Cubans due to the embargo. When asked about U.S. policy, Biden said:

> "Our objective is to promote positive change on the island so that Cubans can enjoy a normal and productive life in their own country, have the freedom to express their points of view, and benefit from an inclusive and democratic political system."

The Cuban American Alliance, a DC-based organization of Cuban-Americans, wrote a piece that criticized the interview as a way for Biden to reiterate tired talking points on U.S. policy toward Cuba. Pointing to Sánchez's question about a possible U.S. invasion and Biden's categorical denial, the organization wrote, "This was a case of putting up a straw man in order to knock it down, or lobbing a softball at a batter who is waiting for it."

Sánchez launched 14ymedio last week , but an hour after the website went live, it was hacked and viewers were redirected to a website criticizing Sánchez. People in Cuba could not access the website until Saturday, May 24, according to Reuters . As recently as May 25, Fox News Latino reported that the site continued to be accessible on the island. However, Daniel Trotta, Chief Correspondent for Reuters in Cuba, posted to Twitter on May 28: "The new site @14ymedio by @yoanisanchez is still blocked in Cuba. Could this be permanent?"

Amateur sports license allows Americans to fly 90 miles to run 26 in Havana

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. citizens will be allowed to travel to Cuba to participate in the Havana marathon this November for the first time since the race began in 1987, according to Outside magazine. Tom Popper, president of Insight Cuba, stated that he was able to gain approval for runners to travel under an amateur sports license. Insight Cuba is the first commercial U.S. tour company to receive this type of license, and plans to bring 156 runners from the U.S. to participate in the marathon.

Previous to Popper's efforts, running the Havana marathon would not have been possible for U.S. citizens who are not of Cuban descent. Participation in the event was not possible even under President Obama's 2011 people-to-people travel reforms, as it would not fit the definitions governing educational or cultural licenses. Popper said that U.S. participation in the marathon represents an important type of engagement between the U.S. and Cuba: "We thought this would be a great way to get Americans side by side, literally, with Cubans and have a really meaningful interaction."

Former U.S. Secretary of the Interior calls for change in Cuba policy

Ken Salazar, the former U.S. Secretary of the Interior, spoke in favor of improving U.S. relations with Cuba at the Tribuna EFE-Casa de America forum in Madrid, reports the Latin American Herald Tribune . The forum focused on the status of the Hispanic community in the U.S.

Secretary Salazar spoke about the Cuban-American community, stating that many Cuban-Americans were looking toward a new future of engagement. Salazar signed last week's open letter to President Barack Obama, which urged him to make incremental changes in U.S. policy toward Cuba.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mexico, South Korea explore investment in Cuba

Mexican and South Korean officials have held meetings about potential investments in Cuba, following last month's announcement of Cuba's new Foreign Investment Law.

Earlier this month, Ildefonso Guajardo Villareal, Mexico's Minister of Economy, led a business delegation to Cuba. While Cuba Standard wrote that 30 people participated in the delegation, other sources, such as the Caribbean Journal , put the number at 60 businesspeople.

The delegation toured the Special Economic Development Zone at Mariel (ZEDM), where Cuban officials hope the new port will usher in a new era of global commercial integration, as we reported in January.

During the trip, Guajardo helped to open a new ProMexico trade office in the Miramar neighborhood of Havana. Bilateral trade between Cuba and Mexico reached $386 million in 2013, making Mexico one of Cuba's most important trading partners.

In comments to Prensa Latina , Francisco González, General Director of ProMexico, Mexico's foreign investment agency, said, "We seek a strong presence at the ZEDM because we think this could be a launching point for many markets."

This week, Ileana Bárbara Núñez Mordoche, Cuba's Deputy Foreign Trade and Investment Minister, traveled to South Korea where she attended an investment fair and met with business leaders to promote investment in Cuba's "agricultural, food, electronics, tourism and medical sectors," reports Progreso Weekly . Núñez Mordoche is the highest Cuban government official to visit South Korea since the countries broke off diplomatic relations in 1959.

Cuban oil technicians will train at Russian university

Russian oil companies Rosneft and Zarubezhnetf signed agreements with Cuba's state-run oil company CUPET (CubaPetróleo) at the end of the St. Petersburg International Economic Forum, which a delegation from Cuba attended. The agreement with Rosneft enables Cuban engineers to study at Gubkin Russian State University of Oil and Gas, reports Progreso Weekly . Through the program, Cuban students will be able to receive Master's or Doctoral degrees in petro-chemistry. Cuban students have been absent from the University since 1992. The agreement also included a provision allowing Rosneft to establish a logistics base at the Mariel Economic Development Zone, reported Prensa Latina. President Vladimir Putin attended the signing ceremony and said he looks forward to future cooperation.

The Cuban delegation participated in a forum to discuss collaboration between the Russian and Latin American economies, which Emilio Lozada, the Cuban ambassador to Russia, said Cuba's new foreign investment law would encourage, according to Granma . Lozada also said that the Cuban delegation's attendance at the St. Petersburg Economic Forum served as a rejection of U.S. sanctions against Russia.

IN CUBA

Banking regulations established for non-agricultural cooperatives

Last week, Cuba's Central Bank established regulations for banking services for non-agricultural cooperatives (CNAs) in Cuba in a resolution published in the Gaceta Oficial last week, reports Juventud Rebelde .

Although the government authorized the formation of CNAs last year , this is the first time that it has detailed the steps necessary for CNAs to secure a bank account. Under the regulation, CNAs can use only one bank of choice to open accounts at one branch. CNAs will have the option of maintaining several different kinds of bank accounts, including checking, savings and expense accounts. CNAs will also have access to escrow services.

Cuba's government has authorized non-agricultural cooperatives, composed of both self-employed workers and state employees, on an experimental basis. They have approved the formation of just under 500 CNAs, while over 200 of those are currently in operation. Workers at CNAs retain the same jobs they had when the businesses were state-run, but they now have the opportunity to make business decisions themselves.

> WASHINGTON -- Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was "presidential" in her testimony in a House of Representatives hearing this week and would have no trouble facing leaders such as Russian strongman Vladimir Putin.
> Feinstein said Clinton's performance in theHouse Select Committee on Benghazi Thursday left no doubt about her ability to do the job she's seeking.
> "I think she showed a drive and a staying power and a motivation," Feinstein said in a conference call with reporters Friday. "I could see her across the table from Putin."

> Feinstein, as chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, held more than a dozen hearings into the 2012 terrorist attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, and found nothing to implicate Clinton, who was Secretary of State at the time. The findings were unanimously endorsed by the Democrats and Republicans on the Senate committee.

compounds.

“I think the best thing we could do is end these hearings,” she said, “save some money and put it toward security at these facilities.”

Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., called the 11-hour hearing “abusive” and “disrespectful,” and said House Republicans failed to accomplish what some in their own ranks have admitted was the purpose of the inquiry.

“They certainly didn’t do any damage to Hillary Clinton’s campaign for president,” she said. “And if that was their goal, they got an ‘F.’”

Sen. Jeanne Shaheen, D-N.H., said the effort distracted lawmakers from pressing policy matters, such as raising the debt limit, keeping the government funded and passing a long-term transportation bill.

On Thursday, as the Benghazi hearing commanded much of the attention of official Washington, the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee approved a six-year bill to authorize road, bridge and transit projects, the first such legislation in a decade.

“That’s what the House needs to do,” Shaheen said. “Stop the partisan maneuvering and get to the work of the country.”

Hillary and the Machine (The New York Times)
By Ross Douthat
March 1, 2015
The New York Times

WITH Jeb Bush committed and Hillary Clinton all but crowned, the easiest story to tell about 2016 is a tale of two dynasties, a Bush-Clinton grudge match, a fated collision between the first families of American politics.

But only one party is actively cooperating with that narrative. Clinton's inevitability may inspire as much resignation as enthusiasm, but she's currently so far ahead of her "rivals" that she looks like she could win the Democratic nomination with a William McKinleyesque front porch campaign -- if her Georgetown mansion had one, that is.

On the Republican side, though, Bush's alleged front-runner status doesn't show up in any polls. He's locking up money and talent, but his actual numbers are bobbing along in the teens, and his approval ratings are not the kind you associate with a man of destiny. He may win the nomination, but it will be a near-run thing, and nothing like the looming Democratic coronation.

Given the stereotypes about our parties, this is a notable reversal. The Republicans are supposed to be the party of primogeniture, the Democrats of fratricide. The now-ancient Will Rogers joke -- "I belong to no organized political party; I'm a Democrat" -- has been recycled for decades for a reason.

But since Barack Obama outlasted Hillary in 2008, the G.O.P. has fractured and squabbled and cannibalized itself, while the Democrats have become the lock-step party, their internal feuds sedate and their policy divisions mostly buried. Clinton's unassailable position is specific to the former first lady, but it's also part of a pattern where Democrats pick their candidates early -- the winnowing of challengers to Kamala Harris in the California Senate primary is a case in point -- and mostly avoid insurgencies in their primary campaigns.

To some extent this is normal: The stereotypes aside, both parties are more unified when they hold the White House and more fractious when they don't. But the level of Democratic unity really is unusual by historical standards (Obama has faced much less intraparty opposition than did Bill Clinton or Jimmy Carter), and it's particularly unusual given how poorly Democrats have fared outside of Obama's presidential runs -- losing the House in 2010 and the Senate last fall, and getting hammered in state politics.

At some point you would expect those defeats to have a fracturing effect, to inspire grass-roots uprisings or ideological splits. But notwithstanding the occasional surprise showing from a Zephyr Teachout or a Jesus Garcia, and notwithstanding the pining of the Warrenistas, the Democrats are poised to enter the lists in 2016 with the same "hang together" strategy they've taken throughout the Obama years.

One way to look at this strategy is that the party's power brokers are effectively choosing the preservation of their impressive but ramshackle presidential-level majority, whose e pluribus unum qualities they don't want to test with any kind of civil war over the kind of debates and experiments that might make the Democrats more competitive in reddish states and off-year elections.

The unvoiced assumption is that the coalition of 2008 and 2012 exists in a very precise equilibrium (more populism might alienate the liberal rich and upper-class professionals, a bigger tent on social issues might alienate the activists and depress turnout, etc.), and since it's worked twice it's worth sticking with again, even if it isn't likely to take back Congress anytime soon.

At the national level, that choice makes a certain sense. The presidency increasingly bestrides our political system, liberals already have most of the welfare state they want and, as Obama's imperial second term is demonstrating, a creative Caesar can use the bureaucracy to play offense on policy without having either the House or Senate on his side.

But the choice also has downsides, both in terms of what it concedes to Republicans (the entire South, to begin with) and in terms of the possibilities foreclosed, the escape hatches sealed off, when primaries and presidential nominations are predetermined.

I've written before that Hillary is the candidate most likely to hold a version of the Obama coalition together. But that doesn't mean it will be pretty to watch. As we've been reminded by the revelations about all the foreign powers that donated to what is now known as the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation during Hillary's tenure as secretary of state, she's a celebrity on the surface and the very model of a postmodern machine politician underneath, with the ooze of corruption clinging to all the levers that she'll need to pull to win.

For the sake of their existing presidential majority, the Democrats are lucky to have her. Where their integrity and ideals are concerned, maybe not so much.

And there may come a time, during the inevitable sleaze of a Clinton restoration if not sooner, when they may find themselves wishing they could just blow the whole thing up.

A Veiled Jab at Clinton From a Possible '16 Rival (The New York Times)
By Maggie Haberman
March 1, 2015
The New York Times

Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor who is likely to seek the Democratic nomination for president in 2016, took a veiled shot at a potential rival, Hillary Rodham Clinton, in a speech in South Carolina on Saturday, criticizing the politics of "triangulation" that have historically been associated with the Clintons.

"The most fundamental power of our party and our country is the power of our moral principles," Mr. O'Malley said, according to a transcript of his remarks provided by an aide.

In words that echoed those of Senator Barack Obama when he battled Mrs. Clinton in 2007 for the Democratic nomination, Mr. O'Malley added: "Triangulation is not a strategy that will move America forward. History celebrates profiles in courage, not profiles in convenience."

Mr. O'Malley's comments came at the Democratic Party's John Spratt Issues Conference in Myrtle Beach, and South Carolina is a crucial early primary state that Mrs. Clinton lost to Mr. Obama. Mr. O'Malley has in the past declined to contrast himself with Mrs. Clinton.

Some Democrats hope Mrs. Clinton will face a strong primary challenge, worrying that without one she might be unresponsive to some progressives.

The remarks from Mr. O'Malley, who is viewed as facing an uphill battle, signaled a new phase both of his own efforts, after a year of saying he was not in "compare-contrast" mode with Mrs. Clinton, and of the early 2016 campaign.

The politics of triangulation is a phrase often used to describe former President Bill Clinton's brand of centrism. It has also been used to criticize Mrs. Clinton as overly poll driven, and liberals have long used it as a cudgel. In a pivotal Democratic primary speech in November 2007 in Iowa, Mr. Obama deployed "triangulation" as an attack line against Mrs. Clinton.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton declined to comment on Mr. O'Malley's remarks.

Mr. O'Malley and Mrs. Clinton have enjoyed a good relationship. When Mr. O'Malley called Mrs. Clinton in 2013 to say he was considering a presidential campaign, she told him that he should do what he felt he had to, according to a person who was familiar with the call but was not authorized to speak about it.

One issue of importance to progressives in the Democratic Party is Wall Street reform. Mrs. Clinton has voiced support, but as someone with historic ties to the financial industry, she is facing a push from some on the left in her party to speak out more forcefully.

Basu: What will donors expect for Clinton donations? (The Des Moines Register)
By Rekha Basu
February 28, 2015
The Des Moines Register

Hillary Clinton has been dropping more serious hints about running for president — probably to few people's surprise. The time she has taken to decide only seems to have grown her favorability ratings, which are so high the New York Times' Nate Cohn writes, "If a candidate has ever been inevitable (for a nomination) it is Mrs. Clinton today." Her Iowa poll numbers are a smashing 61 percent among likely Democratic voters. They're just a point less nationally. And Super PACS for her are amassing a formidable war chest. That momentum had Republican hopefuls skewering her at a conservative political action conference last week. No candidate besides an incumbent has ever done this well in early primary polls, Cohn says.

That's an enviable place from which to watch Republican hopefuls tear each other down. But it puts Democratic voters and the general public at risk of writing off the primary campaign as settled. That would be a mistake since primaries shouldn't be love fests or coronations, but a chance to examine and define priorities, both for the candidates and the party.

And Clinton has some questions to answer. A tough one comes from the recent influx of donations to the family's Clinton Foundation, breeding suspicions they are intended to gain influence with her if she becomes president. The Washington Post reported the charitable foundation has raised nearly $2 billion, including contributions from corporate giants and foreign governments — $262 million of that since Clinton left the Obama administration. And a sizable share of those donating $10,000 or more are also donors to the Ready for Hillary PAC and to her 2008 campaign.

That may not be illegal — very little seems to be anymore when it comes to money in politics — but it raises the prospect of donations earmarked for charity that are really intended to buy influence. What might corporate donors, dominated by the financial services sector, get in return? Probably not stricter financial regulations. Even foreign governments like Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Argentina, which can't legally spend to influence U.S. elections, have given the foundation over $1 million apiece.

Some Clinton allies are raising those questions. Marianne Williamson, a familiar name to many devotees of spiritual and inspirational literature, is a California-based author and speaker on the progressive end of the Democratic Party. She ran for a congressional seat from California last year. In late March she's sponsoring a conference on grass-roots Democratic priorities featuring Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders as keynoter. In an open letter to Clinton last year, published in The Huffington Post, Williamson wrote, "I want a woman president — really, I do. A lot of us do. And yes, you're so qualified, and yes, we've known you forever, and yes, you'd know what to do from Day 1." But she continued, "We only want to vote for you if you run like hell away from that corporate box you've landed in. ... We know now that Wall Street runs the country, and we don't like it. And for many of us, we don't want to vote for you if Wall Street runs you, too."

In a phone interview Thursday, Williamson said she admires Clinton, but wants to see her priorities challenged from the left. Noting her acceptance of $400,000 in speaking fees from Goldman Sachs, Williamson cautions, "they'll want a return." Citing Clinton's ties to the biotechnology industry, she wonders if GMO giant Monsanto would "be given the keys to 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue." The State Department under Clinton lobbied foreign governments to use GMO seeds. It also lobbied governments to adopt policies benefiting GE, ExxonMobil, Boeing and Microsoft, all foundation donors. Clinton advocated raising subsidies and tax breaks to biotech companies. And in her last campaign, she picked as her chief campaign strategist a CEO for a public relations firm representing Monsanto.

Two progressive Democrats whose names are being promoted for presidential consideration — Sanders and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren — have promoted more regulation of Wall Street. Warren introduced legislation to force corporations that move overseas in order to avoid paying taxes to relinquish control to foreign entities. She helped create the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau to guard against abusive lending practices. Sanders has called for an end to tax breaks for corporations that ship jobs overseas, an end to free-trade agreements, and the breakup of banking monopolies. Will Clinton join them?

For now, she's making her appeals to professional women. Speaking to Silicon Valley IT employees last week in the first of three speeches to female audiences, she mentioned the wage gap, glass ceilings and locker-room mentalities. Next she'll speak to EMILY's List, which raises money to for pro-choice women candidates. It's smart strategy. Women tend to embrace Clinton with a rare loyalty and enthusiasm. We've watched her work a punishing schedule, withstand sexism, betrayal and a disappointing campaign outcome. We've seen an accomplished woman take her punches and come back stronger. And many celebrate a grandma who still has the fight in her.

But these times demand a serious commitment to improving the lives of the disenfranchised she has long championed. That means shifting the balance of power back from money to people. The question really isn't if we're ready for Hillary, but if Hillary is ready for that.

American right unholsters surest shot against Hillary (The Sunday Times)
Toby Harnden
March 1, 2015
The Sunday Times

SHE has shattered glass ceilings throughout her career, showing herself able to rise to the top in a man's world, and now seems poised to try to win the most powerful job in the world.

But the neatly dressed blonde who wowed a raucous crowd inside a convention centre outside Washington was not Hillary Clinton, the Democratic favourite for the White House in 2016, but rather Carly Fiorina, the first woman to lead a company in the Fortune 20 liist of the biggest US businesses.

Fiorina has cleverly positioned herself as the "anti-Hillary", the only woman in a Republican field of more than a dozen men and the candidate most prepared to mount relentless attacks on the former US secretary of state — including a few that a male opponent might struggle to get away with.

A former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, Fiorina, 60, has never held political office and failed in her 2010 attempt to win a Senate seat in California.

While this may make her an unlikely Republican nominee, conservative activists are tipping her as a possible vicepresidential pick, not least because she could help neutralise Clinton.

Preferring skirts to her rival's trademark trouser suits, she spoke last week at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) in Maryland, and served up plenty of red meat for party activists hungry for ideas about how to defeat Clinton.

Presenting herself as a freemarket conservative and foreign policy hawk, Fiorina boasted of having done business in more than 80 countries and of serving for several years on the advisory board of the CIA. She spoke of knowing King Abdullah of Jordan and Binyamin Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister.

"I have met Vladimir Putin, and I know that his ambition will not be deterred by a gimmicky red 'reset' button," she said, referring to her talks with the Russian president at an Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation event in China and the ill-fated "reset" in relations with the Kremlin announced by Clinton in 2009.

She also mocked Clinton — the Democrat frontrunner due to declare her candidacy by the summer— for boasting that she flew nearly 1m miles during her four years as secretary of state.

"Like Mrs Clinton, I too have travelled the globe," Fiorina said. "Unlike Mrs Clinton, I know that flying is an activity, not an accomplishment."

Fiorina lambasted Clinton over foreign donations to her family foundation.

"Mrs Clinton, please name an accomplishment," Fiorina demanded. "And in the meantime, please explain why we should accept that the millions and millions of dollars that have flowed into the Clinton Global Initiative from foreign governments doesn't represent a conflict of interest."

Fiorina, who first emerged on the political scene as an adviser to Senator John McCain when he was the Republican nominee in 2008, showed a softer side too, talking of her battle with cancer and her stepdaughter's death.

She seems to have got under the skin of the Clinton camp, which has bristled at suggestions their candidate copied the title of her 2014 book Hard Choices from Fiorina's 2007 memoir Tough Choices.

Last week Clinton aides were forced to deny claims she had stolen the phrase "unlock their full potential" from Fiorina, whose organisation is the Unlocking Potential Project.

After Fiorina's speech the Democratic National committee sent out emails linking to articles criticising Fiorina's tenure at Hewlett-Packard.

"Carly Fiorina lacks Secretary Clinton's resumé when it comes to serving and empowering working families and middle-class Americans," wrote Adrienne Elrod, of Correct the Record, a pro-Clinton group. "Hillary's resumé is one of success and this is why Ms Fiorina attacks Hillary and her work to protect children and help every American reach their potential." The CPAC was an opportunity for the full range of potential 2016 Republican presidential candidates to set out their wares.

Jeb Bush, the early frontrunner, was credited with a deft performance in front of an audience containing many who viewed him as suspiciously moderate.

Senator Rand Paul, a libertarian running against the party establishment, was expected to win the CPAC straw poll for the third year in a row; an outcome, his opponents groused, that was down in large part to his favouring legalising marijuana for medical use — a reform backed by the young activists who dominate the gathering.

Hillary Clinton Needs a Reverse Sister Soujah Moment (The Observer)
By Lincoln Mitchell
March 01, 2015
The Observer

As the 2016 presidential primary season approaches two narratives have begun to emerge around Hillary Clinton. One is that she is almost certain to her party's nomination for president. In the The New York Times, Nate Cohn argues that Ms. Clinton is in a much stronger position now than she was eight years ago, when she was also the early frontrunner: "No candidate, excluding incumbent presidents, has ever fared so well in the early primary polls as Mrs. Clinton. She holds about 60 percent of the vote of Democratic voters, a tally dwarfing the 40 percent she held this time in the last election cycle." As Cohn adds, further evidence of Ms. Clinton's strength is that "not a single sitting senator, governor or vice president has declared a run."

The second narrative suggests that Ms. Clinton has a problem among progressive Democratic voters, who view her as too conservative on foreign policy or economic issues. Many of these progressives hope to draft Elizabeth Warren to run for President, an effort that has recently been joined by the Working Families Party in New York. However, despite grumblings on the left, there is little evidence to suggest that, at this moment, Ms. Clinton would be vulnerable to a progressive challenge. Some polls have indicated that among self-identified progressives Ms. Clinton trails Ms. Warren, but supporters of Ms. Warren would be foolish to interpret that data too optimistically. Ms. Clinton remains the strong (and well-funded) frontrunner, despite misgivings among some progressives.

Although it is extremely unlikely that Hillary Clinton could lose to Elizabeth Warren or any other progressive challenger in the nominating campaign, Ms. Clinton will be a much stronger candidate if she can increase her popularity among her Party's activist base. That support, while perhaps not necessary in an non-competitive primary is critical in November, when voter enthusiasm could determine the outcome of a general election.

Because of her big lead and lack of any strong opponents, Ms. Clinton should address the enthusiasm gap among progressives. She can do this by borrowing a trick from her husband.

Additionally, as the waft of inevitability around Ms. Clinton becomes even more acute with every passing week, she may leave herself vulnerable to any bump during the primary process. If Martin O'Malley, Jim Webb, Bernie Sanders or any of the other candidates who might run against Ms. Clinton finish a respectable second with even 25-35 percent of the vote in either Iowa or New Hampshire, for example, it could tarnish Ms. Clinton and restart the narrative that she does not have support among the Democratic base.

Because of her big lead and lack of any strong opponents, Ms. Clinton should address the enthusiasm gap among progressives. She can do this by borrowing a trick from her husband. More than twenty years ago, Bill Clinton, when running for President the first time, spoke to the Rainbow Coalition convention and used that platform to criticize Sister Souljah, an African American rapper who had recently spoken out about the possibility of African Americans using violence in the wake of the acquittal of the Los Angeles police who had been caught on video beating Rodney King. Mr. Clinton's remarks became known as his Sister Souljah moment, a phrase now used to describe the tactic a politician publicly distancing him or herself from their party's base to appear more centrist.

Hillary Clinton has spent so much time distancing herself from both President Obama and the activist base of the Democratic Party, that she now needs a reverse Sister Souljah moment. Ms. Clinton would benefit greatly from taking a strong stance on an issue, any issue, that resonates deeply with the left wing base of the Democratic Party. This could include a staunch defense of President Obama, a visible, and believable, statement of concern about something like income inequality.

For Ms. Clinton, the key would be to do this in a way that seems authentic rather than contrived. Ms. Clinton confronted the latter problem when at a rally shortly before last year's midterm elections she said "Don't let anybody tell you that corporations and businesses create jobs," only to try to defang that populist assertion a few days later. "I short-handed this point the other day, so let me be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades. Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in America and workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out," a view with which Jeb Bush or Scott Walker would probably agree.

Ms. Clinton may have a tough race in the general election, and would be in a much stronger position if she had a unified Democratic Party behind her.

AUSTRALIA

THE STORY

Yesterday morning, Australia's government told the country, 'G'day mates! While you were sleeping we got a new prime minister.'

WAIT...BACK UP.

For the last two years, Australia's been run by a man named Tony Abbott. You may remember him as the guy who got Putin to cuddle a koala . Abbott's never exactly been Mr. Popular, but lately his approval ratings have been worse than usual. Australia's economy has slowed, with many worried a recession is around the corner. That, plus Abbott's stances on same-sex marriage (against it) and climate change (not sure it exists) hasn't sat well with many Aussies.

SO WHAT HAPPENED?

The other members of Abbott's party took a look at the calendar, and realized the PM's unpopularity meant they'd probably lose their seats in next year's elections. So on Monday, Malcolm Turnbull – one of Abbott's main political rivals within his own party – said he wanted the top job instead . More than half of lawmakers agreed. Now, Turnbull's the new PM, and Abbott's packing his Vegemite.

theSKIMM

The country's economy has been looking down under, so political chaos isn't necessarily the recipe for success. TBD on whether the new guy can Turnbull it around.

RUSSIA

THE STORY

Yesterday, US officials spread some good cheer and let everyone know that Russia's been beefing up its military presence in Syria.

WAIT...BACK UP.

Syria's been going through a civil war for more than four years, with rebels fighting to oust Syrian President Assad. Over the years, Assad's gotten help from his squad (think Russia & friends). Meanwhile, the US & friends have bonded over helping the rebels trying to get rid of Assad. In the last year, though, ISIS came to town, and finally, everyone agreed on something: get rid of ISIS.

WHAT NOW?

Russia's now sending in some serious equipment. Think: more troops and tanks. Some would call this military escalation; Russia said it's called fighting terrorism.

theSKIMM

Russia's military buildup conveniently gives them a serious military presence in the Mideast. It also conveniently makes it more awkward for the US not to take a bigger role in the Syrian crisis. Guess who's super excited by all this? Rhymes with Shamerica.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR MOM ASKS HOW YOUR NEW ROOMMATE IS...

Not getting better. Over the weekend, wildfires in northern California caused thousands of people to evacuate. Yesterday, the situation got worse. Two separate fires completely destroyed hundreds of homes and displaced over 20,000 people, and one of the blazes is still barely contained. These fires are in large part thanks to a massive drought California's been going through. Meanwhile, yesterday, southern Utah was hit by flash flooding caused by a thunderstorm. At least eight people were killed, and five others are missing.

WHAT PEOPLE ARE WATCHING...

A scary day at Mississippi's Delta State University. Last night, a male university professor who was suspected in two murders shot and killed himself. This was after he was suspected of killing another male professor on campus earlier in the day. Police are investigating whether there's a connection to another shooting, in which a woman romantically connected to the suspect was shot and killed. If you think this feels like it might've been some kind of love triangle, you're not alone. But police say they aren't ready to talk motive yet.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR FRIEND IN FINANCE IS LOOKING FOR A NEW JOB...

Maybe steer clear of Deutsche Bank. Yesterday, Reuters reported that the German bank will not be needing a bigger boat, as it plans to fire about a quarter of the company's employees. The news comes after a rough couple of months for the bank. First, it paid out billions in legal fees for things like allegedly manipulating interest rates. Then it was investigated for tax fraud. Then its co CEOs, Phil & Lil, resigned. Enter the new boss, who's promised to cut costs. Which in this case looks like it means jobs. Deutsche Bank isn't the only one on the struggle bus. Other European banks – like Italy's UniCredit and Britain's Barclays — have recently announced layoffs to cut costs.

I was just thinking: has she made a clear statement on Israel yet? I get this question from donors all the time. Does she need to state her principles on Israel before Iran? Or do both at the same time?

compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?"

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was "very supportive of the negotiating process," the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. "So it seemed like she was supporting it," recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a "perception" problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

"Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I've got my own relationships," she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. "I know Michael well, but I haven't read the book," she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel's security. "She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel," recalled Jacobs. "And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer."

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. "She said 'I'm going to do what's in the best interest of the U.S.,' and that was the end of it," Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, "although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it's got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people." He urged Jewish donors "to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits," adding: "I'd hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support."

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton's senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

"It's a tricky issue for her," said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran "are going to put her in a box."

Clinton's allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. "I know where she stands, but I can't talk about it," Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, "She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this."

He soon backtracked, saying "I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal."

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn't hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

“Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don’t think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is,” said the donor.

Saban’s representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban’s financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn’t going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

“Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No,” he said. “Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3.”

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. “Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It’s broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate,” he said. “So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama’s support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment.”

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

“If there’s a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her,” said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group’s members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

“For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy,” said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street’s PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

“She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community.”

Chris Beyrer, MD
Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health
Dr. Beyrer serves as Director of Johns Hopkins Training Program in HIV Epidemiology and Prevention Science, and as Founding Director of the Center for Public Health and Human Rights. He is the Associate Director of the Johns Hopkins Center for AIDS Research (CFAR) and of the University's Center for Global Health. He currently serves as a member of the men who have sex with men (MSM) Working Group of the HIV Prevention Trials Network. He has extensive experience in conducting international collaborative research and training programmes in HIV/AIDS and other infectious disease epidemiology, in infectious disease prevention research, HIV among Key Populations, and in health and human rights. As Director of the Johns Hopkins Fogarty AITRP Program, Dr. Beyrer provided fellowships for over 1,400 international scholars in HIV/AIDS prevention, research, and treatment. He served as Field Director of the Thai PAVE and HIVNET studies from 1992-1996, based in Chiang Mai, northern Thailand, and has done extensive research in the epidemiology of HIV in Thailand, Burma, China, India and across Southeast Asia, in Russia and Kazakhstan, in Malawi, South Africa, and the United States. He is the author of the 1998 book "War in the Blood: Sex Politics and AIDS in Southeast Asia" and Co-Editor of Public Health and Human Rights: Evidence- Based Approaches. Dr. Beyrer has served as advisor to the US President's Emergency Plan For AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) Program, the HIV Vaccine Trials Network, The Office of AIDS Research of the US National Institutes of Health, the US Military HIV Research Program, the World Bank, the Royal Thai Army Medical Corps and the Thai Red Cross, as well as numerous other organizations.

Gregorio Millett, MPH
amfAR
Gregorio Millett is a well-published and nationally recognized epidemiologist/researcher with significant experience working at the highest levels of federal HIV policy development at both the White House and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). From 2009 to 2011, Mr. Millett served as a detailee in the White House Office of National AIDS Policy as a Senior Policy Advisor. In this role, he coordinated the Office's policy and research activities, including HIV prevention policy and the federal-level inter-agency process to develop the National AIDS Strategy. Gregorio Millett is one of three principal writers of President Obama's National HIV/AIDS Strategy. He served on the organizing committee for the Washington, DC, Conference, and was the federal lead in organizing the U.S. government and White House activities around the 2012 International AIDS Conference. Mr. Millett also worked on a diverse array of policy issues during his tenure at the White House, including the elimination of the HIV entry ban that prohibited HIV-positive persons from travelling to or seeking residency in the United States; the temporary suspension of the ban prohibiting federal funding for domestic or global needle exchange programs; and the reallocation of HIV prevention resources by CDC to adopt a new funding formula for state and local health departments that better aligns funding with current disease burden. Prior to joining amfAR in May 2014, Mr. Millett served as the HHS/CDC Liaison to the White House Office of National AIDS Policy. Mr. Millett has been credited with changing the underlying assumptions among researchers of observed HIV infection disparities among black men who have sex with men (MsM) and is widely recognized as one of the first researchers to show no protective effect associated with male circumcision for MSM.

Jeffrey S. Crowley, MPH
O'Neill Institute for National and Global Health Law
Jeffrey Crowley is the Program Director of the National HIV/AIDS Initiative at the O'Neill Institute for National and Global Health Law and Distinguished Scholar. Mr. Crowley is a widely recognized expert on HIV/AIDS and disability policy. From February 2009 through December 2011, he served as the Director of the White House Office of National AIDS Policy and Senior Advisor on Disability Policy for President Barack Obama. In this capacity, he led the development of our country's first domestic National HIV/AIDS Strategy for the United States, a five-year plan for aligning the efforts of all stakeholders to reduce the number of new HIV infections, increase access to care, and reduce HIV-related health disparities. The Strategy continues to guide the Administration's efforts in this area. He also coordinated disability policy development for the Domestic Policy Council and worked on the policy team that spearheaded the development and implementation of the Affordable Care Act.

The O'Neill Institute Colloquium is open to all students, faculty, staff, and interested members of the public.

McCain, Leno trade Jibes (AP 08/26/08)
By Mike Glover
"Could I just mention to you Jay, that in a moment of seriousness, I spent five and a half years in a prison cell, I didn't have a house, I didn't have a kitchen table, I didn't have a table, I didn't have a chair," said McCain, citing his history as a prisoner of war in North Vietnam. "I spent those five and half years not because I wanted to get a house when I got back home." McCain has come under criticism after he confessed he didn't know how many homes he owns with his wife Cindy. The source of the family's wealth is a Phoenix beer distributorship launched by her father.

McCain Warms Up to Hollywood (WSJ blog 8/26/08)
By Elizabeth Holmes
McCain, who turns 72 on Friday, defied the odds and appeared Monday with notable folks to support his candidacy. After the endorsement from Daddy Yankee in Phoenix, McCain attended a fund-raiser in Sacramento with Patricia Heaton of "Everybody Loves Raymond" fame. The Arizona senator then traveled to southern California for an appearance on the Tonight Show with Jay Leno and a fund-raiser at the Beverly Hilton.

Cind McCain to Meet with Saakashvili on Georgia trip (WaPo 08/26/08)
By Michael Shear and Karen DeYoung
John McCain, the presumptive Republican nominee, announced the visit to a group of fundraisers in Sacramento. McCain spokeswoman Jill Hazelbaker confirmed that his wife was en route to Georgia and said she is visiting as part of the U.N. World Food ProgramGeorgian President Mikheil Saakashvili and visit with wounded Georgian soldiers.

Latin Star Daddy Yankee Endorses McCain at School (Arizona Republic 08/26/08)
By John Faherty
McCain's appearance at the school lasted just 20 minutes, it lacked any talk of policy and a question-and-answer period with the students did not happen. But it remained a thrill for approximately 120 students who were picked to attend because of their roles in student government or because they are taking advanced social-studies courses.

John McCain Shares the stage with Jay Leno and Daddy Yankee (LA Times 08/26/08)
By Maeve Reston
McCain had barely taken his seat when Leno offered him early birthday wishes: "We were going to have a cake, but the fire marshal said 'that many candles?' " The late-night host added that they'd ribbed McCain with "a few jokes" about his age during the campaign.

McCain is not lying low (CNN 08/26/08)
By Ed Henry
So McCain advisers say their goal is to keep Obama's convention "bounce" to a minimum, so McCain can head to St. Paul, Minnesota, next week with some real momentum. They think the best way to do that is to drive a deeper wedge between Obama and Sen.Hillary Clinton .

McCain Uses Vietnam Ordeal Against Jibes Over Wealth (Reuters 8/25/08)
By Andrew Gray

BURBANK, California (Reuters) - John McCain , who often invokes his ordeal as a Vietnam war prisoner to show his devotion to his country as he runs for U.S. president, drew on the experience again on Monday -- this time to deflect sniping over the number of houses he owns.

McCain Camp Tries To Downplay Top Aide Lobbying In Favor Of Gun Rights for Suspected Terrorists (ThinkProgress 08/25/08)
By Satyam Khanna
In 2007, Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-NJ) introduced legislation giving the Justice Department the discretion to prohibit gun sales to terror suspects . The legislation was supported by gun-control groups as well as the Bush administration. Siding with the gun industry in opposing closing this "terror gap" was Randy Scheunemann , now Sen. John McCain's (R-AZ) top foreign policy adviser. Newsweek reports that Scheunemann lobbied against the bill on behalf of the National Shooting Sports Foundation

Ayers Linked to GOP Governor Through University (HuffPo 08/26/08)
By Nico Pitney
The campaign season's hottest gotcha game -- six degrees of William Ayers -- has suddenly become a bit more complicated for John McCain and the Republican Party.
It turns out that Ayers, a 60s-era radical and former Weathermen member, is linked to GOP Gov. Mark Sanford through their work for the University of South Carolina.

New McCain ad evokes Hillary 3a.m. spot, Says Hillary was 'Right' (TPM 08/26/08)
By Greg Sargent
McCain's ad opens with the Hillary spot's 3 A.M. question and segues into a montage of images reminding you that it's a dangerous world out there. It then airs footage of Hillary delivering her now-infamous line about McCain's "lifetime of experience" and her claim that all Obama brings to the commander-in-chief's desk is a 2002 speech.

McCain's Daddy Yankee Endorsement (NYT blog 8/25/08)

On Leno, McCain Invokes POW History When Asked About House Controversy (ABC blog 8/25/08)
"For a million dollars," Jay Leno asked Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., today, "how many houses do you have?" "Could I just mention to you, Jay, that, at a moment of seriousness. I spent five-and-a-half years in a prison cell," McCain said. "I didn't have a house. I didn't have a kitchen table. I didn't have a table. I didn't have a chair. And I didn't spend those five-and-a-half years because, not because I wanted to get a house when I got out."

The POW "Card" (ABC blog 8/25/08)
Can a person who showed unfathomable heroism in a dark period of war invoke that heroism too often? It's a complicated thing, writing about Sen. John McCain's years as a Vietnam POW, and how he's cited those years in the campaign. A meme has developed among some bloggers and commentators that McCain is citing those grisly five and a half years too often.

McCain: Candidates Shouldn't Talk About Their Vietnam Service (ThinkProgress 8/25/08)
By Matt Yglesias
It seems that John McCain's presidential campaign thinks that thus far they've "underused" the subject of McCain's Vietnam service. Apparently, using it as a response to every criticism isn't good enough so I guess that means they'll be mentioning it in light of all McCain's positive proposals, too. "I was held prisoner in Hanoi and tortured by Communists who wouldn't approve of giant tax cuts slanted to the wealthiest citizens and that's how I know that tax cuts for the rich is just what this country needs." Or something. At any rate, once upon a time McCain was criticizing John Kerry for talking too much about Vietnam, saying he essentially invited the swift boat attacks by doing so:

Cindy McCain Heads to Georgia (No, Not the State) (New York Times blog 8/25/08)
by Michael Cooper
Senator John McCain just told a group of donors here that his wife, Cindy, is en route to Georgia , according to a pool report from inside the fund-raiser.
No further details were immediately available, but Mr. McCain has made his support for the country — and his hard line against Russia — central to his campaign since Russia invaded Georgia earlier this month.

Dems' attack theme: McCain's houses (Politico 8/25/08)
By Ben Smith

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As dozens of Democrats prepare to address their convention in Denver over the next four days, three themes have become clear: hope, change and John McCain's eight houses. Barack Obama's convention is shaping up to be the toughest — and most negative — in the Democratic Party's recent history, a gathering modeled more on the Republican Party's attack-themed conventions than, in particular, on the determinedly high-minded Democratic National Convention in Boston four years ago.

The McCain campaign welcomed delegates to Denver with a new ad Monday, showing Debra Bartoshevich, a self-described "proud Hillary Clinton Democrat," announcing that she opposes Barack Obama and will vote for John McCain. The Racism Excuse (WSJ 08/26/08)
Editorial
fter a second round of this -- recall the Obama line "He doesn't look like all those other Presidents on the dollar bills" -- the McCain campaign dared complain that at no time has the GOP candidate said anything remotely about his opponent's race. Predictably, Mr. McCain was charged with playing the "race card" himself.

By John Fund
Hans Nichols of Bloomberg News journeyed to Hanoi last week to find Le Van Lua, the first North Vietnamese that Mr. McCain met after being shot down in 1967 during his 23rd bombing run over the country. Mr. Le said he jumped into the lake where Mr. McCain's plane had landed and brandished a knife as he ordered the pilot to put up his hands. He then grabbed Mr. McCain by his hair and hoisted him atop two bamboo pontoons, the knife held to his throat.

Give Iraqis what they want (Boston Globe 08/26/08)
Editorial
PRESIDENT BUSH has been embarrassed by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Bush had set a goal of July 31 for a security agreement with Maliki's government. The key to negotiating such an accord, for Bush, was to avoid setting a firm date for withdrawal of US combat troops. Bush has insisted that the timing and pacing of a withdrawal had to be determined solely by conditions on the ground - a mantra that GOP presidential candidate John McCain has echoed faithfully.

Netroots Push Back Against MSM 'Bias' (Politico 08/26/08)
By Michael Calderone
Pushback against the media has been aided by the growth of more sophisticated liberal news sites, such as Talking Points Memo and The Huffington Post. In 2004, TPM founder Josh Marshall didn't have any paid staffers; this year he has nine. And Arianna Huffington's arsenal of nearly 2,000 bloggers didn't exist until President Bush was already six months into his second term. Not to mention, liberal watchdog group Media Matters - which provides ammo to many bloggers - has grown in that time from about 20 staffers to near 100, according to a source familiar with the organization.

Iraq PM says deal with U.S. on troop exit in 2011 (Reuters 8/25/08)
Iraqi Prime Minister Prime Nuri al-Maliki said on Monday that an agreement had been reached in negotiations on a security pact with the United States to end any foreign military presence in Iraq by the end of 2011. The Iraqi government has said it is proposing U.S. troops end patrols of Iraqi towns and villages by the middle of next year and U.S. combat troops leave Iraq by 2011. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a visit to Baghdad last week that no final agreement had been reached. Focus Group: Undecided Voters Care Much More About Character Than Issues (TPM 8/25/08)
By Greg Sargent
Joe Klein sat in on an independent focus group of 21 undecided voters and learned some interesting things about their priorities in this presidential election: Given a list of 31 personal attributes the next President might have and asked to pick the eight most important, "Accountability" finished highest with 13 votes, next was "Someone I can trust" with 12, "honest and ethical" was third with 11. "Agrees with me on the issues" got one vote. They didn't care if the candidate was a Washington insider or outsider. "A dynamic and charismatic leader" got two votes.
